The Trojans were now relieved with great succours, all the neighbour Countries having sent them aide: partly drawn to that warre by their Commanders who assisted Priamus for money, wherewith he abounded when the warre began: (as appears by his words in Homer) nor for love of himselfe and his sons, or hope of marriage with some of his many and fair daughters; partly also (as we may well ghesse) incited by the wrongs received of the Greeks when they wasted the Countries adjoining unto Troy. So that when Hector issued out of the town, he was little inferiour to his enemies in numbers of men, or qualitie of their Leaders. The principall Captains in the Trojan armie, were Hector, Parris, Desphobus, Helenus, and the other sons of Priamus: Aeneas, Antenor, and his sons, Polydamas, Sarpedon, Glaucus, Asius, and the sons of Panthus, besides Rhesus, who was slain the first night of his arrivall; Memnon, Queen Penthesilea, and others who came towards the end of the war. Between these and the Greeks were many battels fought: the greatest of which were, that at the tombe of King Ilus upon the Plain: and another at the very trenches of the Camp, wherein Hector brake through the fortifications of the Greeks, and began to fire their ships, at which time Ajax, the son of Telamon, with his brother Teucer, were in a manner the onely men of note that remaining unwounded, made head against Hector, when the state of the Greeks was almost desperate.

Another battell (for so antiquitie calls it) or rather the same renewed, was fought by Patroclus, who having obtained leave, drew forth Achilles troops, relieving the wearie Greeks with a fresh supply. Agamemnon, Diomedes, Ulysses, and the rest of the Princes, though sore wounded, yet were driven to put on armour, and with help of Patroclus repelled repelled the Trojans very hardly. For in that fight Patroclus was lost, and his body, with much contention recovered by his friends, was brought back into the Camp: the armour of Achilles which he had put on, being torn from him by Hector. It was the manner of those wars, having slain a man, to strip him, and hale away his body, not restoring it without ranfome, if he were one of marke. Of the vulgar little reckoning was made: for they fought all on foot, slightly armed, and commonly followed the success of their Captains; who rode not upon horses, but in Chariots, drawn by two or three horses, which were guided by some trusty followers of theirs; which drave up and down the field, as they were directed by the Captains; who by the swiftnesse of their horses presenting themselves where need required, threw first their Javelins, and then a-10 lighting, fought on foot, with swords and battle-axes, retiring into the ranks of footmen, or els returning to their Chariots when they found cause, and so began again with a new dart as they could get it, if their old were lost or broken. Their arms defensive were helmets, breast-plates, boots of brasse, or other mettall, and shields commonly of leather plated over. The offensive were swords and battel-axes at hand, and stones, arrows or darts when they fought at any distance. The use of their Chariots (besides the swiftnesse) was to keep them from weariness, whereto the leaders were much subject, because of their armour, which the strongest and stoutest were heaviest, also that from them they might throw their Javelins downwards, with the more violence. Of which weapon I find not that any carried more than one or two into the field: wherefore they were often driven 20 to return to their tents for a new one when the old was gone. Likewise of armours they had little change or none; every man (speaking of the chiefe) carried his own compleat, of which if any piece were lost or broken, he was driven to repair it with the like, if he had any fitting, taken from some Captain whom he had slain, and stripped: or else to borrow of them that had by such means gotten some to spare. Whereas therefore Achilles had lost his armour which Hector (as is said before) had taken from the body of Patroclus, he was faine to await the making of new, ere he could enter the fight: whereof he became very desirous, that he might revenge the death of Patroclus his dear friend.

At this time Agamemnon reconciled himselfe unto Achilles, not onely restoring his concubine Briseis, but giving him very great gifts, and excusing former matters as well
 30 as he might. In the next battell Achilles did so behave himself, that he did not onely put the Trojans to the worst, but also slew the valiant Hector, whom (if Homer may herein be beleaved) he chased three times about the walls of Troy. But great question may be made of Homer's truth in this narration. For it is not likely that Hector would stay alone without the Citie (as Homer doth report of him) when all the Trojans were fled into it: nor that he could leap over the rivers of Xanthus and Simois, as he must have done in that flight: nor that the Trojans, perceiving Hector in such an extremitie, would have forborn to open some of their gates and let him in. But this is reported onely to grace Achilles, who having (by what means soever) slain the noble Hector, did not onely carry away his dead body, as the custome then was, but boring holes in his feet, and thrust-
 40 ing leathern thongs into them, tyed him to his Chariot, and dragging him shamefully about the field, selling the dead body to his father Priamus for a very great ranfome. But his cruelty and covetousness were not long unrevenged; for he was shortly after slain with an arrow by Paris, as Homer sayes, in the Scæan Gate; or as others, in the Temple of Apollo, whither he came to have married Polyxena the daughter of Priamus, with whom he was too far in love, having slain so many of her brethren; and his body was ransomed (as Lycophron saith) at the self-same rate that Hector's was by him sold for. Not long after this, Penthesilea Queen of the Amazons arrived at Troy, who after some prooffe given of her valour, was slain by Pyrhus the son of Achilles.

(which followed the Poets) have delivered, it is uncertain. Some write that upon one of the gates of Troy, called Scaea, was the image of a horse, and that the Greeks entering by that gate, gave occasion to the report, that the Citie was taken by an artificial horse. It may well be that with some wooden engine, which they called a horse, they either did batter the walls, as the Romans in after-times used to do with the Ramme: or scaled the walls upon the sudden, and so took the Citie. As for the hiding of men in the hollow body of a wooden horse, it had been a desperate adventure, and serving to no purpose. For either the Trojans might have perceived the deceit, and slain all those Princes of Greece, that were inclosed in it (which also by such as maintain this report they are said to have thought upon:) or they might have left it a few dayes without the Citie (for it was unlikely, that they should the very first day both conclude upon the bringing it into the town, and break down their walls upon the sudden to doe it:) by which means they who were shut into it, must have perished for hunger, if they had not by issuing forth unseasonably discovered the invention. Whereas further it is said, that this horse was so high and great, that it could not be brought into the town through any of the gates, and that therefore the Trojans were faine to pull down a part of their wall to make way for it, through which breach the Greeks did afterwards enter, it is hereby manifest, that the inclosing of so many principall men was altogether needlesse, considering that without their help there was way sufficient for the armie, so that the surprising of any gate by them was now to no purpose.

John Baptista Gramay in his Historie of Asia, discoursing of this warre, saith that the Greeks did both batter the walls with a wooden engine, and were also let into the Citie by Antenor, at the Scaean gate: the townsmen sleeping, and drinking without fear or care, because the fleet of the Grecians had hoisted saile, and was gone the day before to the Ile of Tenedos, thereby to bring the Trojans into security. That the Citie was betrayed, the books of Dares and Dyctis must prove, which whether we now have the same that were by them written, it may be suspected; for surely they who have made mention of these writers in ancient times, would not, as they did, have followed the reports of Homer and others quite contradictorie in most points to these two authors, without once taking notice of the opposition, which they having served in that war made against the common report, had it not been that either those bookes were even in those times thought frivolous, or else contained no such repugnancie to the other Authours as now is found in them.

Also concerning the number of men slain in this warre, which Dares and Dyctis say to have been above 600000. on the Trojan side, and more than 800000. of the Greeks, it is a report meerly fabulous; for as much as the whole Fleet of the Greeks was reckoned by Homer, who extolled their armie and deeds as much as he could, to be somewhat lesse than 1200. saile, and the armie therein transported over the Greek seas, not much above 100000. men, according to the rate formerly mentioned. But it is the common fashion of men to extoll the deeds of their Ancients: for which cause both Homer magnified the Captains of the Greeks that served in the warre, and Virgil with others were as diligent in commending and extolling the Trojans and their Citie, from which the Romans descended. Yea, the Athenians long after in the warre which Xerxes the Persian King made against all Greece, did not forbear to vaunt of the great cunning which Mnestheus the son of Peteus had shewed in marshalling the Grecian army before Troy: whereupon, as if it had been a matter of much consequence, they were so proud, that they refused to yeeld unto Gelon King of almost all Sicily, the Admiralty of their Seas, notwithstanding that he promised to bring 200. good fighting ships, and 30000. men for their defence.

The like vanitie possessed many other Cities of Greece, and many Nations in these parts of the world, which have striven to bring their descent from some of the Princes that warred at Troy: all difficulties or unlikelihoods in such their Pedegree notwithstanding. But those Nations which indeed, or in most probability, came of the Trojans, were the Albanes in Italia; and from them the Romans, brought into that Countrey by Enemas: the Venetians first seated in Padua, and the Countrey adjoyning, by Antenor: the Chamians planted in Epirus by Helenus, the son of King Priamus. To which Hellenicus addeth, that the posteritie of Hector did assemble such of the Trojans as were left, and reigned over them about Troy.

Of the distresses and dispersions of the Greeks returning from Troy.

Concerning the Greeks, they tasted as much miserie as they had brought upon the Trojans. For Thucydides notes, that by reason of their long abode at the siege, they found many alterations when they returned: so that many were driven by their borderers from their ancient seats: many were expelled their Countries by faction: some were slain anon after their arrivall: others were debarred from the Sovereignty among the people, by such as had stayed at home. The cause of all which may seem to have been the dispersion of the Armie, which, weakned much by the calamities of that long warre, was of little force to repell injuries, being divided into so many pieces under severall Commanders, not very well agreeing. For (besides other quarrels arising upon the division of the bootie, and the like occasions) at the time when they should have set sail, Agamemnon and his brother fell out, the one being desirous to depart immediately, the other to stay and perform some sacrifices to Minerva. Hereupon they fell to hot words, half the fleet remaining with Agamemnon, the rest of them sailed to the Ile of Tenedos, where when they arrived, they could not agree among themselves, but some returned back to Agamemnon; others were dispersed, each holding his own course. But the whole fleet was sore vexed with tempests: for Pallas (as Homer saith) would not be perswaded in haste.

They who returned safe were Nestor, and Pyrrhus, whom Orestes afterwards slew: also Idomeneus and Philoctetes, who nevertheless, as Virgil tells, were driven soon after to seek new seats: Idomeneus among the Salentines, and Philoctetes at Petilia in Italie. Agamemnon likewise returned home, but was forthwith slain by his wife, and by the Adulterer Egyffus, who for a while after usurped his Kingdome. Menelaus wandring long upon the Seas, came into Egypt, either with Helen, or (as may rather seem) to fetch her. Ulysses, after ten years, having lost all his company, got home in poor estate, with much ado recovering the masterhip of his own house. All the rest either perished by the way, or were driven into exile, and fain to seek out new habitations.

Ajax the son of Oileus was drowned; Tencer fled into Cyprus; Diomedes to King Darus, who was Lord of the Fapiges in Apulia; some of the Locrians were driven into Africk, others into Italy, all the East part whereof was called Magna Gracia, by reason of so many towns which the Greeks were driven to erect upon that coast. Finally, it appears in Homer, that the Gracian Ladies, whose husbands had been at the war of Troy, were wont to call it, The place where the Greeks suffered miserie, and the unlucky Citie not to be mentioned. And thus much for Troy, and those that warred there: the overthrow of which City, as hath been said, happened in the time of Habdon Judge of Israel, whom Sampson, after a vacancie or Inter-regnum for certain years, succeeded.

Of Sampson.

THE birth and acts of Sampson are written at large in the 13. 14. 15. and 16. of Judges; and therefore I shall not need to make a repetition thereof. But these things I gather out of that Storie, First, that the Angel of God forbade the wife of Manoah the mother of Sampson, to drink Wine or strong drink, or to eat any unclean meat after shee was conceived with child; because those strong liquors hinder the strength, and as it were wither and shrink the child in the mothers wombe. Though this were even the counsell of God himself, and delivered by his Angell, yet it seemeth that many women of this age have not read, or at least will not believe this precept: the most part forbearing nor drinks, nor meats, how strong or unclean soever, filling themselves with all sorts of wines, and with artificial drinks far more forcible: by reason whereof, so many wretched feeble bodies are born into the world, and the races of the able and strong men in effect decayed.

Secondly, it is to be noted, that the Angel of God refused the sacrifice which Manaah would have offered him, commanding him to present it unto the Lord: and therefore those that profess divination by the help of Angels, to whom also they sacrifice, may assuredly know that they are devils who accept thereof, and not good Angels; who receive no worship that is proper to God.

10 Thirdly, this Sampson was twice betrayed by his wives, to wit, by their importunities and deceitful tears: by the first he lost but a part of his goods, by the second his life. Quem nulla vis superare potuit, voluptas evertit: Whom no force, could overcome, Lust overthrew.

Fourthly, we may note, that he did not in all deliver Israel from the oppression of the Philistines; though in some sort he revenged, and defended them: for notwithstanding that he had slain 30. of them in his first attempt, burnt their Corn in harvest time, and given them a great overthrow instantly upon it; yet so much did Israel fear the Philistines, as they assembled 3000. men out of Juda, to besiege Sampson, in the rock or mountain of Etam, using these words: Knowest not thou that the Philistines are rulers over us?

10 &c. After which they bound him, and delivered him unto the Philistines, for fear of their revenge; though he was no sooner loosened, but he gave them another overthrow, and slew 1000. with the jaw-bone of an Ass.

Lastly, being made blind, and a prisoner by the treason of his wife, he was content to end his own life, to be avenged of his enemies, when he pulled down the pillars of the house at the feast whereto they sent for Sampson, to deride him; till which time he bare his affliction with patience: but it was truly said of Seneca Patience sapientia sine veste in furoribus. Patience, often wounded is converted into furie. neither is it at any time so much wounded by pain and loss, as by derision and contumelies.

30 of Eli, and of the Ark taken; and of Dagons fall, and the sending back of the Ark.

THE STORIE of Eli the Priest, who succeeded Sampson, is written in the beginning of Samuel; who foretold him of the destruction of his house, for the wickedness of his sons, which he suppressed not; neither did he punish them according to their deserts: whose sins were horrible, both in abusing the sacrifice, and profaning and polluting the holy places: though Levi Ben Gerson, to extenuate this filthy offence of forcing the women by the sons of Eli, hath a contrary opinion. In this time therefore it pleased God to cast the Israelites under the swords of the Philistines; of whom there perished in the first encounter 4000. and in the second battell 30000. footmen; among whom the sons of Eli, being slain, their father (bearing the lamentable succession) by falling from his chair, brake his neck. He was the first that obtained the High-Priesthood of the stock of Itamar the son of Aaron, before whose time it continued successively in the race of Eleazar the eldest brother of Itamar: for Aaron was the first, Eleazar the second, Phinees the son of Eleazar the third, Ahimelech the son of Phinees the fourth, his son Bocai the fifth, Ozi the son of Bocai the sixth, and then Eli, as Josephus and Lyranus out of divers Hebrew Authors have conceived. In the race of Itamar, the Priesthood continued after Eli, to the time of Salomon, who cast out Abiathar, and established Sadok and Achimaas and their successors. The Ark of God which Israel brought into the field, 50 was in this battell taken by the Philistines. For as David witnesseth, God greatly abhorred Israel, so that he forsook the habitation of Shila: even the Tabernacle where he dwelt among men, and delivered his power into captivity, &c.

Now as it pleased God at this time, that the Ark whereby himself was represented should fall in the hands of the Heathen, for the offences of the Priests and people: so did he permit the Chaldeans to destroy the Temple built by Salomon; the Romans to overthrow the second Temple; and the Turks to overthrow the Christian Churches in Asia and Europe. And had not the Israelites put more confidence in the sacrament, answer of God, thus he spake: Come and let us go to the Seer: for hee that is now called a Prophet, was in old time called a Seer. And although it pleased God to appear by his Angels to Moses, as before to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, yet in the time of Eli, there was no manifest vision; not that God had altogether withdrawn his grace from Israel: but as the Chaldaean Paraphrast hath it, those revelations, before Samuel's time, were more clouded and obscure. The places wherein Samuel judged were Matspa or Milpa, seated on a hill in Benjamin neer Juda: also Gilgal and Bethel, of which we have spoken else-where.

* Plutarch reports of Numa the second King of Rome, that when as he was sacrificing, it was told him that the enemies approached, he nothing dismayed, answered, Ego autem sacrifico.
1 Sam. 2. 10.

The Philistims taking knowledge of the assembly and preparation of War at Matspa in the beginning of Samuel's government, gathered their Armie, and marched towards the Citie: at whose approach the Israelites stricken with fear, and with the memorie of their former slaughters and servitude, besought Samuel to pray to God for them: who was then performing his sacrifice when the Philistims were in view. But God being moved with Samuel's prayers (as he was by those of Moses, when Israel fought against the Amalekites at the first entrance into Arabia): it pleased him with thunder and tempest to disperse and beat down the Army of the Philistims, according to the prophetic of Hanna, Samuel's Mother, The Lords adversaries shall be destroyed, and out of Heaven shall he thunder upon them. Etc. Josephus affirms, that a part of the Philistims were swallowed with an earthquake: and that Samuel himself led the Israelites in the prosecution of their victory. After which Samuel erected a Monument in memorie of this happy success, obtained by the miraculous hand of God, which Josephus called Lapidem iustitiae: Samuel, Eben-ezer, or the stone of assistance: and then following the opportunity and advantage of the victory, the Israelites recovered divers Cities of their own formerly lost, and held long in the possession of the Philistims, who for a long time after did not offer any invasion or revenge. And the better to attend their purposes, and to withstand any of their attempts, the Israelites made peace with the Amorites, or Canaanites, which lay on their backs, and to the North of them, that they might not be assaulted from divers parts at once, having the Philistims towards the West and Sea-coast, the Canaanites toward the North and East, and the Idumites on the South. The estate being thus settled, Samuel for the ease of the people gave audience and judgement in divers places by turns, as hath been else-where said.

CHAP. XVI. OF SAMUEL.

Of the deliberation to change the government into a Kingdome.

BUT when age now began to over-take Samuel, and that hee was not able to undergoe the burthen of so carefull a government, hee put off from himself the weight of the affairs on his sons, Joel and Abiah, who judged the people at Beer-sheba, a Citie, the very utmost towards the South of Juda. And as the place was inconvenient and far away, so were themselves no lesse removed from the justice and verue of their Father: For the thirst of covetousnesse, the more it swalloweth, the more it drieth, and desireth, finding taste in nothing but gain, to recover which, they set the Law at a price, and sold Justice and Judgement to the best Chapmen. Which when the Elders of Israel observed, and saw that Samuel as a naturall man (though a Prophet) could not so well discern the errors of his own, they prayed him to consent to their change of government; and to make them a King, by whom they might be judged as other Nations were: who might also lead them to the War, and defend them against their enemies. For after the ill and lamentable success which followed the rule of Eli his sons, when those of Samuel by their first blossoms promised to yield fruit no lesse bitter, they saw no way to put the government from out his race, whom they so much revered, but by the choyce of a King.

In

In a cause of so great consequence and alteration, Samuel sought counsell from God: which surely hee did not for the establishing of his own Sonnes, who being as they were God would not have approved his election. Now as it appears by the Text, this speech or motion displeasing him, he used his best arguments to dehoit them: which when he perceived to be over-feeble, he delivered unto them from Gods revelation, the inconveniences and miseries which should befall them. And yet, all which he fore-shewed was not intolerable, but such as hath been born, and is so still, by free consent of the subiects towards their Princes. For first he makes them know that the King will use their sons in his own service to make them his Horse-men, Chariotters, and Foot-men, which is not onely not grievous, but by the Vassals of all Kings, according to their birth and condition, desired: it being very agreeable to subiects of the best qualitie to command for the King in his Warres, and to till the ground no lesse proper and appertaining to those that are thereto bred and brought up: so are likewise the offices of women-servants to dresse meat, to bake bread, and the like. But whereas immediately it is threatned, He will take your Fields and your Vineyards, and your best Olive trees, and give them to his servants, with other oppressions: this hath given, and gives daily occasion to such as would be ruled by their own discretion, to affirme that Samuel describeth here unto them the power of a King governed by his own affections, and not a King that feareth God. But others upon further examination, construe this Text farre otherwise, as teaching us what Subjects ought with patience to bear at their Sovereigns hand. The former opinion is grounded first upon that place of Deuteronomie, where God fore-sheweth this change of government from Judges to Kings: and after he had forbidden many things unto the Kings, as many wives, covetousnesse, and the like, he commandeth that the Kings which were to raige over Israel, should write the Law of Deuteronomie, or cause it to be written: and to shew how greatly the King should honour the Law, he addeth, It shall be with him, and he shall read therein all the dayes of his life, that he may learn to fear the Lord his God, and to keep all the words of this Law, and these ordinances for to doe them: that he may prolong his dayes in his Kingdome, he and his Sons. But to take away any other mans field, say they, is contrary to the Lawes of God, in the same book written. For it is said, That which is just and right shalt thou follow, that thou mayst live. Now if it be not permitted to carry away grapes more than thou canst eat out of another mans vineyard, but forbidden by God: it is much lesse lawfull to take the vineyard it self from the owner, and give it to another. Neither are the words of the Text (say they) such as do warrant the Kings of Israel, or make it proper unto them, to take at will any thing from their vassals. For it is not said that it shall be lawfull for the King, or the King may do this or that: but it is written, that the King will take your sonnes: and again, This shall be the manner of the King that shall raige over you. God thereby fore-shewing what power, severed from pietie (because it is accountable to God onely) will do in the future. And hereof we find the first example in Achab, who took from Naboth both his Vineyard and his life, contrary to the trust which God had put in him, of governing well his people. For God commanded, That his people should be judged with righteous judgement. Wherefore, though the King had offered unto Naboth composition, as a Vineyard of better value, or the worth in money, which he refused: yet because he was falsly accused, and unjustly condemned (though by colour of law,) how grievously Achab was punished by God, the Scriptures tell us. Neither was it a plea sufficient for Achab against the all-righteous God, to say that it was done without his consent, and by the Elders of Israel. For God had not then left his people to the Elders, but to the King, who is called a living Law, even as David testifieth of himself: Posuisti me in caput gentium: For this of S. Augustine is very true: Simulata innocentia, non est innocentia: simulata aequitas, non est aequitas: sed duplicatur peccatum in quo est iniquitas & simulatio. Feigned innocence, and feigned equity, are neither the one nor the other: but the fault or offence is there doubled, in which there is both iniquity & dissimulation. Such in effect is their disputation, who think this place to contain the description of a Tyrant. But the arguments on the contrary side, as they are many and forcible, so are they well known to all: being excellently handled in that Princely discourse of The true Law of free Monarchies: which Treatise I may not presume to abridge, much lesse here to insert. Only thus much I will say, That if practice doe shew the greatnesse of authoritie, even the best Kings of Juda and Israel were not so tyed by any lawes, but that they did whatsoever they pleased in the

the greatest things; and commanded some of their own Princes and of their own brethren to be slain without any trial of law, being sometime by Prophets reprehended, sometime not. For though David confessed his offence for the death of Uriah, yet Solomon killing his elder brother and others, the same was not imputed to him as any offence.

That the state of Israel should receive this change of government, it was not only foretold by Moses in Deuteronomie, but perceived by Jacob in this Scripture: The Scepter shall not depart from Juda, &c. It was also promised by God to Abraham for a blessing: For it was not only assured that his issues should in number equal the stars in heaven, but that Kings should proceed of him: Which state seeing it is framed from the pattern of his sole rule, who is Lord of the Universall, and the excellencie thereof in respect of all other governments, hath been by many judicious men handled and proved, I shall not need to over-paint that which is garnished with better colours already, than I can lay on.

In the time of the Judges every man hath observed what civill war Israel had: what outrageous slaughters they committed upon each other: in what miserable servitude they lived for many years: and when it fared best with them, they did but defend their own territories, or recover some parts thereof formerly lost. The Canaanites dwelt in the best vallies of the Countrie. The Ammonites held much of Gilead over Jordan; the Philistines the Sea-coasts, and the Febusites Hierusalem it self, till David's time: all which that King did not only conquer and establish, but hee mastered and subjected all the neighbour Nations and Kings, and made them his tributaries and vassals. But whether it were for that the Israelites were moved by those reasons, which allure the most of all Nations to live under a Monarch, or whether by this means they sought to be cleared from the sonns of Samuel, they became deafe to all the perswasions and threats which Samuel used, insisting upon this point, that they would have a King, both to judge them and defend them: whereunto when Samuel had warrant from God to consent, he sent every man to his own Citie and abiding,

Of the election of Saul.

After that Samuel had dismissed the assembly at Mizpah, he forbore the election of a King, till such time as hee was therein directed by God: who foretold him the day before, that he would present unto him a man of the Land of Benjamin, whom he commanded Samuel to anoint. So Samuel went unto Ramath Saphim, to make a feast for the entertainment of Saul (whom yet he knew not, but knew the truth of Gods promises) and Saul also having wandred divers dayes to seek his fathers Asses, at length, by the advice of his servant, travelled towards Ramath to find a Seer or prophet, hoping from him to be told what way to take, to find his beasts. In which journey he pleased God (who doth many times order the greatest things by the simplest passages and persons) to elect Saul, who sought an Ass and not a kingdom: like as formerly it had pleased him to call Moses, while he fed the sheep of Jethro; and after to make choice of David the youngest of eight sons, and by the Scriptures called a little one, who was then keeping of beasts; and changed his sheep-hook into a Scepter, making him of all other the most victorious King of Juda and Israel. So Fohn and James were taken from casting their nets, to become fishers of men, and honoured with the titles of Apostles: a dignitie that died not in the grave, as all worldly Honours doe, but permanent and everlasting in Gods everlasting kingdome.

When Samuel was entred into Ramath, hee prepared a banquet for the King, whom so he expected, and stayed his arrivall at the gate. Not long after came Saul, whom God shewed to Samuel, and made him know that it was the same whom hee had foretold him of, that he should rule the people of God. Saul finding Samuel in the gate, but knowing him not, though a Prophet and Judge of Israel, much lesse knowing the Honour which attended him, asked Samuel in what part of the Citie the Seer dwelt; Samuel answered, that himselfe was the man hee sought, and prayed Saul to goe before him to the high place, where Samuel setting him according to his degree, above all that were invited, conferred with him afterwards of the affaires of the kingdome, and of God Gods graces to be bestowed on him, and the morning following annointed him King of Israel.

After this he told him all that should happen him in the way homeward, that two men should encounter him by Rabels Sepulchre; who should tell him that his Asses were found, and that his Fathers cares were changed from the fear of losing his beasts; to doubt the loss of his son: that he should then meet three other men in the plain of Tabor; then a companie of Prophets: and that he should be partaker of Gods Spirit, and prophetic with them: and that thereby his condition and disposition should be changed from the vulgar, into that which became a King elected and favoured by God.

But the Prophets here spoken of, men indued with spirituall gifts, were not of the first and most revered number, who by divine revelation foretold things to come, reprehended without fear the errors of their Kings, and wrought miracles, of which number were Moses, Johua, Samuel, and after them Gad, Nathan, Ahiah, Eliab, Elisai, Esay, Jeremy, and the rest; for these Prophets, saith S. Chrysostome, Omnia tempora percurrunt, praterita, presentia, & futura: but they were of those of whom S. Paul speaketh 1 Cor. 14. 14. who enriched with spirituall gifts, expounded the Scriptures and the Law.

At Mizpah Samuel assembled the people, that he might present Saul to them, who as yet knew nothing of his election: neither did Saul acquaint his own Uncle therewith, when he asked him what had past between him and Samuel: for either he thought his estate not yet assured, or else that it might be dangerous for him to reveale it, till he were confirmed by generall consent. When the Tribes were assembled at Mizpah, the generall opinion is, that he was chosen by lot. Chimhi thinks by the answer of * Urim and * Thummim: that is, by the answer of the Priest, wearing that mysterie upon his breast when he asked counsell of the Lord. But the casting of lots was not only much used among the Jewes, but by many others, if not by all nations. The Land of promise was divided by lot: God commanded lots to be cast on the two Goats, which should be sacrificed, and which turned off a figure of Christs suffering, and our deliverance, for whose garments the Jewes also cast lots. Cicero, Plantus, Pausanias, and others, have remembered divers sorts of lots, used by the Romans, Grecians, and other Nations: as in the division of grounds or honours; and in things to be undertaken: the two first kinds were called Divisorie, the Third, Divinatorie; and unto one of these three all may be reduced: all which kinds, howsoever they may seem chancefull, are yet ordered & directed by God: as in the Proverbs: the lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition is of the Lord. And in like sort fell the kingdome of Israel on Saul, not by chance, but by Gods ordinance, who gave Samuel former knowledge of his election: from which election Saul withdrew himself in modestie, as both Josephus construe it, and as it may be gathered by his former answers to Samuel, when he acknowledged himselfe the least of the least Tribe. But Samuel enlightened by God, found where Saul was hidden, and brought him among the people, and he was taller than all the rest by the shoulders. And Samuel made them know that he was the chosen king of Israel, whereupon all the multitude saluted him King, and prayed for him; yet some there were that envied his glory (as in all estates there are such) who did not acknowledge him by offering him presents, as the manner was: of whom Saul, to avoyd sedition, took no notice.

S. III.

Of the establishing of Saul by his first victorie.

NO sooner was Saul placed in the kingdome, but that he received knowledge that Nahas King of the Ammonites prepared to besiege Fabes Gilead: which nation since the great overthrow given them by Jephtha, never durst attempt any thing upon the Israelites, till the beginning of Saul his rule. And although the Ammonites did alwayes attend upon the advantage of time, to recover those Territories which first the Amorites, and then Israel dispossessed them of; which they made the ground of their invasion in Jephtha's time; yet they never perswaded themselves of more advantage than at this present. For first, they knew that there were many of the Israelites that did not willingly submit themselves to this new King: secondly, they were remembred that the Philistines had not long before slain 34000. of their men of War: and besides that used great care and policie that they should have no Smithes to make them swords or spears: neither was it long before, that of the Bethshemites, and places adjoining there perished by the hand of God more than 50000, and therefore in these respects, even occasion it self invited them to enlarge their Dominions upon their borders: Jabes Gilead being one of the nearest. Besides, it may further be conjectured, that the Ammonites were emboldened against Jabes Gilead, in respect of their weaknesse: since the Israelites destroyed a great part of them, for not joyning with them against the Benjamites: at which time they did not only slaughter the men and male children, but took from them their young women, and gave them to the Benjamites: and therefore they were not likely to have been increased to any great numbers: and if they had recovered themselves of this great calamitie, yet the Ammonite might flatter himself with the opinion, that Israel, having for long time been disarmed by the Philistims, was not apt to succour those whom they had so deeply wounded and destroyed. But contrariwise, when the tidings came to Saul of their danger, and that the Ammonites would give them no other condition to ransom themselves, but by pulling out their right eyes, by which they should be utterly disabled for the Warre, as elsewhere hath been spoken: Saul, both to value himself in his first years reign, and because perchance he was descended of one of those 400. Maids taken from the Gileadites, and given to the Benjamites, gave order to assemble the forces of Israel, hewing a yoke of Oxen into pieces, and sending them by messengers over all the coasts, protesting thus: That whosoever came not forth after Saul, and after Samuel, should his Oxen be served: threatening the people by their goods, and not by their lives at the first. Seven dayes had Saul to assemble an Armie, by reason that the Gileadites had obtained the respite of these seven dayes to give Nahab the Ammonite an answer: who could they have obtained any reasonable condition, were contented to have severed themselves from Israel, and to become Vassals and Tributaries to the Heathen. In the mean while Saul assembled the forces which repaired unto him at Bezer, near Jordan, that he might readily passe the river, which done, he might in one day with a speedie march arrive at Jabes, under the Hills of Gilead.

1 Sam. 11. 8.

The Armie by Saul led, consisting of three hundred and thirty thousand, he returned an answer to those of Jabes, that they should assure themselves of succour by the next day at noon. For as it seemeth, Saul marched away in the latter part of the day, & went on all night; for in the morning watch he surprized the armie of Nahab the Ammonite. And to the end that he might set on them on all sides, he divided his forces into three parts, putting them to the sword until the heat of the day, and the wearinesse of Sauls troop enforced them to give over the pursuit. Now the Ammonites were become the more carelesse and secure, in that those of Jabes promised the next morning to render themselves and their Citie to their mercie. After this happy successe, the people were so far in love with their new King, that they would have slain all those Israelites that murmured against his election, had not himselfe forbidden and resisted their resolutions. Such is the condition of worldly men, as they are violent lovers of the prosperous, and base Vassals of the time that flourisheth; and as despitfull and cruell without cause against those, whom any misadventure, or other worldly accident hath thrown down.

1 Sam. 12.

After the Army removed, Samuel summoned the people to meet at Gilgal, where Saul was now a third time acknowledged, and as some Commenters affirm, anointed King: and here Samuel used an exhortation to all the Assembly, containing precepts, and a rehearsal of his own Justice, during the beginning of his government to that day. After Saul had now reigned one year before he was established in Gilgal, or Galgala, he strengthened himselfe with a good guard of 3000. chosen men, of which he assigned 1000. to attend on Jonathan his son at Gibeah, the Citie of his nativitie: the rest he kept about his own person in Mizmas, and in the Hill of Bethel.

§. IIII.

Of Sauls disobedience in his proceedings in the Warres with the Philistims and Amalekites, which caused his finall rejection.

Jonathan with his small Armie or Regiment that attended him, taking a time of advantage, surprized a Garrison of Philistims: the same, as some think, which Saul past by, when he came from Ramath, when he was first annoiared by Samuel, which which they think to have been Cariath-jearim: because a place where the Philistims had a Garrison, 1 Sam. 10. is called the hill of God, which they understand of Cariath-jearim: but Junius understands this Garrison to have been at Gebah in Benjamin near Gibba, where Jonathan abode with his thousand followers. Howsoever, by this it appeareth that the Philistims held some strong places, both in the times of Samuel, and of Saul, within the Territorie of Israel: and now being greatly enraged by this surprize, they assembled thirty thousand armed Chariots, and six thousand Horse; wherewith they invaded Judea, and incamped at Machmas or Michmas, a Citie of Benjamin, in the direct way from Samaria to Hierusalem, and in the middest of the Land between the Sea and Jordan. With this sudden invasion the Israelites were stricken in so great a fear, as some of them hid themselves in the caves of the mountains; others fled over Jordan into Gad and Gilead: Saul himself with some 2000. men of ordinarie, and many other people, laid at Galgala in Benjamin, not far from the passage of Joshua when he led Israel over Jordan. Here Saul by Samuels appointment was to attend the coming of Samuel seven dayes: but when the last day was in part spent, and that Saul perceived his forces to diminish greatly, he presumed (as some expound the place, 1 Sam. 13. 9.) to exercise the office which appertained not unto him, and to offer a burnt offering, and a peace offering unto God, contrary to the Ecclesiasticall Lawes of the Hebrews, and Gods Commandements: others expound the word, obtulit, in this place, by obtulit per Sacerdotes, and so make the sin of Saul not to have been any intrusion into the Priests office, but first a disobedience to Gods Commandement, in not staying according to the appointment, 1 Sam. 10. 8. secondly, a diffidence or mistrust in Gods help, and too great relying upon the strength of the people, whose departing from him he could not bear patiently; and lastly, a Contempt of the holy Prophet Samuel, and of the help which the prayers of so godly a man might procure him. But whatsoever was his sin, notwithstanding his excuses, he was by Samuel reprehended most sharply, in termes unfitting his estate, had not extraordinary warrant been given to Samuel to do so, from God himself; at which time also Samuel feared not to let him know, that the Kingdome should be conferred to another (a man after Gods own heart) both from Saul and his posteritie.

After this, Samuel and Saul returned to Gibeah, where Saul, when he had taken view of his armie, found it to consist of 600. men: for the most were fled from him and scattered, yea and among those that staid, there was not any that had either sword or spear, but Saul and his son Jonathan onely. For the Philistims had not left them any Smith in all Israel, that made weapons; besides, they that came to Saul, came hastily, and left such weapons and armour as they had behind them in their garrisons: for if they had had none at all, it might be much doubted how Saul should be able the year before, or in some part of this very year, to succour Jabes Gilead with 300. and thirty thousand men, if there had not now been any iron weapon to defend themselves withall, save onely in the hand of Saul and Jonathan his son. But howsoever, all the rest of the people were formerly disarmed by the Philistims, and all those crafts-men carried out of the land that made weapons: there being left unto the Israelites only files to sharpen and amend such stuffe as served for the Plough, and for nought else; yet that they had some kind of armes, it is manifest, or else they durst not have attempted upon the Philistims as they did. And it is not said in the Text that there was not any sword in all Israel, but onely that there was not any found amongst those 600. souldiers which stayed with Saul after Samuels departure: and it seemeth that when Samuel had sharply reprehended Saul, that his own guards forsook him, having but 600. remaining of his 3000. ordinarie souldiers, and of all the rest that repaired unto him, of which many so were fled from him before Samuel arrived.

With this small troop he held himself to his own city of Gibeah, as a place of more strength, & better assured unto him, than Gilgal was. Neither is it obscure how it should come to passe that the Philistims should thus disarm the most part of the Israelites, howsoever in the time of Samuel much had been done against them. For the victories of Samuel were not got by sword or spear, but by thunder from Heaven: and when these crafts-men were once rooted out of the Cities of Israel, no marvell if they could not in a short peace under Samuel be replanted again. For this tyrannie of the Philistims is to be understood, rather of the precedent times, than under Samuel: and yet under him him is to be thought that by their crafts they proceeded in the policy, not suffering their Artificers to teach the Israelites, and so even to the times of Saul kept them from having any store of armour. The same policy did Nabuchodonosor use after his Conquest in Judea: Dionysius in Sicily, and many other Princes else where in all ages. But these lost weapons in part the Israelites might repair in Gilead, for over Jordan the Philistims had not invaded. The rest of their defences were such as antiquity used, and their present necessity ministered unto them; to wit, clubs, bowes, and slings. For the Benjamites excelled in casting stones in slings: and that these were the naturall weapons, and the first of all nations, it is manifest; and so in the first of Chronicles the 12. Chapter it is written of those that came to succour David against Saul, while he lurked at Siklag, That they were 10 armed with bowes, and could use the right and the left hand with stones; and with a sling it was that David himself slew the Gyant Goliath.

While the State of Israel stood in these hard termes, the Philistims having parted their army into three troops, that they might spoil and destroy many parts at once; Jonathan, strengthened by God, and followed with his Esquire onely, scaled a mountain, whereon a company of Philistims were lodged: the rest of their army (as may be gathered by the successe) being incamped in the plain adjoining. And though he were discovered before he came to the hill top, and in a kind of derision, called up by his enemies: yet he so behaved himself, as with the assistance of God he slew 20. of the first Philistims that he encountered. Whereupon the next companies taking the alarm, and being ignorant of the cause, fled away amazed altogether. In which confusion, fear, and jealousy, they slaughtered one another in stead of enemies: whereupon those Hebrews which became of their party, because they feared to be spoiled by them, took the advantage of their destruction, and slew of them in great numbers. And lastly, Saul himself taking knowledge of the rout and disorder, together with those Israelites that shrouded themselves in mount Ephraim, set upon them, and obtained (contrary to all hope and expectation) a most happy and glorious victory over them. Here was that prophetic in Deuteronomie fulfilled by Jonathan, That one of those which feared God, should kill a thousand, and one of them ten thousand.

This done, the small army of Israel made retreat from the pursuit. And although Saul had bound the people by an oath not to take food til the evening, yet his son Jonathan, being infeebled with extreme labour and emptiness, tasted a drop of honey in his passage: for which Saul his father would have put him to death, had not the people delivered him from his cruelty.

The late miraculous victorie of Saul and Jonathan, seems to have reduced unto the Philistims remembrance their former overthrow, likewise miraculous in the dayes of Samuel; so that for some space of time they held themselves quiet. In the mean while Saul being now greatly encouraged, undertook by turns all his bordering enemies; namely, the Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, and the Arabians of Zobab, against all which he prevailed. He then assembled all the forces he could make, to wit, 210000. men, and receiving the commandement of God by Samuel, he invaded Amalec, wasting and destroying all that part of Arabia Petraea, and the Desert belonging to the Amalekites, from Havilah towards Tigris unto Shur, which bordereth Egypt; in which warre hee took Agag their King prisoner. But whereas he was instructed by Samuel to follow this Nation without compassion, because they first of all attempted Israel, when they left Egypt in Moses time: he notwithstanding did not only spare the life of Agag, but reserved the best of the beasts and spoil of the Countrey, with pretence to offer them in sacrifice to the living God. Therefore did Samuel now a second time make him know that God would cast him from his royall estate, to which he was raised when he was of base condition, and as the Text hath it, little in his own eyes. And though the offence was great in Saul for not obeying the voyce of God by Samuel, had there been no former precept to that effect: yet seeing Saul could not be ignorant how severely it pleased God to enjoyn the Israelites to revenge themselves upon that Nation, he was in all unexcusable. For God had commanded that the Israelites should put out the remembrance of Amalec from under heaven. For the cruelty which the predecessors of this Agag used against the Israelites, especially on those which were over-wearied, faint, sick, and aged people; was now to be revenged on him, and his Nation, above 400. years afterward; and now hee was to pay the debt of blood, which his forefathers borrowed from the

the innocent: himself having also sinned in the same kind; as these words of Samuel witness: As thy sword hath made other women childlesse, so shall thy mother be childlesse among other women; at which time Samuel himself (after he had been by many bootlesse intreaties perswaded to stay a while with Saul) did cut Agag in pieces before the Lord in Gilgal, and soon after he departed to Ramath, and came no more to see Saul untill the day of his death.

Of the occurrents between the rejection of Saul and his death.

Now while Samuel mourned for Saul, God commanded him to choose a King for Israel, among the sons of Israhel: which Samuel (doubting the violent hand of Saul) feared in a sort to perform, till it pleased God to direct him, how hee might avoid both the suspicion, and the danger. And if Samuel knew that it was no way derogating from the providence of God, that by his cautious care and wisdom hee sought to avoid the inconveniences or dangers of this life: then do these men mistake the nature of his divine ordinance, who neglecting the reason that God hath given them, do no otherwise avoid the perills and dangers thereof, than as men stupefied in the opinion of fate or destinie, neglecting either to beg counsell at Gods hands by prayer, or to exercise that wisdom or foresight, wherewith God hath enriched the mind of man for his preservation. Neither did the all-powerfull God (who made and could destroy the world in an instant) disdain here to instruct Samuel, to avoid the fury of Saul, by the accustomed cautious waies of the world.

Of the sons of Israhel, Samuel, by God directed, made choice of David, the youngest, having refused Eliah, the first born: who though he were a man of a comely person and great strength; yet unto such outward appearance, the Lord had no respect. For as it is written, God seeth not as man seeth, etc. but the Lord beholdeth the heart. He also refusing the other six brethren, made choice of one whom his father had altogether neglected, and left in the field to attend his flock; for of him the Lord said to Samuel, Arise, and anoint him, for this is he: which done, Samuel departed and went to Ramath. Neither was it long after this that Saul began to seek the life of David: in which bloody mind, hee continued till he died, overcome in battell by the Philistims.

The Philistims having well-considered (as it seems) the increase of Saul his power through many victories by him obtained, whilst they had sitten still and forbore to give impediment to his prosperous courses, thought it good to make new tryall of their fortune, as justly fearing that the wrongs, which they had done to Israel, might be repaid with advantage, if ever opportunity should serve their often injured neighbours against them, as lately it had done against Moab, Ammon, and the rest of their ancient enemies. Now for the qualitie of their Souldiers, and all warlike provisions, the Philistims had reason to think themselves equall, if not superiour to Israel. The successe of their former wars had for the most part been agreeable to their own wishes: as for late disasters, they might, according to humane wisdom, impute them to second causes; as to a tempest happening by chance, and to a mistaken alarm, whereby their Armie, possessed with heedlesse fear, had fallen to rout. Having therefore mustered their forces, and taken the field, encamping to neere to the Armie which King Saul drew forth against them, that they could not easily depart without the trial of a battell, each part kept their ground of advantage for a while, not joyning in grosse, but maintaining some skirmishes, as refusing both of them to passe the Valley that lay between their Camps. Just causes of fear they had on both sides; especially the Philistims, whose late attempts had bin confounded by the angry hand of God. Upon this occasion perhaps it was, that they sought to decide the matter by single combat, as willing to try in one mans person, whether any stroke from heaven were to be feared. Goliath of Gath, a strong Giant, fearing neither God nor Man, undertook to defie the whole Hosts of Israel, provoking them with despightfull words, to appoint a Champion that might fight with him hand to hand: offering condition, that the partie vanquished in Champion, should hold it self as overcome in grosse, and become vassall unto the other. This gave occasion to David, whom Samuel, by Gods appointment had anointed, to make a favourable entrance into publique notice of the people. For no man durst expose himselfe to encounter the great strength of Goliath, untill David sent by his father of an errand to the Camp) accepted the combat, and obtained the victorie, without other arms, offensive or defensive, than a sling, wherewith he overthrew that haughty Gyant, and after with his own sword strook off his head. Hereupon the Philistims, who should have yielded themselves as subjects to the Conquerour, according to the covenant on their own side propounded, fled without stay, and were pursued and slaughtered even to their own gates. By this victory the Philistims were not so broken, that either any of their Towns were lost, or their people discouraged from infesting the Territories of Israel. But David, by whom God had wrought this victorie, fell into the grievous indignation of his Master Saul, through the honour purchased by his well-deserving. For after such time as the spirit of God departed from Saul, and came upon David, hee then became a cruell Tyrant, faithlesse, and irreligions. Because the high Priest Abimelech fed David in his necessitie with hallowed bread, and armed him with a sword of his own conquest, taken from Goliath; Saul not only by his wicked Edomite Doeg murdered this Abimelech and 85. Priests of Nob, but also he destroyed the Citie, and smote with the edge of the sword both man and woman, both child and suckling, both Ox and Ass, and sheep. And he that had compassion on Agag the Amalekite, who was an enemy to God and his people, and also spared and preserved the best of his Cattell, contrary to the Commandement and Ordinance of God, both by Moses and Samuel, had not now any mercy in store for the innocent, for the Lords servants, the Priests of Israel. Yea, hee would have slain his own son Jonathan, for pitying and pleading David's innocencie; as also once before for tasting the honey, when his fainting for hunger made him forget his fathers unreasonable commination. The companions of cruelty are breach of faith towards men, and impiety towards God. The former hee shewed in denying David his daughter, whom he had promised him; and again in taking her away from him to whom he had given her: also in that when as David had twice spared his life in the Territory of Ziph, and Saul twice sworn to do him no hurt, and confessed his errors, yet he sought still to destroy him, by all the means he could. His impiety towards God he shewed, in that he sought counsell of the Witch of Endor, which wasthe last preparative for his destruction. For whereas when he sought counsell from God, he had bin alwaies victorious from the Oracle of the Devil this successe followed, that both himself, and his three sons, with his nearest and faithful servants, were all slaughtered by the Philistims: his body with the bodies of his sons (as a spectacle of shame and dishonour) were hung over the walls of Bethsan; and there had remained till they had found buriall in the bowels of ravenous birds, had not the gratefull Gileadites of Fabas stolne their carcasses thence, and interred them. This was the end of Saul, after he had governed Israel, together with Samuel, 40. years, and by himself after Samuel 20. years, according to Gedrenus, Theophilus and Iosephus. But yet it seemeth to me, that after the death of Samuel, Saul did not rule very long: For in the beginning of the 25. chapter, it is written, that Samuel died; and in the rest of the same chapter the passages are written of David, 40. Nabul, and Abigail, after which the death of Saul quickly ensued.

An exceeding valliant man he was, and gave a fair entrance to all those victories which David afterward obtained: for he had beaten the Ammonites with their neighbouring Nations; crushed the Syrians, and their adherents; broken the strength of the Amalekites; and greatly wasted the power and pride of the Philistims.

Of such as lived with Samuel and Saul; of Hellen, and Hercules, and of their issues: upon occasion of the Dores, with the Heraclidae, entering Peloponnesus about this time.

IN the second year of Samuel, according to Ensebius, was David born: after Cadmonian, later, and in the ninth year: after Bunting in the tenth. For David, when hee was thirtie years old when hee began to reigne: whence it followeth, that hee was born in the tenth of the fortie years, which are given to Samuel and Saul. About the eleventh year of Samuel, Aeneas Silvius the son of Posthumus began his reign over the Latines in Alba, who governed that State one and thirtie years. There are who place before him Latinus Silvius, as brother to Posthumus, calling him the fifth from from Aeneas, and fourth King of Alba, whereof I will not stand to dispute. In the eleventh of Samuel, Dercilus sat in the Throne of Assyria, being the one and thirtieth King; he ruled that Empire forty years. In this age of Samuel the Dores obtained Peloponnesus, and at once with the Heraclidae, who then led and commanded the Nation, possessed a great part thereof, 328. years before the first Olympiad, according to Diodorus and Erasisthenes. For all Greece was anciently possessed by three Tribes or Kindreds, viz. the Ionians, Dorians, and Aeolians: at length it was called Hellas, and the people Hellenes, of Hellen the son of Deucalion, Lord of the Countrey of Pehiotia in Thessaly. But before the time of this Hellen, yea, and long after, Greece had no name common to all the Inhabitants, neither were the people called Hellenes, till such time as partly by trading in all parts of the Land, partly by the Plantation of many Colonies, and sundry great victories obtained, the issues of Hellen had reduced much of the Countrey under their obedience, calling themselves generally by one name, and yet every severall Nation after some one of the posteritie of Hellen, who had reigned over it. And because this is the farthest antiquitie of Greece, it will not be amisse to recount the Pedegree of her first planters.

Iapetus (as the poets fable) was the son of Heaven and Earth, so accounted, either because the names of his Parents had in the Greek tongue such signification: or perhaps for his knowledge in Astronomie and Philosophie.

Iapetus begat Prometheus, and Ephimetheus: of whom all men have read that have read Poets. Prometheus begat Deucalion; and Epimetheus, Pyrria, Deucalion and his wife Pyrria reigned in Thessalie, which was then called Pyrria (as Cretensis Abianus affirmeth) of Pyrria the Queen. In Deucalions time was that great flood, of which wee have spoken else-where. Deucalion begat Hellen: whose sons were Xuthus, Dorus, and Aeolus: of Dorus and Aeolus, the Dores and Aeolians had name. The Aeoles inhabited Beotia. The Dores having first inhabited sundry parts of Thessaly, did afterward seat themselves about Parnassus, and finally became Lords of the Countreys about Lakedaemon: Xuthus the eldest son of Hellen, being banished by his brethren, for having divorced from them to his own use some part of their Fathers goods, came to Athens: where marrying the Daughter of King Erichtheus, he begat on her two sons, Achaeus and Ion. Of these two, Achaeus, for a slaughter by him committed, fled into Peloponnesus: and seating himself in Laconia, gave name to that region: from whence (as some write) he afterwards departed; and levying an Armie, recovered the Kingdome of his Grandfather in Thessalie.

Ion being General for the Athenians when Eumolpus the Thracian invaded Attica, did obtain a great victorie, and thereby such love and honour of the people, that they committed the ordering of their State into his hands. Hee divided the Citizens into Tribes, appointing every one to some occupation, or good course of life. When the people multiplied, he planted Colonies in Sycionia, then called Egialos or Egialia: In which Countrey Solinus then reigning, thought it safer to give his Daughter Helice in marriage to Ion, and make him his Heir, than to contend with him. So Ion married Helice, and built a Town called by his Wives name in Egialia, where he and his posterity reigned long, and (though not obliterating the old name) gave to that Land denomination. But in after-times the Dores assisting the Nephewes of Hercules, invaded Peloponnesus, and overcoming the Acheans, possessed Laconia, and all those parts which the Achei had formerly occupied. Hereupon the Achei driven to seek a new seat, came unto the Ionies, desiring to inhabit Egialia with them, and alleged in vain, that Ion and Achaeus had been brethren. When this request could not be obtained, they fought by force to expell the Ionians, which they performed; but they lost their King Tisamenus, the son of Orestes, in that War.

Thus were the Ionies driven out of Peloponnesus, and compelled to remove into Attica, from whence after a while they sailed into Asia, and peopled the Western coast thereof; on which they built twelve Cities, inhabited by them, even to this day, at the least without any universall or memorable transmigration. This expedition of the Ionies into Asia hath been mentioned of all which have written of that Age, and is commonly placed 140. years after the warre of Troy, and 60. years after the descent of the Heraclidae into Peloponnesus. These Heraclidae were they of whom the Kings of Sparta issued; which race held that Kingdome about 700. years. Of their Father

Hercules many strange things are delivered unto us by the Poets, of which some are like to have been true, others perhaps must be allegorically understood. But the most approved Writers think that there were many called Hercules, all whose exploits were by the Greeks ascribed to the son of Alcmena, who is said to have performed these 12. great labours.

First, he slew the Nemean Lyon: secondly, he slew the serpent Hydra, which had nine heads, whereof one being cut off, two grew in the place: the third was the overtaking a very swift Hart: the fourth was the taking of a wild Bore alive, which haunted mount Erymanthus in Arcadia: the fifth was the cleansing of Augias his Oxe-stall in one day, which he performed by turning the River Alpheus into it: the sixth was the chasing away of the Birds from the Lake Stymphalis: the seventh was the fetching a Bull from Crete: the eighth was the taking of the Mares which Diomedes King of Thrace fed with humane flesh: the ninth was to fetch a Girdle of the Queen of the Amazons: the three last were, to fetch Gerions Beeves from Gades; the golden Apples of the Hesperides; and Cerberus from Hell. The Mythological interpretation of these I purposely omit, as both over-long to be here set down, and no lesse perplexed than the labours themselves. For some by Hercules understand Fortitude, Prudence, and Constancy, interpreting the Monsters, Vices. Others make Hercules the Sun, and his travells to be the twelve signes of the Zodiac. There are others who apply his works historically to their own conceits; as well assured, that the exposition cannot have more unlikelihood, than the fables. That he took Elis, Pylus, Orthalia, and other towns, being assisted by such as either admired his virtues, or were beholding unto him; Also that he slew many Theeves and Tyrants, I take to be truly written, without addition of Poetical vanitie. His travells through most part of the world, are, or may seem, borrowed from Hercules Libyans: But sure it is that many Cities of Greece were greatly bound to him: for that hee (bending all his indeavours to the common good) delivered the Land from much oppression: But after his death, no City of Greece (Athens excepted) requited the virtue and deserts of Hercules, with constant protection of his Children, persecuted by the King Eurystheus. This Eurystheus was Sonne of Stenelus, and grand-child of Perseus; he reigned in Mycene, the mightiest City then in Greece. He so it was that imposed those hard tasks upon Hercules, who was bound to obey him (as Poets report) for expiation of that Murder, which in his madnesse he had committed upon his own children; but as others say, because he was his Subject and Servant: wherefore there are who commend Eurystheus for employing the strength of Hercules to so good a purpose. But it is so generally agreed by the best Writers, that Hercules was also of the stock of Perseus, and holden in great jealousie by Eurystheus because of his virtue, which appeared more and more in the dangerous services, wherein hee was employed, so that he grew great in reputation and power through all Greece; and had by many Wives and Concubines above three-score Children. These Children Eurystheus would faine have got into his power, when Hercules was dead: but they fled unto Ceyx King of Thracina, and from him (for he durst not withstand Eurystheus) to Athens. The Athenians not onely gave them entertainment, but lent them aid, wherewith they encountered Eurystheus, Iolaus the brothers son of Hercules, who had assisted him in many of his travels, was captain of the Heraclide. It is said of him, that being dead he obtained leave of Pluto to live again till he might revenge the injuries done by Eurystheus: whom when he had slain in battell, hee died again. It seems to me, that whereas hee had led Colonies into Sicily, and abode there a long time forgotten: he came again into Greece to assist his cousins, and afterwards returned back. When the Peloponnesians understood that Eurystheus was slain, they took Atræus the Sonne of Pelops to their King: for hee was rich, mighty, and favoured of the People. Against him the Heraclide marched under Hyllus, the sonne of Hercules. But to avoid effusion of blood, it was agreed, that Hyllus should fight with Echeneus King of the Tegeate, a people of Arcadia, who assisted Atræus, with condition, that if Hyllus were victor, he should peaceably enjoy what he challenged as his right: otherwise the Heraclide should not enter Peloponnesus in an hundred years. In that combat Hyllus was slain, and the Heraclide compelled to forbeare their Country, till the third generation: at which time they returned under Aristodemus (as the best authority doth shew, though some have said, that they came under the conduct of his children) and brought with them the Doræ, whom whom they planted in that Countrey, as is before shewed, having expelled the Achai, over whom the issue of Pelops had reigned after the death of Eurystheus four generations.

of Homer and Hesiod, and many changes in the world, that happened about this age.

About this time that excellent learned Poet Homer lived, as many of the best Chronologers affirm. He was by race of the Mæones, descended (as Functius imagineth) of Berosus his Anamæon, who gave name to that people. But this Functius imagineth Homer the Poet to have been long after these times, fahly framing his Aræa according to Archilochus in the tract, or rather fragment de temporibus; and makes seven more of this name to have flourished in divers Cities in Greece. Whence, perhaps, sprang the diversitie of opinions, both of the time, and of the native Citie of Homer. According to this Archilochus, Functius finds Homer about the time of Manasse King of Juda, and Numa of Rome. He was called Mesigeus from the place of his birth, and at length Homer; because blind men follow a guide, which signification among others, is in the verbe homer: for this Homer in his later time was blind. * Clemens Alexandrinus recites many different opinions touching the question of the time when Homer lived. So also Aulus Gellius, and Tatianus Assyrius in his Oration ad gentes. Paterculus reckons that Homer flourished 350. years before the Consulship of Marcus Vinicius: which Mercator casteth up in the worlds year 3046. and after Troy taken, about 260. years: and about 250. years before the building of Rome; making him to have flourished about the time of Jehosaphat King of Juda. But Clemens Alexandrinus and Tatianus above named, mention Authors that make him much antienter. The difference of which authors in this point is not unworthy the Readers consideration, that by this one instance hee may ghesse of the difficultie, and so pardon the errors in the computations of antient time: seeing in such diversitie of opinions a man may hardly find out what to follow.

For Crates the Grammarians (as Clemens Alexandrinus reports) gave being to Homer about 80. years after Troy taken, neer the time that the Heraclide returned into Peloponnesus: and * Eratosthenes after Troy 100. years. Theopompus 500. years after the armie of Greece failed into Phrygia for the warre of Troy. Euphorion makes him contemporarie with Gyges, who began to reign in the 18. Olympiad (which was 45. years after Rome was built) and Sosibius saith, that he was 90. years before the first Olympiad: which hee seeks to prove by the times of Charillus and his sonne Nicander. Philechorus placeth him 180. after Troy: Aristarchus 120. in the time of the seating of the Colonies in Ionis. Apollodorus affirms that he lived while Agestus governed Lacedamon, and that Lycurgus in his young years about 100. years after the Ionian plantations, came to visit him; neer 240. years after Troy taken. Herodotus finds Homer flourishing 622. years before Xerxes enterprife against the Grecians: which Berboldus accounteth at 168. years after the Trojan war. Ensebius seems to make him to have been about the time of Foas King of Juda, 124. years before Rome built: though elsewhere in his Chronologie hee notes that some place him in the time of Samuel, and others in the end of David, and others in other ages. In his Evangelicall Preparation, where out of Tatianus Assyrius he citeth sundry opinions touching the time when Homer lived, he reckoneth many other Greek writers more antient than Homer, as Linus, Philammon, Epimenides, Phemius, Aristæus, Orpheus, Museus, Thamyras, Amphion, and others.

Now whether Homer or Hesiodus were the elder, it is also much disputed. Aulus Gellius reports that Philochorus and Xenophanes affirm, that Homer preceded Hesiod: and on the contrary, that Luc. Accius the Poet, and Ephorus the Historian, make Hesiod of an elder time than Homer. Varro leaves it uncertain which of these learned fablers was first born: but hee finds that they lived together some certain years, where he confirms himself by an Epigram, written upon a Trevis, and left by Hesiod in Helicon.

Cornelius Nepos reports that they both lived 160. years before Rome built: while the Silvii reigned in Alba, about 140. years after the fall of Troy. Euthymenes finds them both 200. years after Troy taken, in the time of Acastus the son of Pelias, King of of Thessaly. For my selfe, I am not much troubled when this Poet lived: neither would I offend the Reader with these opinions, but only to shew the uncertainty and disagreement of Historians, as well in this particular, as in all other questions and dispute of time. For, the curiositie of this mans age is no lesse ridiculous, than the inquisition why he began his Iliads with the word Menin, as perhaps containing some great mysterie. Indefinition whereof Lucian feigning himself to have been in Hell, and to have spoken with Homer, there asked him the cause why he began his book with that word: who answered, That he began in that sort, because it came in his head so to doe.

It seemeth that Senyes, or, after Macrobius, Senemires ruled Egypt, at this time: for Tampher Sobris was his successour, who preceded Vaphres, father in law to Solomon.¹⁰

About the end of Sauls government, or in the beginning of Dauids time, according to Cassiodorus, the Amazones with the Cymmerians invaded Asia, Latinus Sylvius then ruling in Italy. And besides the overthrow of that famous state of Troy (which fell 103 years before Dauids time) there were many other changes in the middle part of the world, not onely by reason of those Northern Nations: but there sprung up somewhat neerly together, six Kingdomes into greatnesse, not before erected. In Italy, that of the Latins: in the South part of Greece, those of Lacedaemon, Corinth, and the Achai. In Arabia, Saba, Soba, and Damascus, the Adads made themselves Princes, of which there were ten Kings, which began and ended with the Kings of Israel in effect: and somewhat before these, the State of the Israelites having now altered the forme of government, began to flourish under Kings, of which David, in a few years, became master of all those neighbouring Nations, who by interchange of times had subjected the Judaans, corrupted their religion, and held them under in a most abject and and grievous slavery: to wit, the Edumeans, Moabites, Ammonites, Midianites, Ituraans, and the rest of the Arabians, with the Philistims, Febyssites, Geshurites, Machathites; all which acknowledged David for their Sovereigne Lord, and paid him tribute.

CHAP. XVII. OF DAVID.

S. I. of Davids estate in the time of Saul.

He hazards which David ran into while he was yet onely designed King, and lived as a private man, expecting the Empire, were very many. The first personall act of fame, was his killing of Goliath in the view of both armies, whereby he became known to Saul, and so highly affected of Jonathan the sonne of Saul, that he loved him as his own soul: Inomuch as when Saul sought to perswade his sonne that David would assuredly be the ruine of his house, and estate, and offered him violence when he pleaded his cause, Jonathan could never be perswaded, never forc'd, nor ever wearied from the care of Dauids life, and well doing. It was not long after this signall act of David, but that Saul became exceeding jealous of him, though he were become as his household servant, and his Esquire, or Armor-bearer. Saul being vexed with an evil spirit, was advised to procure some cunning Musician to play before him upon the Harp, whereby it was thought that he might find ease; which came to passe accordingly. He entertained David for this purpose, and began to favour him, giving him a place of Command among the men of warre. But the jealous Tyrant soon waxed wearie of his good affection, and sought to kill David, being thereunto moved onely through envie of his vertue. This passion first brake forth in the midst of his raving fit, at which time he threw a spear at David that was then playing on his Harp to do him ease.

Ensch. c. 12. & 14

Censorinus remembreth one Asclepius a Physician, who practised the curing of the Frenzie, by the like Musick: and tempered thereby those diseases which grew from passion. That Pythagoras did also the like by such a kind of harmony, Seneca in his third book of Anger witnesseth. But the madness of Saul came from the cause of causes: and and was thereby incurable, howsoever it sometimes left him, and yeelded unto that Musick, which God had ordained to be a mean of more good to the Musician than to the King.

Saul having failed in such open attempts, gave unto David the command over 1000. souldiers to confront the Philistims withall. For he durst not trust him as before, about his person, fearing his revenge. Now the better to cover his hatred towards him, hee promised him his daughter Merab to wife: but having married her to Adriel, he gave to David his younger daughter Michol, but with a condition, to present him with an hundred foreskins of the Philistims: hoping rather (in respect of the valour of that Nation) that the Philistims would take Dauids head, than hee their foreskins. This hope failing, when as now Dauids victories begat new fears and jealousies in Saul, hee practised with Jonathan, and afterwards with his own hands attempted his life, but his purposes were still frustrated. After all this he sought to murder him in his own house, but Michol his wife delivered him. So David sought Samuel at Ramah, and being pursued by Saul, fled thence unto Nob in Benjamin, to Abimelech, then to Achis the Philistim, Prince of Geth: where to obscure himself, he was forc'd to counterfeit both simplicity and distraction. But being ill assured among the Philistims, he covered himselfe in the Cave of Adullam: and after conveying such of his kinsfolks as were not fit to follow him, into Moab, he hid himself in the deserts of Ziph, Maon, and the hills of Engad, where he cut off the lap of Sauls garment, and spared his life: as he did a second time in the desert of Ziph, after his passage with Nabal and Abigail. After which he repaired to Achis of Geth the second time, and was kindly entertained, in regard of the hatred with which his master Saul was known to prosecute him.

Of Achis David obtained * Siglag in Simeon, pretending to invade Jadea: but he bent his forces another way, and strook the Amalekites, with other enemies of Israel, letting none live to complain upon him. Achis supposing that David had drawn blood of his own Nation, thought himself assured of him: and therefore preparing to invade Israel, summoneth David to assist him, who dissembling his intent, seemeth very willing thereto. But the rest of the Philistim Princes knowing his valour, and doubting his disposition, liked not his company, and therefore he withdrew himself to Siglag. At his return he found the town burnt, his two wives, with the wives and children of his people, taken by the Amalekites: Hereupon his followers mutined, but God gave him comfort, and assurance to recover all again: which he did.

This armie of the Philistims commanded by Achis, encountred Saul at Gilboa, in which he and his three sons were slain. The newes, with Sauls Crown and bracelets, were brought to David at Siglag, in his return from being victorious over Amalek, by a man of the same Nation, who avowed (though falsely) that himself at Sauls request had slain him. David, because he had accused himself, made no scruple to cause him to bee slain at the instant: and the sooner, because the probabilities gave strong evidence with-⁴⁰ all. Otherwise it followeth not that every man ought to be believed of himself to his own prejudice. For it is held in the law, Confessio reorum non habenda est pro explorata crimine, nisi approbatio alia instruit religionem cognoscentis. The prisoners confession must not be taken for an evidence of the crime, unlesse some other proof inform the conscience of the Judge. For a man may confesse those things of himself, that the Judge by examination may know to be impossible. But because it is otherwise determined in the title de custodia reorum l. si confessus, & in cap. de penis l. qui sententiam, therefore doth the Glosse reconcile these two places in this sort: Si quis in iudicio sponte de seipso confiteatur, & postea maneat in confessione, id est satis. If any man in judgement do confesse of himself, of his own accord, and after doth persevere in his confession, it is enough. That David greatly bewailed Saul, it is not improbable; for death cureth a sunder all competition: and the lamentable end that befell him being a King, with whom in effect the strength of Israel also fell, could not but stirre up sorrow, and move compassion in the heart of David.

The victory which the Philistims had gotten, was so great, that some Towns of the Israelites, even beyond the river of Jordan, were abandoned by the Inhabitants, and left unto the enemies, who took possession of them without any resistance made. Wherefore it may seem strange, that a nation so warlike and ambitious as were the Philistims, did not follow their fortune with all diligence, and seek to make the Conquest entire.

Most

Most like it seems, that the civill war immediately breaking out between David and the house of Saul, wherein Juda was divided from the rest of Israel, gave them hope of an easie victorie over both; and thereby caused them to attempt nothing at the present, lest by so doing they should enforce their disagreeing enemies to a necessary reconciliation; but rather to permit that the one part should consume the other, by which means both the victors, and the vanquished, would become a prey to the violence of such as had beaten them, when their forces were united.

s. II.

Of the beginning of David's reign, and the war made by Abner for Isboseth.

After the death of Saul, Abner, who commanded for Saul in the warre, sought to advance Isboseth (or Ishbosheth, according to Iosephus) though he had no right to the Kingdome of Israel: for Mephiboseth the first son of Jonathan lived. Against this Abner and Isboseth, David made a defensive war, till Abner past Jordan, and entered the border of Juda; at which time he sent Joab with such forces as he had, to resist Abner: Isboseth remaining in Gilead, and David in Hebron. The armies encountred each other neer Gibeon, where it seemeth that Abner made the offer to trie the quarrell by the hands of a few, like to that combat between the Lacedemonians and the Argives, remembered by Herodotus, 300. being chosen of each Nation, of which number three persons were onely left unslain. The like tryall by a farre lesse number was performed by the Horatii and Curiatii, for the Romans and Latines. The same challenge Goliath the Philistin made, whom David slew: a custome very antient. Edward the third offered the like tryall in his own person to the French King; and Francis the French King to Charles the Emperour. There were twelve chosen of each part, in this war of David with the house of Saul, to wit, so many of Benjamin, and as many of Juda: whose force and valour was so equall, as there survived not any one to challenge the victory. But the quarrell staid not here; for the Army of Juda prest Abner in grosse, and brake him. Three hundred and sixty men of Abners companions were slain, and but twenty of Juda; whereof Asahel the brother of Joab was one: who when he would needs pursue Abner, and by Abners perswasions could not be moved to quit him, he was forced to turn upon him, wounded him to death with the stroak of his spear. For though Asahel were an excellent foot-man, and, as it is written in the Text, as light as a wild Roe, and, as Iosephus reporteth, contended not onely with men, but with horses; and hoped to have gotten great fame if he could have mastered Abner (who, as Asahel perswaded himself, had by being overthrown, and flying away, lost his courage) yet here it fell out true, That the race is not to the swift.

That this civill warre lasted two years, we find it written in the second of Samuel, the second Chapter; though in the beginning of the third it is again made probable, that this contention dured longer; and therefore the matter resteth still in dispute, and some of the Rabbines conceive that Isboseth had then reigned two years, when this was written, the Warre as yet continuing a longer time. For Abner held for the party of Isboseth after this, and till such time as there grew jealousie between him and Isboseth for Sauls Concubine: neither did the death of Isboseth instantly follow; but how long after the murder of Abner it happened, the same doth not certainly appear.

Of the death of Abner slain by Joab, and of Isboseth by Rechab and Baanah.

A*Abner*, reconciled to David, was anon by Joab murdered; for Joab could not endure a companion in David's Favour, and in the commandment of his forces; by which he was grown so powerfull, as David forbore to call him to account: for thus much he confesseth of himself; I am this day weak, and these men, the sons of Zerviah, be too hard for me. In this sort David complained after Abners death; and to make it clear that he hated this fact of Joab, he followed him with this publicke imprecation; Let the blood fall on the head of Joab, and on all his fathers house: and let them be subject to ulcers, to the leprosy, to lameness, to the sword, and to povertie, &c. For could any thing have withstood the ordinance of God, this murder committed by Joab might greatly have endangered David's estate, Abner being the mouth and trust of all the rest of the Tribes, not yet reconciled. This mischance therefore David openly bewailed, so that all Israel perceived him to be innocent of that fact. The place which Abner held, being generall of the men of warre, was of such importance, that the Kings themselves were faine to give them great respect, as hath been already shewed more at large. This office Joab held in the army of Juda, and thought himself worthy to hold the place entire, if once his Lord might obtaine the whole Kingdome. For he was neer to David in kindred, and had been partaker of all his adversitie; wherefore hee did not think it meet, that an old enemy should in reward of new benefits, be made his partner. Indeed he was by nature so jealous of his dignitie and place, that he afterward slew Amasa his own kinsman, and the Kings, upon the same quarrell, taking it in high disdain to see him joynd with himself as captain of the hoste of Juda; much lesse could he brook a superiour; and such a one as had slain his brother, and been beaten himself in battell. But howsoever Joab did hate or despise Abner, David esteemed highly of him as of a Prince, and a great man in Israel, excusing the oversight by which he might seem to have perished, by affirming that he died not like a fool, nor a man vanquished, But as a man falleth before wicked men, so (said he) diddest thou fall. And certainly it is no error, nor want of valour & vertue in him, whom a stronger hand destroyeth unawares, or whom subtilty in free trust bringeth to confusion. For all under the Sun are subject to worldly miseries and misadventures. Howsoever Isboseth meant to have dealt with Abner, yet when he heard of his death, he despaired greatly of his estate, and with him all Israel were posselt with great fear: in so much as two of Isboseth's own Captains, Rechab and Baanah, murdered Isboseth, and presenting his head to David, received the same reward that the Amalekites lately did, for pretending to have slain Saul. Isboseth being dead, all the Elders of Israel repaired to David at Hebron, where he was the third and last time annoiued by generall consent.

Of the flourishing time of David's Kingdome, the taking of Jerusalem, with two overthrowes given to the Philistims, and the conduction of the Ark to the City of David.

When David was now established in the Kingdome, his first enterprise was upon the Febusites, who in derision of his force, and confident in the strength of the place (as is thought) manned their walls with the blind and lame of their Citie; which David soon after entred, all their other forces notwithstanding. For having mastered the fort of Zion (which was afterward the Citie of David) he became Lord of Hierusalem, without any great danger, expelling thence the Febusites, who had held it from the foundation, to the times of Moses and Joshua, and after them almost 400 years. There are who expound this place otherwise: Except thou take away the blind and the lame, thou shalt not come in hither. For some think that it was meant by the Idols of the Febusites: others, that it had reference to the Covenant made long before with Isaac, and Jacob: the one blind by nature and age, the other made lame by wrestling with the Angel; and that therefore till those (that is, till that Covenant) be broken, David ought not to molest them. But for my self, I take it with Iosephus, that they armed their walls with certain impotent people at first, in scorn of David's attempt. For they that had held their Citie about 400. years against all the children of Israel; Joshua, the Judges, and Saul, did not doubt but to defend it also against David.

When he had now posselt himself of the very heart and Center of the Kingdome, and received congratulatory Embassadours and presents from Hiram King of Tyre: he entertained divers other concubines, and married moe wives, by whom he had ten sons in Jerusalem, and by his former wives, he had six in Hebron where he reigned 7 years.

The Philistims hearing that David was now anointed King, as well of Juda as of Israel, they thought to try him in the beginning; before he was fully warm in his seat. And being encountred by David at two severall times in the Valley of Rephaim, or of the Giants, they were at both times overthrowen. After which he called the place Baalperazim. Then David assembled 30000. choice Israelites to conduct the Ark of God from the house house of Abinadab in Gibza to the Citie of David; which businesse was interrupted by the death of Nazab the son of Abinadab, whom the Lord slew for presuming to touch the Ark, though it were with intent to stay it from taking harna, when it was taken. But after three years it was with great solemnity brought into the Citie with sacrifices, musick, dances, and all signs of joyfulness, in which David himself gladly bare a part. Hereupon Michol derided him for dancing before the Ark, and afterward told him in scorn, That he was uncovered as a fool in the eyes of the maidens his servants; namely, that he forgot his regall dignity both in apparell and behaviour; and mixed himself among the base multitude, dancing as fools doe in the wayes and streets: not that she disliked David's behaviour (as I take it) though she made it the colour of her derision; but rather the aboundant griefe, which this spectacle stirred up; beholding the glory of her husband to whom she was delivered lastly by force, and remembering the miserable end of her father and brethren, out of whose ruines she conceived that the son of Isai had built this his greatnesse: together with the many new wives and concubines imbraced since his possession of Jerusalem, made her break out in those despitfull tearmes, for which she remained barren to her death.

1 Chro. c. 3.

This done, David consulted with the Prophet Nathan for the building of the Temple or house of God: but was forbidden it, because he was a man of warre, and had shed blood. So greatly doth the Lord and King of all detest homicide; having threatned, not in vain, that he would require the blood of a man, at the hand of man and beast. These wars which David had made were just, and the blood therein shed was of the enemies of God, and his Church: yet for this cause it was not permitted that his hands should lay the foundation of that holy Temple. Hereby it appears how greatly those Princes deceive themselves, who think by blood-shed and terror of their wars, to make themselves in greatnesse like to the Almighty, which is a damnable pride; not caring to imitate his mercy and goodnesse, or seek the blessednesse promised by our Saviour unto the peace-makers.

Now although it was not pleasing to the Lord to accept a Temple of David's founding, yet was his religious intent so well accepted, that hereupon he received both a confirmation of the Kingdome to him and his heirs, and that happy promise of the everlasting Throne, that should be established in his seed.

The overthrow of the Philistims and Moabites.

2 Sam. 8. v. 1.

Soon after this David overthrew the Philistims, which made them altogether powerlesse, and unable to make any invasion upon Israel in haste. For it is written, Acceptis frannum Amgaris e manu Philisthorum; which place our English Geneva converts in these words, And David took the bridle of bondage out of the hand of the Philistims. The Latin of Junius giveth another and a better sense; for by that bridle of Amgar was meant the strong City of Gath, or Geth, and so the Geneva hath it in the marginall note. This Citie of Gath was the same which was afterward Dio-Casarea, sit on the frontier of Palastina, at the entrance into Judea and Ephraim. From thence they made their incursions, and thence into their retreat in all their invasions; which being taken by David and demolished, there was left no such frontier town of equal strength to the Philistims on that part. The hill whereon Geth or Gath stood, the Hebrews call Amme, whereof and of the word Gar is made Amgar, of which Pliny in his first book, and chap. 13. This exposition is made plain, and confirmed in the first of Chro. the 18.

Junius in c. 8. of the 3. of Sam.

2 Sam. 13.

There was no nation bordering the Jewes that so greatly afflicted them as the Philistims did, who before the time of Saul, (to the end they might not sharpen any weapon against them) did not leave one Smith in all their Cities and Villages of that kind, but inforced them to come down into their territorie, for all yron work whatsoever they needed; so as the Israelites till this time of David, were seldom free from paying tribute to the Philistims.

After this he gave them four other overthrows: but the war of the Moabites and Arabians came between. In the first of which he was indangered by Ishbi-benab, the head of whose spear weighed 300. shekles of brasse, which make nine pound three quarters of our poises; at which time Abishai succoured David, and slew the Philistim, whereupon the the Counsellours and Captains of David (left the light of Israel might by his losse be quenched) vowed that he should not thenceforth hazard himself in any battell. The second and thurd encounter and overthrow of the Philistims was at Gob, a place neer Gesar, and the last at Gath or Geth. And being now better assured of the Philistims by the taking of Geth, he invaded Moab, from whom notwithstanding in his adversity hee sought succour, and left his parents with him in trust. But whether it were the same King or no, it is not known.

The Rabbines feign that Moab slew those kinsfolkes of David, which lived under his protection in Saul's time; but questionlesse David well knew how that Nation had been to alwayes enemies to Israel, and took all the occasions to vex them that were offered. And he also remembered that in the 23. of Deut. God commanded Israel not to seek the peace or prosperity of the Moabites; which David well observed, for he destroyed two parts of the people, leaving a third to till the ground. This victory obtained, he led his army by the border of Ammon toward Syria Zobah, the region of Adadezer the son of Rehob King thereof. The place is set down in the description of the holy Land; to which I referre the Reader.

The warre which David made upon the Syrians.

It is written in the Text: David smote also Hadadezer, &c. as hee went to recover his border at the river Euphrates. Now whether the words (as he went to recover his border) be referred to David or Hadadezer, it is not agreed upon. Junius thinks that the article (hee) hath relation to David, who finding Tobu oppressed by Hadadezer, overthrew the one, and succoured the other. But the antient and most received opinion, that this recovery hath reference to the Syrian, is more probable. For if David had intended any such enterprize towards Euphrates, hee was in farre better case to have proceeded after his victory than before: seeing that (Adadezer being taken) hee had now left no enemy on his back, either to pursue him, to take victuals and supplies from him, or to stop the passages of the mountains upon him at his return.

Again, seeing David was either to passe through a part of Arabia the desert, or by the plains of Palmyrena, his army consisting of footmen, for the most if not all: hee had now both horse and chariots good store to carry his provisions through those uncultivated places, by which hee was to have marched before hee could have reached Euphrates, or any part thereof. But we find that David returned to Jerusalem, after hee had twice overthrown the Syrian army, not bending his course towards the river Euphrates, but seeking to establish his purchases already made. Whereby it may appear, that it was the Syrian, and not king David, that was going to enlarge his border, as afore is said.

The King of Syria, Damascena, and of Damascus, whereof that region is so called, hearing that Adadezer was overthrown by the Israelites, fearing his own estate, and the loss of his own country which adjoined to Syria Zoba of Hadadezer, sent for an Army of Aramites or Syrians to his succour: but these, as it appeareth, came too late for Adadezer, and too soon for themselves: for there perished of those supplies 22000. This King of Damascus, Josephus, (out of Nicholaus an antient Historian) calleth Adad, who was also of the same name and family as also those other Adads were: which now began to grow up in greatnesse, and so continued for ten descents, till they were extinguished by the Af-ryrians, as is shewed heretofore. David having now reduced Damascus under his obedience, left a garriſon therein, as he did in Edom: having also sacked the adjoining Cities of Betah & Berathi, belonging to Adadezer, of which Cities Ptolomie calleth Betah, Taaba: and Berathi he nameth Barathena, Tobu or Thoi, whose country of Hamath joyned to Adadezer (as in the description of the holy Land the Reader may perceive) sent his son Fotam to congratulate this successe of David: partly because he had war with Adadezer, &c. partly because he feared David now victorious. He also presented David with vessels of gold, silver, and brasse; all which, together with the golden shields of the Aramites, and the best of all the spoiles of other Nations, David dedicated unto God at his return. Junius translated the words (Clypeos aureos) by umbones, as if all the parts of the targets were not of gold, but the bosses only. The Septuagint call them bracelets: Aquila, golden chains. But because Roboam made shields of brass in place of these of Adadazer, at such time as Shicah the Egyptian sack'd the Temple of Jerusalem, it may be gathered thereby that those of Adadazer were golden shields.

This done, David sent Embassadors to Hannum King of the Ammonites, to congratulate his establishment in his fathers Kingdom: for David, in the time of his affliction under Saul, had been relieved by Nahash, the father of Hannum. But this Ammonite being ill advised, and over-jealous of his estate, used David's messengers so barbarously, and contemptuously (by curtailing their beards, and their garments) as hee thereby drew a warre upon himself, which neither his own strength, nor all the aydes purchased, could put off or sustain. For notwithstanding that hee had waged three and thirtie thousand Souldiers of the Amalekites, and their confederates; to wit, of the vassalls of Adadazer twenty thousand, and of Maachab and Ishob thirteen thousand (for which hee disbursed a thousand talents of silver) yet all these great Armies, together with the strength of the Ammonites, were by Joab and his brother Abishai easily broken and put to ruine: and that without any great losse or slaughter at that time. And it is written, that when the Aramites fled, the Ammonites also retreated into their Cities, the one holding themselves within the walls, the other in their desarts adjoining, till Joab was returned to Jerusalem.

Hadadazer hearing that Joab had dismissed his Armie, assembled his forces again, and sent all the Companies that hee could levie out of Mesopotamia; who under the command of Shobach passed Euphrates, and incamped at Helam, on the South side thereof. David hearing of this new preparation, assembled all the ablest men of Israel, and marched toward the Syrian Armie in Palmyrena, not yet entred into Ara-bia; to wit, at Helam, a place no lesse distant from Damascus, towards the North-east, than Jerusalem was towards the Southwest. Now David (speaking humanely) might with the more confidence goe on towards Euphrates (which was the far-30 thest off journey that ever he had) because hee was now Lord of Damascus, which lay in the midway. Hee also posselt himself of * Thadmor or Palmyrena, which Salomon afterward strongly fortified; and this Citie was but one dayes journey from Helam, and the river Euphrates. So had hee two safe retreats, the one to Thadmor, and the next from thence to Damascus. In this encounter between David and the Syrians, they lost 40000. horsemen, and 700. chariots, together with Shobach Generall of their Armie. The Chronicles call these 40000. Souldiers, footmen, and so Junius converts it, and so is it very probable. For the Armie of Israel consisting of footmen, could hardly have slaughtered 40000. horsemen, except they quitted their horse and fought on foot. So are the chariots taken in this battell, numbered 40 at 7000. in the first of Chronicles the ninth; in which number, as I conceive, all the Souldiers that served in them, with the conductors, are included: so as there dyed of the Syrians in this warre against David, before hee forc'd them to tribute, 100000. footmen, besides all their horsemen and waggons, and besides all those that Joab slew, when they fled at the first encounter, together with the Ammonites, before Rabbah. Notwithstanding all which, the Adads in following ages gathered strength again, and afflicted the Kings of Juda often: but the Kings of Israel they impoverished even to the last end of that State.

David having now beaten the Arabians and Mesopotamians, from the partie and confederacy of Ammon: He sent out Joab the Lieutenant of his Armies to forrage and destroy their territorie, and to besiege Rabbah, afterward Philadelphia, which after a while the Israelites mastered and posselt. The Kings Crown which weighed a talent of gold, garnished with precious stones, David set on his own head, and carried away with him the rest of the riches and spoile of the Citie. And though David stayed at Jerusalem, following the war of Uriah his wife, till such time as the Citie was brought to extremity, and ready to be entred: yet Joab in honour of David forbore the last assault, & entrance thereof, till his masters arrivall. To the people he used extreme rigour (if wee may so call it being exercised against heathen Idolaters,) for some of them hee tare with har-rowes, some hee sawed asunder, others he cast into burning kills, in which hee baked yle and brick.]

Of David's troubles in his reigne, and of his forces.

But as victory begetteth securitie, and our present worldly felicity a forgetfulness of our former miseries, and many times of God himself the giver of all goodnesse; so did these changes, in the fortune and state of this good King, change also the zealous care which formerly hee had to please God in the precise observation of his Lawes and Commandements: For having now no dangerous apparent enemy (against whom hee was wont to ask counsell from the Lord) hee began to be advised by his own humane affections and vain desires: For hee was not onely satisfied to take Uriah's wife from him, and to use her by stealth; but hee imbrodered his adultery with Uriah's slaughter, giving order to his trustie servant Joab to 2 Sam. 21. 15. marshall him in the front or point of those Israelites, which gave an assault upon the suburbs of Rabba, when there was not as yet any possibilitie of prevailling. And that which could no lesse displease God than the rest, hee was content that many others of his best servants and souldiers should perish together with Uriah, hoping thereby to cover his particular ill intent against him. After which hee began by degrees to fall from the highest of happinesse, and his dayes then to come were filled with joyes and woes interchangeable, his troden-down sorrows began again to spring, and those perils which he had pulled up by the roots (as hee hoped) gave him an after-harvest of many cares and discontentments. And if it had pleased GOD to take the witnesse of David's own mouth against him, as David himself did against the Amalekite, which pretended to have slaine Saul, he had then appeared as worthy of reprehension as the other was of the death hee suffered. For when Nathan the Prophet propounded unto him his 30 own errour in the person of another, to wit, of him that took the poor mans sheep that had none else, the bereaver being Lord of many; Hee then vowed it to the living Lord, that such a one should die the death. And hereof, although it pleased God to pardon David for his life, which remission the Prophet Nathan pronounced; yet hee delivered him Gods justice together with his mercy in the tenour following; Now therefore the sword shall never depart from thy house, &c. because thou hast taken his wife to be thy wife, & hast slaine Uriah with the sword of the children of Ammon. Soon after this, David lost the child of adulterie which he begot on Bersheba. Secondly, his own son Amnon, being in love with his half sister Tamar, by the advice of his cousin-german the sonne of Shimeah David's brother, posselt her by force; which when hee had performed, 40 he thrust her from him in a carelesse and despitefull manner. Two years after which bold and incestuous act, Abalom caused him to be murdered, at the feast of his sheep-shearing: not perchance in revenge of Tamar's ravishment alone; but having it in his heart to usurp the Kingdom, in which, because hee could not in any sort be assured of Ammon, he thought his affairs greatly advanced by his destruction. So the one brother having ravished his own sister, and then despised her; the other after a long dissembled malice first made his own brother drunken, and then slaughtered him, which done, he fled away, and lived under the safeguard of Talmai King of Gessur, neer Damascus, who was his grandfather by the mother, but a heathen King. Thirdly, when Abalom by the invention of Joab (but chiefly because of the great affection of David towards his sonne) was brought again, first to the Kings favour, and then to his presence; he began instantly to practise against David his father, seeking by the pretence of common justices, and by lowly and familiar manner to all men, and by detracting from his fathers equitie, to win unto himself a popular reputation. Here began the great 50 affliction, threatened by the Lord as a punishment of David's sinne.

The company which Abalom gathered at the first were but 200 men: which he carried with him from Jerusalem to Hebron, pretending, though impiously, the performance of a vow to God. There when Achitophel repaired unto him, and many troops of people people from all places, he proclaimed himself King, & was by the people (whose hearts God had turned from their lawfull Prince) accepted so readily, that David doubting to be set upon on the sudden, durst not trust himself in his own Citie of Jerusalem, nor in any other walled town for fear of surprise: but incamped in the fields and deserts with some 600. of his guard, and few else. The Priests hee left in Jerusalem with the Ark of God, from whom he desired to be advertised of those things that chanced; to whom he directed Hushai his trustie friend, and servant, praying him to make himself in all his outward actions and counsells of *Absalom*s party and confederacy, thereby the better to discover unto him the purposes of Achitophel, a revolting Countessour, whose practices be greatly doubted. And now when treason was in fashion, Ziba also sought to betray his master Mephiboseth the son of Jonathan: And Shimei of the house of Saul (the fire of whose hatred *David*s prosperity had smothered, but his adversity illighted) holding himself upon the advantage of a mountain side, cast stones at David, and most despitfully cursed him to his face: but David attending no private revenges, forbade Abishai to pursue him for the present, yet left him among others in the roll of his revenge, to his sonne Salomon: Absalom being now possessor of Jerusalem, was advised by Achitophel to use his fathers concubines in some such publique place, as all Israel might assure themselves, that he was irreconcilable to his father: whereof being perswaded, they would then resolutely adhere to Absalom and his cause, without fear of being given up upon a reconciliation between them. This salvage and impious (though crafty counsell) Achitophel indeed urged for his own respect, as fearing that this rebellion might take end to his destruction, who most of all other inflamed Absalom against his father. And now was it fulfilled that Nathan had directly foretold David: I will raise up evil against thee out of thine own house, and will take thy wives before thine eyes, and give them unto thy neighbour, and he shall lye with thy wives in the sight of the Sunne: for thou diddest it secretly, but I will doe this thing before all Israel, and before the Sunne. He also gave advice to Absalom, that himself with an armie of 12000. men might be employed at the instant for the surprizing of David, which had willingly been embraced by Absalom, had not Hushai *David*s faithfull servant given counter-advice, and swayed it: perswading Absalom that it was fitter and more safe for him with all the strength of Israel to pursue his father, than by such a troop, which *David*s valour and those of his attendants might either indanger or resist. This delay in Absalom, and advantage of time gained by David, was indeed, after God, the losse of the one, and delivery of the other. Whereupon Achitophel rightly fearing (by the occasion fore-shewed) the success which followed, disposed of his own estate, and then forsook both the party and the care of Absalom, and of his own life.

David being advertised of this enterprize against him, marched away all night, and past Jordan, possessing himself of Mahanaim in the Tribe of Gad: the same wherein Ishboseth himself in the war against David after *Saul*s death seated himself. To which place there repaired unto him Shobi the son of Nahash the Ammonite, whom David loved, the same which Iosephus calleth Shipbar. And though it be greatly disputed, what this Shobi was, yet the most generall and probable opinion makes him a second brother to Hanani, whom David for his fathers sake established in the Kingdome, after *Hanani*s overthrow: in thankfulness whereof hee relieved David in this his extremity. There came also to *David*s assistance Machir of Lodabar, Guardian in former times to Mephiboseth, and among others Barzillai the Gileadite, who willingly fed David and all his companie.

In the mean time both the King and Absalom prepared to fight; Absalom made Amasa Commander of the armie of Israel, the same place which Joab held with David, an office next the King himself, like unto that of the Maiors of the Palace anciently in France. David, perswaded by his company, stayed in Mahanaim, & disposed the forces he had to Joab, Abishai, and Ittai, giving them charge in the hearing of all that issued out of the port of Mahanaim, that they should spare the life of Absalom. But Joab, besides that he was very cruell by nature, remembered that Absalom had lately disposed of his government to Amasa, and therefore the victory being obtained, and news brought him that Absalom hung by the hair of his head on a tree, when he could not perswade the messenger to return and kill him, hee himself with his own servants dispatched him.

It appeared also by the sequell that Joab affected Adonijah whom he afterward acknowledged, David yet living; and fearing the disposition of Absalom, he embraced the present advantage offered.

Hereof, together with newes of the victorie, when knowledge was brought to David, he mourned and forrowed, not only as a man that had lost a sonne, but as one that had outlived all his worldly ioyes, and seene euerie delight of life interred. For hee to hid himselfe from his people, as those which hoped for honour and reward after so great a victorie, couered themselves also in the citie, as if they had committed the greatest offences, and had rather deserved death than recompence. Whereupon Joab presenting himselfe before David, perswaded him to dissemble his sorrow for the present, and to shew himselfe to the armie. For first, he told him that he had discountenanced his faithfull servants; who had that day preserved his life; inferring that nothing could bee more dangerous to a King, than not onely not to acknowledge so great a loue and constancie in his people, who being but few in number, did yet resolutely expose themselves to great perils for his sake: but on the contrarie, grieue and lament at their good successe. For, no doubt, they might all haue bought their peace of Absalom at an easie rate. Secondly, he urged that it was generally beleued, that he loued his enemies & hated his friends; and that he witnessed by this his mourning, that he had not anie respect of his Princes, and others his faithfull servants, but would more haue ioyed if they had all perished, and Absalom liued, than in the victorie by their faithfulness and approved valour gotten.

Lastly, he used this preualent argument, That if the King came not out and shewed himselfe publickly to his men of warre, that they would all that verie night abandon him, and returne; concluding with this fearefull threatening, And that will be worse unto thee than all the evil that fell on thee from thy youth hitherto. By these ouer-bold and arrogant speeches (though perchance vttered with a good intent) Joab raised David from his bed of sorrow, and brought him to the gates of the citie among the people, whom he assured of his loue and affection, especially Amasa, who commanded the armie of Absalom, to whom he promised the office of Lieutenantship, the same which Absalom had giuen him, and which Joab now enioyed. For David doubted, that if Amasa were not satisfied, he might draw from him a great part of the strength of Israel, now vnder his commandment.

This done, the King marched towards Jordan homeward, where in his passage hee pardoned Shimei, who had lately reuiled him to his face: but this remission was but externall, as appeared afterward. He also accepted of *Mephiboseth*s excuse, whom Ziba had falsely accused and betrayed.

He also intreated Barzillai the Gileadite, his late liberall Oast, to follow him to Jerusalem, that he might reward his seruice done him; who excusing himselfe by his age, appointed his sonne Chimham to attend the King.

At Gilgal on this side Jordan, all the Tribes assembled; and after some contention which of them ought to haue most interest in David, the Armie brake, & David returned to Jerusalem. But Sheba the son of Bichri a Beniamite, of the faction of the house of Saul, finding some discontent among the Israelites, withdrew them from David, as from a stranger in whom they had no interest, and it seemeth that manie of the people of the out Tribes, and in effect of all but Juda, bare still a good affection to the issues of their first King. David employed his reconciled Captain Amasa, to giue him contentment, and to witnesse his trust, as also because hee conceived that Amasa had interest in those reuolts of Israel more than Joab had. He received commandment from David to assemble the Armie within three dayes, which hee fore-shewed: but being on ward on his way, Abishai, *Joab*s brother, was sent after him, with *David*s guard and best Souldiers, whom also Joab accompanied: and ouertaking Amasa neere Gibson, pretending to embrace him, gaue him a wound, whereof hee fell dead, being no lesse zealous of Amasa than he was of Abner, whom he murdered in the same manner, and out of the same impatient ambition. This done, hee pursued Sheba; and finding him inclosed in Abel, assaulted the citie with that furie, that the citizens by the persuasions of a wife woman there inhabiting, cut off *Sheba*s head, and flung it to Joab on the walls: which done, hee retrained his Armie to Jerusalem, and commanded, as before, all the Host of Israel.

The next act of Dauid, was the deliuerie of Sauls sons or kinsmen to the Gibeonites, whom those citizens hung vp in reuenge of their fathers crueltie. Dauid had knowledge from the Oracle of God, that a famine which had continued on the land three yeeres, came by reason of Saul and his house, to wit, for the slaughter of the Gibeonites: and therefore he willingly yeelded to giue them this satisfaction, both because he had warrant from God himselfe, as also, if wee may iudge humanely, to rid himselfe of Sauls line, by whom he and his might, as well in the present as in the future, be greatly molested and indangered, only he spared Mephiboseth the sonne of Jonathan, both for the loue he bare to his father, as for his oath and vow to God.

Now whereas it is written in the Text, The King took the two sonnes of Rispah, whom she bore vnto Saul, and the five sonnes of Michol the daughter of Saul, whom she bare to Adriel, and deliuered them to the Gibeonites: Iunius calls this Michol the sister of her that was Dauids wife, sence whom Saul married to Phaltiel: but Michol here named, had Adriel to her husband; the same which is named Merab in the first of Samuel the eighteenth, who was first promised to Dauid when he slew Goliath in the valley of Raphaim: and because it is written that Michol loued Dauid, which perchance Merab did not, whether Dauid had anie humane respect in the deliuerie of her children, it is onely knowne to God.

Now where the Geneua nameth Michol for Merab the wife of Adriel: the better translation were out of the Hebrew word here vsed, hauing an eclipsis or defect, & signifieth, as I am informed, one of the same kined, as in the 19. verse of the same one and twentieth chapter it is said of Goliath, whose speare was weightie as a Weauers beame, when as by the same eclipsis it must be vnderstood by the brother of Goliath; Goliath himselfe being formerly slaine.

As by the death of Sauls children God secured the house of Dauid, leauing no head vnto rebellion; so did hee strengthen both the King and Nation against forreine enemies, by the valour of many braue Commanders, the like of whom, for number & qualitie, that people of Israel is not knowne to haue had at any time before or after. Thirty Captaines of thousands there were, all men of marke, and great reputation in warre. Ouer these were fixe Coronels, whose valour was so extraordinarie, that it might be well held as miraculous. These Coronels had some difference of place and honour, which seemeth to haue bene giuen vpon meere consideration of their vertue. For Abishai the brother of Ioab, who in the warre against the Ammonites & Aramites was Lieutenant, and commanded halfe the armie, could not attaine to the honour of the first ranke, but was faine to rest contented with being principall of the three Coronels of the second order, notwithstanding his neernesse of blood vnto the King, the flourishing estate of his owne house, and his well approued seruices. All these Coronels and Captains, with the Companies belonging to them, may seeme to haue bene such as were continually retained, or at the least kept in readines for anie occasion, considering that the numbers which were mustered and drawne out, if need required, into the field, verie farre exceeded thirtie thousand, yea, or thirty times as manie. They were most of them such as had followed the King in Sauls time, and been hardened with his aduersities. Others there were verie manie, and principall men in their severall Tribes, that repaired vnto him after the death of Saul; but these Captaines and Coronels, (who with Ioab, that was General of all the Kings forces, make vp the number of 37.) were the speciall men of warre, and reckoned as Dauids Worthies. The long reigne of Dauid, as it is knowne to haue consumed many of these excellent men of warre, so may it probably be guessed to haue wasted the most of those whose deaths we find nowhere mentioned. For the sonnes of Zeruia, who had bene too hard for Dauid, were worne away, and only Ioab left in the beginning of Salomon, who wanted his brother Abishai to stand by his side in his last extremities.

By the actions forepassed in the time of Dauid, it is gathered that he had reigned now 33. yeeres or thereabouts, when the posterity of Saul was rooted out, so that he enjoyed about seuen yeeres of entire quiet and securitie, wherein it pleased God to remoue all impediments, that might haue troubled the succession of Salomon in his fathers throne. In this time also Dauid hauing established all things in Iuda and Israel, and the borders thereof, hee againe displeased God by numbring the people, as in ostentation of his power: in which he employed Ioab, with other Captaines of his Armie, who after nine moneths and twentie dayes trauell, returned with the account & register of all the people, able and fit to beare Armes; and they amounted to the number of thirtie hundred thousand, besides Leui and Benjamin, whereof in Iuda and the cities thereof five hundred thousand, and in Israel eight hundred thousand.

For this, when by the Prophet Gad he was offered from God the choice of three punishments, whereof he might submit himselfe to which he pleased; to wit, seuen yeeres famine; three moneths warre; wherein he should be vnprosperous in all attempts, and be chased by his enemies; or a generall pestilence to last three dayes: Dauid made choice to bow himselfe vnder the hand of God only, and left himselfe subject to that cruell disease, which hath no compassion or respect of persons, of which there perished 70. thousand. And hereby hee hath taught all that liue, that it is better to fall into the hands of God than of men; whereof he giueth this diuine reason, For his mercies are great.

Of the last acts of Dauid; Adonijahs faction; the reuenge vpon Ioab and Shimei.

Asfly, when he grew weake and feeble, and past the acts and knowledge of women, he was yet aduised to lie in the armes of a young and well complexioned maiden, to keepe him warme. In this his weake estate of bodie, when hee was in a manner bed-ridden, Adonijah his eldest sonne (Ammon & Absalom being now dead) hauing drawn vnto his partie that inuincible, renowned and feared Ioab, with Abiathar the Priest, began manifestly to prepare for his establishment in the Kingdome after his father. For being the eldest now liuing of Dauids sonnes, and a man of goodly personage, Salomon yet young, and borne of a mother formerly attainted with adulterie, for which her name was omitted by S. Matthew (as Beda, Hugo, Thomas, and others suppose) he presumed to carrie the matter without resistance. Hereof when Dauid had knowledge by Bersabe the mother of Salomon, who did put him in mind of his faithfull promise, that Salomon her son should reigne after him (Nathan the Prophet affirming the same thing vnto the King, & seconding her report of Adonijah his presumption) the King calling vnto him Zadoc the Priest, Nathan the Prophet, & Benaiah the Captaine of his guard, gaue charge and commission to anoint Salomon, and to set him on the Mule whereon himselfe vsed to ride in his greatest state: which done, Salomon, attended, and strongly guarded by the ordinarie and choyce men of warre, the Cherethites and Pelethites, shewed himselfe to the people. These tidings being reported to Adonijah, he presently abandoned his assistants, and for the safety of his life, he fled by the horns of the Altar, whom for the present Salomon pardoned. After this, Dauid had remaining two especiall cares, whereof he was desirous to discharge his thoughts; the one concerning the peace of the land, which might be disturbed by some rebellion against Salomon; the other concerning the building of the Temple, which he sought by all means to aduance, and make the businesse publicke. To bring these intentions to good effect, he summoned a Parliament, consisting of all the Princes of Israel, the Princes of the seuerall Tribes, all the Captaines and Officers, with all the mightie, and men of power; who did repaire vnto Ierusalem.

In this assembly the King stood vp, & signified his purpose of building the Temple, shewing how the Lord had approued the motion. Herein he took occasion to lay open his owne title to the Crowne, shewing that the Kingdome was by Gods ordinance due to the Tribe of Iuda (as Iacob in his blessing prophetically bequeathed it) and that God himselfe was pleased to make choyce of him among all his fathers sonnes. In like manner he said that God himselfe had appointed Salomon by name to be his successor: whereupon hee earnestly charged both the people and his sonne to conformance themselves vnto all that God had commanded, and particularly to goe forward in this worke of the Lords house, which Salomon was chosen to build. Then produced he the patterne of the worke, according to the forme which God himselfe had appointed; and so laying open his owne preparations, he exhorted all others to a voluntarie contribution.

The Kings proposition was so well approued by the Princes & people, that where as hee himselfe had giuen three thousand talents of gold, and seuen thousand of silver; they added vnto it seuen thousand of gold, & ten thousand of silver, besides brasse, iron, and and iewels, heartily reioycing in the aduancement of so religious a worke. This businesse being so well dispatched, a solemne feast with great sacrifice was made, at which time Salomon was againe anointed King, & receiued fealtie of all the Princes & people of the Land, & of all the Princes his brethren, the sonnes of King Dauid. Salomon being thus established King, his Father Dauid finding himselfe euen in the hands of death, first exhorted his sonne to exercise the same courage and strength of minde, which himselfe had done in all his attempts: and to the end that a happy end might follow the beginning of all his enterprizes, he vttered these mighty words; Take heed to the charge of the Lord thy God, to walke in his wayes, and keepe his statutes, and his commandments, and his iudgements, and his testimonies, as it is written in the Law of Moses, &c. to the performance of which, GOD fastened the succession, and prosperitie of his issues. For this done (saith GOD himselfe) Thou shalt not want one of thy posteritie to sit upon the Throne of Israel.

1. King. 2. 3.

1. King. 1. 10.

Secondly, he aduised him concerning Ioab, who out of doubt had serued Dauid from the first assault of Ierusalem to the last of his warres, with incomparable valour and fidelitie, sauing that he fastened himselfe to Adonijah (his master yet liuing) & thereby vexed him in his feeble age. But as God hath left cruelly vnreueged, so was it his will that Ioab should drinke of the same cup, whereof he hath enforced other men to taste, & suffer the same violence which himselfe had vniustly strooken others withall, Qui gladio percutit, gladio peribit: for he had bereaued Abner & Amasa of their liues, hauing against the one the pretence onely of his brothers slaughter, whom Abner had slaine in the time of warre, and could not auoyd him: against the other but a meere ieaousie of his growing great in the fauour of Dauid. And though Ioab assured himselfe that Abner & Amasa being dead, there was none left either to equall him or supplant him, yet God (deriding the policies of wicked men) raised vp Benhatah the sonne of Iehoiadab, to pull him from the Sanctuary, and to cut him in peeces. For Dauid giueth this cause to Salomon against Ioab, that he slue the Captaines of the hoste of Israel, and shed bloud of battell in peace, and to this apparant & iust cause, it is not improbable but that Dauid remembred the ill affection of Ioab towards Salomon, which Ioab made manifest by the vntimely setting vp of Adonijah, Dauid yet liuing. Some other offence Ioab had committed against Dauid, of which in these words he put his sonne Salomon in minde; Thou knowest also what Ioab the sonne of Seruiah did to me, &c. Now whether this was meant by the killing of Abalom, contrary to the Kings desire, or by the proud words vsed to him when he mourned in Mahanaim for Abalom; or whether it were the publishing of Dauid's letter vnto him for the killing of Uriah, thereby to disgrace Salomon as descended of such a mother, the Scriptures are silent. True it is, that those great men of warre doe oftentimes behaue themselves exceeding insolently towards their Princes, both in respect of their seruice done, as also because they flatter themselves with an opinion, that either their masters cannot misse them, or that they dare not offend them. But this kinde of pride hath ouer-throwne manie a worthy man otherwise deseruing great honour and respect.

1. King. 2.

1. King. 2.

1. King. 2.

1. King. 2.

He also gaue order to Salomon to rid himselfe of Shimei, who not long before had cast stones at Dauid, and cursed him to his face. And albeit by reason of his oath and promise Dauid spared Shimei all the time himselfe liued, yet being dust and in the graue, hee slew him by the hand of Salomon his sonne. Hence it seemeth that King Henry the seuenth of England had his patterne, when he gaue order to Henry the eighth to execute Pool as soone as himselfe was buried, hauing made promise to the King of Spaine when he deliuered Pool vnto him, that while hee liued hee would neuer put him to death, nor suffer violent hands to be laid vpon him.

And yet did not the execution of Ioab yeeld vnto Salomon any such great profit or affluence as he hoped for. For he found a young Adad of Idumea, & Refin of Damascus so to vex him: who, as the Scriptures witness, were emboldened to enterprize vpon Salomon, hearing that Dauid slept with his fathers, and that Ioab the Captaine of the Host was dead. Now when Dauid had reigned in all fortie yeares, to wit, in Hebron 7. yeers, and in Ierusalem three and thirty, he died.

For his person, he was of small stature, but exceeding strong. For his internall gifts and graces he forsaure exceeded all other men, as putting his humane frailtie apart, he was said by God himselfe to be a man according to his owne heart. The Psalmes which he wrote, witness his pietie and his excellent learning: of whom Hierome to Paulinus:

Paulinus: David Simonides noster, Pindarus, & Alcæus, Flaccus, quoque Catullus, & Serenus, Christum lyra personat, & in dechachordo Psalterio ab inferis suscitatur resurre-tem; David (saith he) our Simonides, Pindarus, Alcæus, Horace, Catullus and Seremus, hee playeth Christ on his Harp, and on a ten-stringed Psalter hee raiseth him up rising from the dead. And being both a King and a Prophet, he foretelleth Christ more lightly and lively than all the rest.

The book of the Psalmes, saith Glycas, was diuided, ordered and distinguished by Ezekias: but whether all the Psalmes were written by Dauid, it is diuersly disputed. For Athanasius, Cyprian, Lyranus, and others conceiue diuers Authors answering the titles of the severall Psalmes, as Moses, Salomon, and the rest hereafter named; and that only 73. Psalmes were composed by Dauid himselfe, namely, those which are intituled ipsius Dauid. For the 50. and the 72. with the ten that follow, are bestowed on Asaph the son of Barachia, eleven other on the sons of Korath; and eleven are ascribed to Moses, to wit, the 89. and the ten following, and so they are intituled in the old Hebrew Copies, though the vulgar and Septuagint (three excepted) stile them otherwise. The supposed nine Authors of these Psalmes which Dauid wrote not, Sixt. Senensis nameth as followeth, Salomon, Moses, (whom Aben Ezra, contrary to Hierome, maketh one of Dauid's singers) Asaph, Ethan, Ezra, Eman, Ezraira, Idithum, and the three sons of Chore. But
 S. Chrysostome makes Dauid the sole Author of all the Psalmes, and so doth S. Augustine, reasoning in this manner: Although (saith he) some there are that ascribe those Psalmes onely to Dauid, which are over-written ipsius Dauid, and the rest intituled ipsi Dauid, to others, this opinion, (saith he) Voca Evangelica Saluatoris ipsius refutatur, ubi ait quod ipse David in spiritu Christum dixerit esse suum Dominum, quoniam Psalmus 109. sic in-cipit, Dixit Dominus Domino meo, Sede a dextris meis, &c. The voyce of the Gospell refutes this opinion, where it saith, that Dauid himselfe in the spirit called Christ his Lord; because the 109. Psalm begins thus: The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand, &c. Lastly, his testimonies are used, both by Christ and the Apostles, and hee was as a pattern to all the Kings and Princes that succeeded him.

His Story, and all his particular actions, were written by the Prophets, Samuel, Na- athan, and Gad, as it is in the first of Chron. 29. vers. 19. For the severall parts of the books of Samuel which intreat chiefly of Dauid, were, as it seems, written by these three holy men.

Constantine Manasses hath an opinion, that the Trojans during the time of the siege sought for succour from Dauid, and that he stayed neuter in that warre. But it seemeth that Manasses did miscast the time 'twixt Dauid and the Trojan warre. For it is generally received that Troy fell between the times of Abdon and Sampson Judges of Israel, about the worlds year 2848. and Dauid died in the year 2991.

His treasures were exceeding great. For it is written in the 22. of the first of Chro- nicles, that he left Salomon for the building of the Temple a hundred thousand talents of gold, and a thousand thousand talents of siluer, and of brasse and yron passing all weight, which is more than any King in the world possesse himselfe, and his sonne, to whom he left it. For it amounteth to three thousand three hundred thirty & three cartload, and a third of a cartload of siluer, allowing two thousand weight of siluer or six thousand pound sterling to every cartload, besides threescore and seventeen millions of French Crowns, or of our money twenty three millions and a thousand pound: a matter, but for the testimony of the Scriptures, exceeding all beliefe. For that any riches were left him, it doth not appear, seeing that the Judges had not any treasure, nor any sovereign power to make levies; but when they went to the wars they were followed by such voluntaries, as the severall tribes by turns gave them: seeing also that Saul who was of a nitan parentage, and perpetually vexed and invaded by the Philistines, could not in all likelihood gather great riches (if any at all) his Territories being exceeding narrow, and therefore the better part possesse by his enemies.

Therefore it were not amisse to consider how Dauid within the space of not very many years, might amasse up such mighty treasures. For though parsimony be it selfe a great revenue, yet needs there must have been some other great means. It seems that he made the uttermost profit of all that he had, that was profitable. Eusebius in his 9. book and last chapter de Preparatione Evangelica, citeth the words of Eupolemus, who reporteth that David, among other preparations for the Temple, built a Navie in Melanis (or, as Vallalpandus corrects it, Achanis) a city of Arabia, and from thence sent men to digge for gold in the Iland Urphe, which Ortelius thinks was Ophir, though Eupolemus in this place of Eusebius (erring perhaps in this circumstance) saith that this Iland is in the red Sea: from whence, saith this Eupolemus, they brought gold into Jury. Pineda l. 4. de Rebus Salomonis, c. 1. thinks that David did this way also enrich himself, and citeth this testimonie of Eupolemus: and yet certainly David had many other wayes to gather riches. Much land doublelesse he gained by conquest from the Canaanites and Philistines, besides those fruitfull vallies near Jordan in Trachonitis and Basan, and the best of Syria, and other countries bordering the Israelites. These demaines belike he kept in his own hands, and with his infinite number of captives, which he took in his warres, which were not able to redeem themselves, husbanded those grounds for his greatest advantage. For it is written, 1 Chro. 17. that Jehonathan was over his treasures in the field, in the villages, in the cities, in the towns; that Ezri was over the labourers that tilled his ground; Simeï over the vineyards, and Sabdi over the store of the wine; Baal Hanan over the olive trees, and Joash over the store of the oyle: also that he had herd-men that had charge over his cattell, both in the high lands and in the plains, over his Sheep, Camels and Asses. And this custome of enriching themselves by husbandrie and cattell, the ancient Kings every where held, both before and after David's time. For wee read of Pharaoh, that hee spake to Joseph to appoint some of his brethren, or of their servants, to be rulers over his cattell. Wee read of Uzzia, that he loved husbandrie, had much cattell, and plough-men, and dressers of Vines: likewise wee read it in all Greek Poets, that the wealth of the ancient Kings did specially consist in their Herds and Flocks; whereof it were needlesse to cite Angus and Admetus, or any other for examples, the rule holding true in all. Now concerning David it is not unlikely, but that those captives which were not employed in husbandrie, were many of them used by him in all sorts of gainfull professions, as the ancient Romans in like manner used their slaves.

Gen. 47.
2 Chron. 26.

1 Chron. 31.

Numb. 31. 27.

To these profits (besides the tributes and impositions, which doubtlesse were great, and besides the innumerable presents which yearly were brought him, or extraordinarily sent him, by Tobu and others) wee may adde the great Spoiles which hee found in the Cities and Countries which hee conquered: also the head money which was gathered per legem capitacionis, By the law of capitation, or head money, every man rich or poor paying half a sicle of the Sanctuary, which is about as much as fourteen pence, and so in all it amounted to a wondrous summe in that Kingdome: wherein one thousand thousand five hundred and seventie thousand fighting men were numbered by Joab. Now although this law of capitation bee thought by some very learned, not to have been perpetuall (which opinion of theirs neverthelesse they confesse is against the Hebrew expositions) yet David upon this occasion is not unlikely to have put it in practise. And by these means might hee be able to leave those huge treasures to Salomon. Yet it may seem that of this great masse of gold and silver left by David, the least part was his own in private; and so will it appear the lesse wonderfull that hee left so much. Of his own liberalitie wee find, that hee gave to the building of the Temple three thousand talents of gold, and seven thousand talents of silver: a great summe, but holding a very small proportion to the other. Wherefore we are to consider, that the treasures of the Sanctuary it self were exceeding great, as needs they must have been, having received continuall encrease, without any losse or diminution ever since the time of Moses and Joshuah. The revenues of the Sanctuary (besides all manner of tithes and oblations, which defrayed the daily expences, and maintained the Priests and Levites) were partly raised out of the head money before mentioned; partly out of the spoiles gotten in warre. For all the bootie was divided into two parts, whereof the Souldiers had one, and the people which remained at home, had the other half; whereby all the country received benefit of the victory, yet so, that the Souldiers had a farre greater proportion than the rest, as being fewer, and therefore receiving more for every single share.

Out

Out of this purchase was deducted the Lords tribute, which was one in fiftie, of that which the people received, and one in five hundred, of that which was given to the Souldiers; namely, one hundred and one thousand part of the whole bootie. So in the spoil of Midian, thirty two thousand women being taken, the Armie had sixteen thousand of them for slaves, and the Congregation had other sixteen thousand; but out of the sixteen thousand given to the Armie, were exempted two and thirty for the Lords tribute. Out of the peoples number were taken three hundred and twenty. By this means, the lesse that the Armie was which had exposed it self to danger, the greater profit had every Souldier; but when it consisted of many hands, they who remaining at home were faine to undergoe more than ordinarie travell in domesticall affaires, did receive by so much the greater portion. But the Lords tribute was always certain, yea many times it was increased, either by some speciall commandement, as when all the gold, and silver, and other metalls found in Ferico, were consecrated unto God; or by the thankfulness of the Rulers and People, as when after the victorie obtained against the Midianites without the losse of one man, all Jewells, Bracelets, Earrings, and the like, were offered up, as voluntarie presents.

Num. 31. 40.

Jos. 6. 19.

Num. 31. 50.

Now howsoever the Israelites were many times oppressed, and troden down by other Nations, yet were not these treasures robbed or spoiled; for the enemies never gat possession of the Tabernacle that was in Shilo. Wherefore it cannot otherwise be, than that the wealth of the Sancturie must have been exceeding great; as containing above one hundredth part of all the money and other goods found by the Israelites in the whole Land of Canaan; and of all that was purchased by so many victories, as they obtained against the bordering Nations. For that this treasure was not defrauded of the due portion, it is evident; seeing that before the time of David and his Lieutenant Joab, it is recorded that Saul and Abner, and before them Samuel, had used to dedicate of the spoiles obtained in war, to maintain the house of the Lord: the like whereof may be well presumed of the former Judges and Captains of other Ages. Certain it is, that the Conquest of David brought into the Land far greater abundance of riches, than any former victories had purchased, those of Joshua perhaps excepted: but these vast summes of an hundred thousand Talents of silver, may seem rather to have been made up, by the addition of his winnings and liberalitie, to the treasures laid up in many former Ages, than to have been the meer fruits of his own industrie.

Now concerning the riches of Salomon, it is more manifest how he gathered them; for he received of yearly revenues with his tributes 666. Talents of gold, besides the Customs of Spices. He had also six rich Returns from the East India, which greatly increased his store. For his ships performed that voyage every three years, and he began that trade in the two and twentieth year of his reigne, and ruled fortie years. Besides this, all Judea and Israel were now mastered to his hands; all the Arabians his borderers, the Syrians of Zobah, of Damascena, of Palmyrena, of Ituraea; all of Idumea, Moab, and Ammon, paid him tribute; as likewise did the Hittites, who with the Perizites, Hivites, Jebeusites, and other races of the Canaanites, were not as yet extinguished, though subjected.

Into this flourishing estate was the Kingdome of Israel reduced by David, who after 40. years reign, and 70. years of life, dyed in a good age, full of daies, riches, & honour, and was buried in the Citie of David. It is written by Josephus that there was hid in David's Tombe a marvellous quantitie of treasures, insomuch as Hircanus (who first of the Chasmanai, or race of Macchabees, called himself King) one thousand and three hundred years after, drew thence three thousand Talents, to rid himself of Antiochus then besieging Jerusalem; & afterward Herod opening another Cell, had also an exceeding masse of gold and silver therein. And it was an ancient custome to burie treasure with the dead. So the Peruvians and other Americans did the like, which being discovered by the Spaniards, they enriched themselves by nothing so much in their first Conquest. That Salomon did burie so much treasure in his fathers grave, it would hardly be believed, in regard of the great exactions with which hee was faine to burthen the people, notwithstanding all the riches which hee got otherwise, or which were left unto him: were it notwithall considered that his want of money grew from such magnificent employments. Particularly of the Sepulchre of David the Scriptures have no mention, but onely the Sepulchres of the Kings of Juda, as of an honourable place of buriall. Yet the Monuments,

Of the Philistims, whom David absolutely mastered: and of sundry other contemporaries with David.

Of the Philistims, whose pride David was the first that absolutely mastered, in this conclusion of David's time somewhat here may be spoken.

They descended of Casloim, who, according to Isidor and Josephus, was one of the Sonnes of Misraim, and was surnamed Philistim, as Esau was surnamed Edom, and Jacob Israel. There were of them five Cities or petty principalities, namely, Asdod, Gaza or Aczaph, Ascalon, Geth or Gath, and Accaron. It seemeth that Casloim was the first founder of this Nation, because of his kindred on either hand, the Cannites and the Egyptians.

The first King of these Philistims, which the Scriptures have named, was that Abimelech which loved Sara, Abrahams wife.

The second Abimelech lived at once with Isaac, to whom Isaac repaired in the time of famine, Abimelech then residing at Gerar, in the border of Idumaea, which Abimelech fancied Isaac his wife, as his father had done Sara.

After Abimelech the second, the Philistims Kings are not remembered in the Scriptures, till David's time: perhaps the government was turned into Aristocratical. For they afterwards named Princes of the Philistims, howsoever Achis be named King of Gath, the same to whom David fled, and who again gave him Siklag to inhabit in Sauls time.

After him we read of another Achis who lived with Salomon, to whom Shimei travelled to fetch back his fugitive servant, what time the seeking of his servant was the loss of his life. Jeremie the Prophet speaketh of the Kings of Palestin or Philistim. Amos nameth the King of Ascalon: Zacharias, a King of Gaza. The rest of the wars of the Philistims are remembered in the Catalogue of the Judges, of Saul and David, and so therefore I shall not need to collect the particulars in this place.

There lived at once with David, the third of the Silvii King of Alba, called Latinus Silvius, who is said to have ruled that part of Italy fifty years. And about his fourteenth year Codrus the last King of the Athenians died, to whom succeeded the first Prince of those, who being called after Medon, Medontida, without regall name governed Athens during their life.

The reasons which moved the Athenians to change their government, were not drawn from any inconvenience found in the rule of sovereignty, but in honour of Codrus only. For when the Gracians of Doris, a region between Phocis, & the mountain of Oeta, sought counsell from the Oracle, for their successe in the warres against the Athenians, it was answered, that then undoubtedly they should prevail and become Lords of that State, when they could obtain any victory against the Nation, and yet preserve the Athenian King living. Codrus by some intelligence being informed of this answer, withdrew himself from his own forces, and putting on the habit of a common souldier, entred the Camp of the Dorians, and killing the first hee encountered, was himselfe forthwith cut in pieces.

Eupales the 31. King of Assyria, which others account but the 30. began to rule that Empire, about the 13. year of David, and held it 38. years.

Neer the same time began Ixion the second King of the Heraclics, the sonne of Euristhenes in Corinth, and Agis the second of the Heraclics in Lacedamon: in honour of which Agis, his successours were called Agids, for many years after. Hee restored the Laconians to their former libertie: he overcame the Citizens of Helos in Laconia, who had refused to pay him tribute: he condemned them and theirs to perpetuall slavery: whereof it came, that all the Messenians, whom at length they brought into the like bondage, were after call Helots.

In like sort from the Slavi came the world Slave. For when that Nation issuing out of Sarmatia, now called Russia, had seized upon the country of Illyria, & made it their own by conquest, their victory pleased them so highly, that thereupon they called themselves by by a new name, Slavos, which is in their language Glorious. But in after times (that warmer Climate having thawed their northern hardiness, and not ripened their wits) when they were trodden down, and made servants with their neighbours, the Italians which kept many of them in bondage, began to call all their bondmen Slaves, using the word as a name of reproach: in which sense it is now current through many countries.

Other Chronologers make this Agis the third King of Sparta, and somewhat later, about the 23. year of David, and say, that Achestratus was the fourth King of this race, the same whom Eusebius calls Labotes, and sets him in the thirteenth year of Salomon.

In the tenth year of Achestratus, Androclus the third sonne of Codrus, assisted by the Iones, built Ephesus in Caria, who after the adjoyning of the Ile of Samos to his territorie, was slain by the Carians, whose countrie he usurped. He was buried (saith Pausanias) in one of the gates of Ephesus called Magnetes, his armed Statua being set over him. Strabo reports that after Androclus had subdued the Ionians (the next province to Ephesus on the sea coast of Asia the lesse) he enlarged his Dominions upon the Aeolis, which joyneth to Ionis: and that his posteritie governed the Cities of Ephesus and Erythra by the name of Basilids in Strabo his own time. Of the expedition of the Iones how they came hither out of Peloponnesus, I have spoken already upon occasion of the return of the Heraclids into Peloponnesus, wherein, with the Dores, they expelled the Achai, and inhabited their places in that land, though this of the Iones succeeded that of the Heraclids 100. years.

The Citie of Ephesus became exceeding famous: first, for the Temple of Diana therein built, which had in length 425. foot, and 220. in breadth, sustained with 127. pillars of marble, of 70 foot high: whereof 27. were most curiously graven, and all the rest of choice marble polish, the work being first set out by Ctesiphon of Gnossos. Secondly, it became renowned by being one of the first that received the Christian faith, of which Timothy was Bishop; to whom and to the Ephesians, Saint Paul wrote his Epistles so intitled. The other Citie possess'd by Androclus in Aeolis, was also universally spoken of by reason of Sibylla, surnamed Erythra, who lived 740. years before Christ was born. S. Augustine avoweth that a Roman Proconsul shewed him in an antient Greek copie certain verses of this Prophetesse, which began (as S. Augustine changed them into Latine) in these words: Iesus Christus Dei Filius, Salvator; Iesus Christ Son of God, the Saviour.

About the time that Joab besieged Rabba in Moab, Vaphres began to govern in Egypt, the same that was father in law to Salomon, whose Epistles to Salomon, and his to Vaphres, are remembered by Eusebius out of Polemon. In the 21. of David, was the Citie of Magnesia in Asia the lesse founded; the same which is seated upon the river Maander, where Scipio gave the great overthrow to Antiochus. In this territorie are the best hories of the lesse Asia bred; whereof Lucan:

Et Magnetis equis, Minya gens cognita remis.

About the same time Cuma in Campania was built by the Inhabitants of Chalcis in Euboea, according to Servius, with whom Strabo joyneth the Cumeans of Aeolis, saying, that to the one of these people the government was given, with condition that the other should give name to the Citie. Of this Cuma was Ephores the famous scholar of Isocrates.

Eusebius and Cassiodor find the building of Carthage at this time, to wit, in the 31. year of David, but much mistaken. For the father of Dido was Mesinor the son of Badezor, brother to Jezebel, who married Achab King of Israel; and between the death of David, and the first of Achab, there were wasted about 95. years.

In this time also Acastus lived, the second of the Athenian Princes after Codrus, of which there were thirteen in descent before the State changed into a Magistracie of ten years. Some writers make it probable, that the Adians, led by Graus, the grand nephew of Orestes, possess'd the Citie and Iland of Thebes about this time. In the 32. year of David, Hiram began to reign in Tyre, according to Josephus, who saith that in his twelfth year Salomon began the work of the Temple. But it is a familiar error in Josephus, to misreckon times, which in this point he doth so strangely, as if hee knew not how at all to cast any account. For it is manifest, that Hiram sent Messengers, and Cedars unto David, soon after his taking of Jerusalem, which was in the very beginning of David's reign over Israel, when as yet hee had reigned onely seven years in Hebron over the house of Juda. Wherefore it must needs be that Hiram had reigned above 30. years.

years before Salomon; unless more credip should be given to those Tyrian records which are cited by Josephus than to the plain words of Scripture contradicting them. For, that it was the same Hiram which lived both with David and with Salomon; the Scriptures make it plainly manifest. In Da. Chap. 2. v. 46. is said, as follows: "I have found that which thou desiredst: forasmuch as thou saidst, that I should shew thee the interpretation of the dream."

CHAP. XVIII.
OF SALOMON.

of the establishing of Salomon: of birth-right, and the cause of Adonijah's death, and Salomon's wife. Amos

AL O M O N, who was brought up under the Prophet Zechariah, began to reign over Judea and Israel, in the year of the World 4999. He was called Sadomon by the appointment of God: He was also called Fediddia, or Theophilus; by Nathan; because the Lord loved him.

Hiram King of Tyre, after Salomons anointing, dispatched his
 21. ambassadors toward him, congratulating his establishment: a custom
 22. between Princes very ancient. Whence we read that David did in
 23. like sort salute Xerxes King of the Ammonites, after his obtaining the Kingdom
 24. 25. The beginning of *Salomon*s was in blood; though his reign were peaceable. For soon
 26. after *David*s death he caused his brother Adonijah to be slain by Besaiab the sonne of
 27. Isobab, killing occasion from *Adonijah*s desiring by Bersheba that the young maid
 28. Abisag (whom David had in his later dayes, to keep him warme) might be
 29. given to him. Whatsoever he pretended it was enough that Adonijah was his elder
 30. brother; and sought the Kingdom contrary to the will of David, whom God enclined
 31. towards Salomon. And yet is said that a word is enough to the wife, and he that sees but
 32. the claw may know whether it be a Lion or no: so it may seem that to the quick-
 33. sighted wisdom of Salomon, this motion of *Adonijah*s, was a demonstration of a new crea-
 34. tion. For they which had been Concubines to a King, might not after be touched but by King: whence Achitophel wished Absalom to take his fathers Concubines as a part of the Royaltie. And David after that wrong, determining to touch them no more, did not give them to any other, but shut them up; and they remained widowed untill their death. And this it seems, was the depth of Ishobeths quarrell against Abner, for having his fathers Concubine. And some signification of this custome may seem too in the words of God by Nathan to David: I have given thee thy Masters house, and thy Masters wives. And in the words of Saul upbraiding Jonathan, that he had chosen David to the shame of the nakednesse of his Mother: Hereupon perhaps was some reference to this purpose of Idonijah, to marry with her that was alwaies present with David in his latter daies, and who belike knew all that was past, for the conveying of the Kingdome to Salomon. There may be divers further occasions, as either that hee would learn such things by her as might be for the advantage of his ambition, or that he would perswade her to forge some strange tale about Dauids last Testament, or any thing else that might prejudice the title of Salomon.

elder brothers right to the Kingdome, it now here appears in the stories of the Fives. It is said indeed that the people made Saul King at Galgai: that is, they acknowledged and established him. For that he was King long before, no man can doubt, In like manner else-where the phrase of choosing or making their King, is to be expounded: as where in the prohibition, that they should not make themselves a King, it is said, Thou shalt make him King whom the Lord shall chuse. 1 Sam. 11. 14. Deut. 17. 30.

But to proceed with the acts of Salomon : at the same time that hee put Adonijah to death, he rid himself also of Joab, and three years after of Shimei ; as David had adviced him : he displaced also the Priest Abiathar, who took part with Adonijah against him :
 10 but in respect of his office, and that he followed David in all his afflictions, and because he had born the Ark of God before his Father, he spared his life. And thus being established in his Kingdome, hee tooke the daughter of Nophres King of Egypt to Wife : for so Eusebius our of Eusepius calls him. He offered a thousand sacrifices at Gibeon, where God appearing unto him in a dream, bade him ask what he would at his hands ; Salomon chooseth Wisedome, which pleased God. And God said unto him, Because thou hast asked this thing, and hast not asked for thy self long life, neither hast thou asked riches for thy self, nor hast asked the life of thine enemies, behold, I have done according to thy words: by which we may informe our selves, what desires are most pleasing to God, and what not. For the covering after long life in respect of our selves, cannot but proceed of self-love, 20 which is the root of all impiety : the desire of private riches is an affection of covetousness, which God abhorreth ; to affect revenge, is as much as to take the sword out of Gods hand, and to distrust his justice. And in that it pleased God to make Salomon know that it liked him, that he had not asked the life of his enemies, it could not but put him in mind of his brothers slaughter, for which he had not any warrant either from David, or from the Law of God ; but because Salomon desired wisedome onely, which taught him both to obey God, and to rule men, it pleased God to give him withall that which he desired not. And I have also given thee (saith God) that which thou hast not asked, both riches and honour. This gift of Wisedome our Commentators stretch to almost all kinds of learning : but that it comprehended the knowledge of the nature of plants
 30 and living creatures, the Scripture testifieth ; though no doubt the chief excellencie of Salomons wisedome, was in the knowledge of governing his Kingdome : whence, as it were for an example of his wisedome, the Scripture telleth how soon he judged the controversie between the two harlots. 1 King. 3. 9.

§. II.

of Salomons building and glorie.

HHe then entred into league with Hiram King of Tyre, from whom he had much of his materials for the Kings Palace and the Temple of God: for the building whereof he had received a double charge, one from his father David, and another from God. For like as it is written of David, that He called Salomon his sonne, and charged him to build a house for the Lord of Israel: so doth Tostatus give the force of a divine precept to these words, Behold, a son is born unto thee, &c. He shall build an house for my Name. 1 Chr. 22. 6.
To? 9. 26. in 1 Chron.

He began the work of the Temple in the beginning of the fourth year of his reign, & King. 8. at which time also he prepared his fleet at Ezionabab to trade for gold in the East Indies, that nothing might be wanting to supply the charge of so great a work. For, that the Temple was in building, while his fleets were passing to and fro, it is manifest. For the pillars of the Temple were made of the Almaggim trees brought from Ophir. Of this most glorious building, of all the particulars (whereof the form and example was given by God himself) many learned men have written, as Salmeron, Montanus, Ribera, Barradus, Azorius, Villalpandus, pineda, and others, to whom I refer the Reader. 1 Chr. 28. 19.

For the cutting and squaring of the Cedars which served that building, Salomon employed 30. thousand Carpenters, 10. thousand every month by course: he also used 80. thousand Malons in the mountain, and 70. thousand labourers that bare burdens, which is conceived, he selected out of the Proselites, besides three thousand three hundred masters of his work; so as he paid and employed in all, one hundred eighty three thousand and three hundred men; in which number the Sidanians, which were farre more skilfull in hewing timber than the Israelites, may (as I think) be included. For Hiram caused his servants to bring down the Cedars and Firtres from Libanon to the sea, and thence sent them in rasses to Foppe, or the next port to Jerusalem. For in the second of Chronicles the second Chapter, it is plain, that all but the thirty thousand Carpenters, and the over-seers, were strangers, and as it seemeth the vassals of Hiram, and of Vaphres King of Egypt. In recompence of all this timber and stone, Salomon gave Hiram twenty thousand measures of wheat, and twenty measures of pure oyle yearly. Eusebius out of Eupolemus in the ninth book of his preparation, the last Chapter, hath left us a Copie of Salomons Letter to Suron (which was the same as Hiram and Hiram) King of Tyre, in these words:

Rex Salomon *Suron*i, Tyri, Sydonis, atque Phœnicia regi, Amico paterno salutem. Scias me à Deo magno David patris mei regnum accepisse, cumque mihi pater præcepit templum Deo, quæ terram creavit, condere, ut etiam ad te scriberem præcepit: Scribis igitur, & peto à te ut artifices atque fabros ad edificandum Templum Dei mittere velis.

King Salomon to King Suron, of Tyre, Sydon, & Phœnicia King, & my fathers friend, sendeth greeting. You may understand that I have received of the great God of my father David, the Kingdom: and when my father commanded me to build a Temple to God which created heaven and earth, he commanded also that I should write to you: I write therefore to you, and beseech you, that you would be pleased to send me Artificers and Carpenters to build the Temple of God.

To which the King Suron made this answer.

Suron, Tyri, Sydonis, & Phœnicia Rex, Salomoni Regi salutem. Læti literis, gratias est Deo, qui tibi regnum patris tradidit: & quoniam scribis fabros, ministrosq. ad condendum Templum esse tibi mittendos, misi ad te millia hominum octaginta, & Architectum Tyrium hominem ex matre Judæa, virum in rebus architecturæ mirabilem. Curabis igitur ut necessariis non egeant, & Templo Dei condito, ad nos redeant.

Suron of Tyre, Sydon and Phœnicia King, to King Salomon greeting: When I read your Letters, I gave God thanks who hath installed you in your fathers kingdom. And because you write that Carpenters and Workmen may be sent to build Gods Temple, I have sent you fourscore thousand men, and a Master-builder, a Tyrian, born of a Jewish woman, a man admirable in building. You will be careful that all necessities be provided for them, and when the Temple of God is built, that they come home to us.

The Copies of these Letters were extant in Josephus time, as himself affirmeth, and to be seen (saith he) Tam in nostris quam in Tyriorum annalibus, as well in our own, as in the Tyrian annals. But he delivereth them somewhat in different termes, as the Reader may find in his Antiquities. But were this intercourse between Salomon and Hiram either by message or by writing, it is somewhat otherwise delivered in the Scriptures, than either Eupolemus or Josephus set it down, but so, that in substance there is little difference between the one and the other.

1 King. 5. from the 1. v. to the 9.

The like Letter in effect Salomon is said to have written to Vaphres King of Egypt, and was answered as from Hiram.

But whereas some Commenters upon Salomon, find that Hiram King of Tyre, and Vaphres King of Egypt, gave Salomon the title of Rex magnus, and cite Eupolemus in Eusebius, I do not find any such addition of magnus in Eusebius, in the last chapter of that ninth book; neither is it in Josephus in the eighth book and second chapter of the Jewes Antiquities: it being a vain title used by some of the Assyrian and Persian Kings, and used likewise by the Parthians, and many other after them, inasmuch as in later times it grew common, and was usurped by mean persons in respect of the great Hermus the first, which was honoured by that name for his noble qualities, as much or more than for his mightinesse.

After the finishing and dedication of the Temple and house of the Lord, Salomon fortified Jerusalem with a treble wall, and repaired Hazor which had been the ancient Metropolis of the Canaanites, before Joshua's time: so did he Gaza of the Philistines: he built Berobon, Gerar, and the Millo or munition of Jerusalem. For Pharaoh (as it seemeth in favour of Salomon) came up into the edge of Ephraim, and took Gerar, which place the Canaanites yet held, and put them to the sword, and burnt their Citie. The place and Territory he gave Salomons wife for a dowrie. And it is probable, that because Salomon was then busied in his magnificent buildings, and could not attend the war, that he entrusted his father in law to rid him of these neighbours, which Pharaoh performed. But hee thereby taught the Egyptians to visit those parts again before they were sent for; and in his son Rehoboams time Sheshack this mans successor did sack Jerusalem it selfe.

Salomon also built Megiddo in Manasse, on this side Jordan, and Balah in Dan: also Thadmor, which may be either Ptolomies Thamoron in the desert of Juda, or (as Josephus Jos. l. 8. ant. c. 2. thinks) Palmyra in the desert of Syria; which Palmyra, because it stood on the utmost border of Salomons dominion to the northeast of Libanus, and was of Dauids conquest when he wan Damascus, it may seem that Salomon therefore bestowed thereon the most cost, and fortified it with the best Art that that age had. Josephus calls this place Thada-mora, by which name (saith he) given by Salomon, the Syrians as yet call it. Hierom in his book of Hebrew places, calls it Thermeth. In after-times, when it was rebuilt by Adrian the Emperour, it was honoured with his name, and called Adrianopolis. In respect of this great charge of building, Salomon raised tribute through all his Dominions, besides an hundred and twenty talents of gold received from Hirams servants; Salomon offered Hiram twenty towns in or neer the upper Galilee, but because they stood in an unfruitfull and marshy ground, Hiram refused them, and therefore was the territory called Chabul.

These towns, as it is supposed, lay in Galilee of the Gentiles, Non quod Gentes ibi habitarent: sed quia sub ditione regis Gentilis erat, Not that it was posselt by the Gentiles (saith Naclerus) but because it was under the rule of a King that was a Gentile. Howsoever it were, it is true that Salomon in the 21. year fortified those places which Hiram refused. Further, he made a journey into Syria Zobah, and established his tributaries, the first & last warre (if in that expedition he were driven to fight) that he made in person in all his life. Hee then visited the border of all his Dominions, passing from Thadmor to the North of Palmyrena, and so to the Desarts of Idumea, from whence he visited Eziongeber and Eloth the uttermost place of the South of all his Territories, bordering to the red sea: which Cities I have described in the Story of Moses.

S. III.

Of Salomons sending to Ophir, and of some seeming contradictions about Salomons riches, and of Pineda's conceit of two strange passages about Affrick.

Here Salomon prepareth his Fleet of Ships for India, with whom Hiram joyned in that voyage, and furnished him with Mariners and Pilots, the Tyrians being of all other the most expert seamen. From this part of Arabia which at this time belonged to Edom, and was conquered by David, did the Fleet passe to the East-India, which was not farre off, namely, to Ophir, one of the Islands of the Moluccas, a place exceeding rich in gold: witnesse the Spaniards, who notwithstanding all the abundance which they gather in Peru, doe yet plant in those Islands of the East at Manila, and recover a great quantity from thence, and with lesse labour than they do in any one part of Peru, or new Spain.

The return which was made by these Ships amounted to four hundred and twenty talents, but in the second of Chronicles the eighth, it is written 450. talents: whereof 30. talents went in expence for the charge of the Fleet, and wages of men; and 420. talents, which makes five and twenty hundred and twenty thousand Crowns, came cleer. And thus must those two places be reconciled. As for the place 1 Reg. 10. 14. which speaketh of six hundred sixty and six talents of gold; that summe, as I take it, is of other receipts of Salomons which were yearly, and which came to him; besides those profits from Ophir.

My opinion of the land of Ophir, that it is not Peru in America (as divers have thought) but a Countrey in the East-Indies; with some reason why at those times they could not make more speedy return to Jerusalem from the East-Indies, than in three years; and that Tharbis in Scripture is divers times taken for the Ocean, hath been already declared in the first book.

c. 8. s. 9. 10. 13
lib. 4. de rebus
Salomonis c. 6.
c. 15.

Only it remaineth that I should speak somewhat of Pineda his strange conceits, who being a Spaniard of Batiza, would fain have Gades or Calis-matis, in old times called Tartessus, which is the Southwest corner of that Province, to bee the Tharxis from whence Salomon fetcht his gold; for no other reason, as it seems, but for love of his own Countrey, and because of some affinity of sound between Tharxis and Tartessus. For whereas it may seem strange that it should be three years ere they that took ship in the Red sea, should return from the East-Indies to Ferusalem, this hath been in part answered already. And further the intelligent may conceive of sundry lets, in the digging and refining of the metall, and in their other traffick, and in their land-carriages between Ferusalem and the Red sea, and perhaps also else-where: so that wee have no need to make Salomons men to goe many thousand miles out of their way to Gades, round about all Africk, that so they might be long a coming home.

For the direct way to Gades (which if Salomon and the Israelites knew not, the Tyrians which went with them could not have been ignorant of) was along the Mediterranean sea, and so (besides many wonderfull inconveniences, and terrible navigation in rounding Africa) they should have escaped the troublesome land-carriage between Ferusalem and the Red sea, through dry, desert, and the theevish Countreys: and within 30. mile of Ferusalem at Foppe, or some other haven in Salomons own Countrey, have laden and unladen their ships.

But this direct course they could not hold (saith Pineda) because the huge Island of Atlantis, in largeness greater than all Africk and Asia, being swallowed up in the Atlantic Ocean, hindred Salomons ships from passing through the straits of Gibraltar: for this hee allegeth Plato in Timeo. But that this calamity happened about Salomons time, or that thereby the straits of Gades were filled with mud, and made unpassable, that there could be no coming to Gades by the Mediterranean sea; or that this indraught where the sea runneth most violently, and most easily scoureth his channell, should be filled with mud, and not also the great Ocean in like manner, where this huge Island is supposed to have stood; or that Salomons ships being in the Red sea, should neglect the golden Mines in the East-Indies (which were infinitely better and neerer to the Red sea, than any in Spain) to seek gold at Cadyz by the way of compassing Africa; it is most ridiculous to imagine. For the Spaniard himself that hath also the rich Peru in the West, fortifieth in the East-Indies, and inhabites some part thereof, as in Manila, finding in those parts no lesse quantity of gold the small territory which hee there possessed considered) than in Peru.

The same Pineda hath another strange passage round about all Africa, which elsewhere he dreams of: supposing whereas Fonias sailing to Tharxis the City of Cilicia, was cast out in the Mediterranean sea, and taken up there by a Whale, that this Whale in three dayes swimming above twelve thousand English miles along the Mediterranean sea, and so through the straights of Gades, and along all the huge seas round about Africa, cast up Fonias upon the shore of the Red sea, that so he might have perhaps some six miles the shorter (though much the worse) way to Ninive. This conceit hee grounds onely upon the ambiguity of the word Suph, which oftentimes is an Epitheton of the Red sea (as if we should call it mare algosum, the sea full of weeds) for the Red sea. But in Fonias c. 2. 5. it is generally taken in the proper signification for weeds, and not as Pineda would have it, who in this place against his own rule (which elsewhere he giveth us) supposeth strange miracles without any need. For this long voyage of the Whale, finished in three dayes, is a greater miracle, than the very preservation of Fonias in the belly of the Whale: and therefore seeing there is no necessity of this miracle, we lend it back unto him, keeping his own rule, which in this place he forgets; Miracula non sunt multiplicanda. And again, Non sunt miracula gratis danda, nec pro arbitrio nova fingenda. Miracles are not to be multiplied without necessity, nor delivered without cause, nor feigned at pleasure. Therefore we leave this man in his dreams, which (were he not otherwise very learned and judicious) might be thought unworthy the mentioning. But to proceed with our storie of Salomon.

The Queen of Saba's coming from farre to Salomon, (as seems, from Arabia Felix, & not, as some think, from Ethiopia) and her rich presents, and Salomons reciprocal magnificence, and his resolving of her difficult questions; those are set down at large in the Text. But herein Josephus is greatly mistaken, who calls this Queen of Saba Nicaules, Nicaules, the succesor (saith he out of Herodotus) of those thirty and eight Egyptian Pharaohs, Kings which succeeded Meneus the founder of Memphis; adding, that after this Egyptian, and the father in law of Salomon, the name of Pharaoh was left off in Egypt. For as it is else-where proved that the Queen was of Arabia, not of Egypt and Ethiopia; so were there other Pharaohs after the father in law of Salomon. Yea, above three hundred years after Salomon, Pharaoh Necho slew Josias King of Juda.

It is also written of Salomon, that he kept in garrisons fourteen thousand Chariots, and twelve thousand horsemen; that he spent in Court every day thirty measures of fine flower, three score measures of wheat, one hundred sheep, besides stags and fallow Deer, bugles and fowle; four thousand stalls of horses he had for his Chariots and other uses, and for the twelve thousand horsemen of his guard. For, the ten thousand stalls in the first of Kings the fourth, are to be taken but for so many horses, whence in the second of Chronicles the ninth, it is written but four thousand stalls or teams, and in every teeme ten horses, as Junius and the Geneva understand it. He was said to be wiser than any men, yea than were Ethan the Ezrahite, than Heman, Chalcal, or than Darda, to which Junius addeth a fifth, to wit, Ezra. For the Geneva maketh Ethan an Ezrahite by Nation. Josephus writes them, Athan, Aman, Chalceus and Donan the sons of Hemon. Hee spake three thousand Proverbs, and his songs were one thousand and five, whereof either the most part perished in the Captivity of Babylon, or else because many acts of Salomons were written and kept among the publick Records of Civill causes, and not Ecclesiasticall, therefore they were not thought necessary to be inserted into Gods Book.

S. IIII.

Of the fall of Salomon, and how long he lived.

Now as he had plenty of all other things, so had hee no scarcity of women. For besides his seven hundred Wives, hee kept three hundred Concubines, and (forgetting that God had commanded that none of his people should accompany the daughters of Idolaters) he took Wives out of Egypt, Edom, Moab, Ammon, Zidon and Heth: and when he fell a doting, his Wives turned his heart after other gods, as Asteroth of the Zidonians, Milcom or Molech of the Ammonites, and Chemosh of Moab.

These things God punished by Adad of Idumaea, Rezin of Damascus, and by Ferobeam his own servant, and one of the masters of his works, who by the ordinance of God tare from his son Roboam, ten of the twelve parts of all the territorie he had. Deus dum in peccatores animadvertit, aliorum peccatis utitur, quae ipse non fecit: God punishing sinners, useth the sins of others, which he himself wrought not. P. Mart. in reg.

In the reign of Salomon (as in times of long peace) were few memorable actions by him performed, excepting his buildings with other workes of magnificence, and that great Indian voyage already mentioned. Fortie years he reigned; how many he lived, it is not written, and must therefore be found only by conjecture. The most likely way to ghesse at the truth in this case is, by considering the actions of David before and after Salomons birth, whereby we may best make estimation of the years which they consumed, and consequently learn the true, or most likely year of his nativity. Seven years David reigned in Hebron: in his eighth year hee took Ferusalem, and warred with the Philistims, who also troubled him in the year following. The bringing home of the Ark seems to have been in the tenth year of David, and his intention to build the Temple in the year ensuing, at which time hee had sufficient leisure, living in rest. After this he had warres with the Philistims, Moabites, Aramites, and Edomites, which must needs have held him five years, considering the Aramites of Damasco raised warre against him; after such time as hee had beaten Hadadezar; and that in every of these warres, he had the entire victory. Neither is it likely, that these services occupied any longer time, because in those dayes and places there were no wintering camps in use, but at convenient seasons of the year Kings went forth to warre, dispatching all with violence, rather than with temporizing; as maintaining their Armies, partly upon the spoyle of the enemies country, partly upon the private provision which every soldier made for himself. The 17. year of David, in which he took Mephibosheth the son of Ishbosheth, was the last year of his life.

of Jonathan into his Court, appeareth to have passed away in quiet; and the year following to have begun the warre with Ammon; but somewhat late in the end of Summer perhaps, it came to tryall of a battell (for Joab after the victorie, returned immediately to Jerusalem) the causes and preparations for that warre, taking up all the Summer. Dauids personall expedition against the Aramites, wherein he brought all the tributaries of Adadazer under his own allegiance, appears manifestly to have been the next years work, wherein he did cut off all means of succour from the Ammonites; all Syria, Moab, and Idumea being now at his own devotion. By this reckoning it must have been the 20. year of Dauids reign, and about the fiftieth of his life, in which hee sent forth Joab to besiege Rabba, and finished the warre of Ammon: wherein also he fell out the matter of Uriahs wife. So one half of Dauids reigne was very prosperous: in the other half hee felt great sorrow, by the expectation, execution, and sad remembrance of that heave judgement laid upon him by God for his foul and bloody offence.

Now very manifest it is, that in the year after the death of that child which was begotten in adultery, Salomon was born, who must needs therefore have been nineteen years old or thereabout when he began to reign at the decease of his father, as being begotten in the 21. year of his fathers reign, who reigned in all forty.

This account hath also good coherence with the following times of David, as may be collected out of ensuing Actions: for two years passed ere Abfolon slew his brother Ammon; three years ere his father pardoned him, and two years more ere he came into the Kings presence. After this he prepared horses and men, and laid the foundation of his rebellion, which seems to have been one years work. So the rebellion it self, with all that happened thereupon, as the Commotion made by Sheba, the death of Amasa, and the rest, may well seem to have been in the 30. year of Dauids reign.

Whether the three years of famine should be reckoned apart from the last years of war with the Philistims, or confounded with them, it were more hard than needfull to conjecture. Plain enough it is, that in the ten remaining years of David there was time sufficient, and to spare, both for the three years of famine, for four years of warre, and for numbring the people, with the pestilence ensuing; as also for his own last infirmities, and disposing of the Kingdome. Yet indeed it seems that the warre with the Philistims was but one years work, and ended in three or four fights, of which the two or three former were at Gob or Nob neer unto Gezer, and the last at Gath. This warre the Philistims undertook, as it seemeth, upon confidence gathered out of the tumults in Israel, and perhaps emboldened by Dauids old age: for hee fainted now in the battell, and was afterwards hindered by his men from exposing himself unto danger any more. So David had six or seven years of rest, in which time it is likely that many of his great men of Warre dyed (being of his own age) whereby the stirring spirit of Adonijah found little succour in the broken party of Joab the sonne of Zervia.

At this time it might both truly be said by David to Salomon, Thou art a wise man; and by Salomon to God, I am but a young child: for nineteen years of age might well agree with either of these two speeches.

Nevertheless there are some that gather out of Salomons professing himself a child, that he was but eleven years old when hee began to reign. Of these Rabbi Salomon seems the first Author, whom other of great learning and judgement have herein followed: grounding themselves perhaps upon that which is said of Abfolons rebellion, that it was after forty years, which they understood as years of Dauids reign. But whereas Rehoboam the sonne of Salomon was 41. years old when he began to reign, it would follow hereby that his father had begotten him, being himself but a child of 50 nine or ten years old; the difference between their ages being no greater, if Salomon (who reigned 40. years) were but eleven years old when his reign began. To avoid this inconvenience, Josephus allows 80. years of reign to Salomon; a report so disagreeing with the Scriptures, that it needs no confutation. Some indeed have in favour of this opinion, construed the words of Josephus, as if they included all the years of Salomons life. But by such reckoning hee should have been 40. years old at his Fathers death, and consequently should have been born long before his Father had wonne Jerusalem; which is a manifest untruth. Wherefore the 40. years remembred in Abfolons rebellion, may either seem to have reference to the space between Dauids first anointment, and the trouble which God brought upon him for his wickednesse, or perhaps be read (according to Josephus, Theodoret, and the Latiue translation) four years; which passed between the return of Abfolon to Jerusalem, and his breaking out.

S. V. of Salomons writings.

Here remain of Salomons workes, the Proverbs, the Preacher, and the song of Salomon. In the first hee teacheth good life, and correcteth manners; in the second, the vanity of humane nature; in the third, he singeth as it were the Epithalamion of Christ and his Church. For the Book intituled, The wisdom of Salomon, (which some give unto Salomon, and some make the elder Philo the Author thereof) Hierome and many others of the best learned make us think it was not Salomon that wrote it. Stylus libri sapientia (saith Hierome) qui Salomonis inscribitur; Græcam redolet eloquentiam; The Stile of the Book of wisdom, which is ascribed to Salomon, savoureth of the Græcians eloquence; and of the same opinion was S. Augustine, and yet he confesseth in the nineteenth Book, and twentieth Chapter of the Citie of God, that the Author of that Book hath a direct foretelling of the passion of Christ in these words: Circumveniamus justum, quoniam insuavis est nobis, &c. Let us circumvent the righteous, Sap. 2. for he is displeasing to us, he is contrary to our doings, he checketh us for offending against the Law, he makes his boast to have the knowledge of God, and he calleth himself the son of the Lord, &c. and so doth the course of all the following words point directly at Christ. The Books of Ecclesiastes, Proverbs and Cantica Canticorum, Rabbi Moses Kimchi ascribeth to Isay the Prophet, Suidas and Cedrenus report, that Salomon wrote of the remedies of all diseases, and graved the same on the sides of the Porch of the Temple, which (they say) Ezechias pulled down, because the people, neglecting help from God by prayer, repaired thither for their recoveries.

Of Salomons Books of Invocations, and Inchantments to cure diseases, and expell evil spirits, Josephus hath written at large, though (as I conceive) rather out of his own invention, or from some uncertain report, than truly.

He also speaketh of one Eliazarus, who by the root in Salomons ring dispossessed divers persons of evil spirits in the presence of Vespasian, and many others, which I will not stand to examine.

Certainly, so strange an example of humane frailtie hath never been read of as this King: who having received wisdom from God himself, in honour of whom, and for his onely service, hee built the first and most glorious Temple of the world: he that was made King of Israel and Judea, not by the law of Nature, but by the love of God; and became the wisest, richest, and happiest of all Kings, did in the end, by the perswasion of a few weak and wretched Idolatrous Women, forget and forsake the Lord of all the world; and the giver of all goodnesse, of which he was more liberall to this King, than to any that ever the world had. Of whom Syracides writeth in this manner: Salomon reigned in a peaceable time, and was glorious, for God made all quiet round about, that hee might build a house to his Name, and prepare the Sanctuary for ever; How wise wast thou in thy youth, and wast filled with understanding; as with a fount? Thy mind covered the whole earth, and hath filled it with grave and dark sentences. Thy name went abroad in the Isles, and for thy peace thou wast beloved, &c. but thus hee concludeth: Thou didst bow thy loynes to Women, and wast overcome by thy body; thou didst stain thine honour, and hast defiled thy posteritie, and hast brought wrath upon thy children, and felt sorrow for thy folly, cap. 2.7.

S. VI. of the Contemporaries of Salomon.

Neer the beginning of Salomons reign, Agessilaus the third of the Heraclide in Corinth; Labotes in Lacedæmon; and soon after Silvius Alba, the fourth of the Silvii, swayed those Kingdomes: Laosthenes then governing Assyria; Agasthus and Archippus the second and third Princes after Codrus, ruling the Athenians.

In

In the six and twentieth of Salomons reign, Hiram of Tyre dyed, to whom Balistras succeeded, and reigned seventeen years, after Mercators account; who reckons the time of his rule by the age of his sons. Josephus gives him fewer years. Theophilus Antiochus against Antolichus finds Bozorius the next after Hiram, if there be not some Kings omitted between the death of Hiram and the reign of Bozorius.

Vaphres being dead, about the twentieth of Salomon, Sefac or Shishak (as our English Geneva termes him) began to govern in Egypt, being the same with him whom Diodorus calleth Sofachis; Josephus, Susac; Cedrenus, Suscesinus; Eusebius in the colume of the Egyptian Kings, Smendes; and in that of the Hebrewes, Susac. Josephus in the eighth of his Antiquities, reproveth it as an error in Herodotus, that he ascribeth the Acts of Susac to Sesoftris, which perchance Herodotus might have done by comparison, accounting Sefac another Sesoftris, for the great things he did.

Of the great acts and vertues of King Sesoftris I have spoken already in the story of the Egyptian Princes: onely in this he was reprov'd, that he caused four of his captive Kings to draw his Caroch, when he was disposed to be seen, and to ride in triumph: one of which four, saith Eutropius, at such time as Sesoftris was carried out to take the aire, cast his head continually back upon the two foremost wheeles next him; which Sesoftris perceiving, asked him what he found worthy the admiration in that motion: to whom the captive King answered, That in those he beheld the instability of all worldly things; for that both the lowest part of the wheele was suddenly carry'd about, and became the highest, and the upmost part was as suddenly turned downward, and under all: which when Sesoftris had judiciously weighed, he dismissed those Princes, and all other from the like servitude in the future. Of this Sesoftris, and that hee could not be taken for Sefac, I have spoken at large in that part of the Egyptian Kings preceding.

CHAP. XIX.

Of Salomons Successors untill the end of Jehosaphat.

S. I.

Of Rehoboam his beginnings; the defection of the ten Tribes, and Rehoboams Idolatry.

Rehoboam the Sonne of Salomon by Nahama an *Ammonitess*e, now forty years old, succeeded his Father Salomon, and was annointed at Sichem, where the ten Tribes of Israel were assembled: who attended a while the return of Feroboam as yet in Egypt, since he fled thither, fearing Salomon. After his arrivall the people presented a Petition to Rehoboam, to be eased of those great Tributes laid on them by his Father, Sic enim firmitus ei fore Imperium, si amari mallet quam metui, so should his Empire (saith Josephus) be more assured, if hee desired rather to be beloved than feared: whereof hee took three dayes to deliberate before his answer; of whom therefore it could not be said as of David, that hee was wiser than all his Teachers. For as of himself hee knew not how to resolve; so had hee not the judgement to discern of Counsels, which is the very test of wisdom in Princes, and in all men else. But notwithstanding that hee had consulted with those grave and advised men, that served his Father, who perswaded him by all means to satisfie the multitude: hee was transported by his familiars and favourites, not onely to continue on the backs of his subjects those burdens which greatly crusht them; but (vaunting falsely of greatnesse exceeding his fathers) he threatened in sharp, or rather in terrible termes, to lay yet heavier, and more unsupportable loads on them. But as it appeared in the successe, those younger advisers greatly mistook the nature of severity, which without the temper of clemency is no other than cruelty it self: they also were ignorant that it ought to be used for the help, and not for the harm of subjects. For what is the strength of a King left by his people? and what cords or fetters have ever lasted long, but those which have been twisted and forged by love onely: His witlesse parasites could well judge of the Kings disposition: and being well learned therein, though ignorant in all things else, it sufficed and enabled them sufficiently for the places they held. But this answer of Rehoboam did not a little advance Feroboams designs: For being foretold by the Prophet Achish of his future advancement; these the Kings threats (changing the peoples love into feare) confirmed and gave courage to his hopes. For he was no sooner arrived, than elected King of Israel: The people cryed out, What portion have we in David? wee have no inheritance in the Soane of Israhel. Now though themselves, even all the Tribes of Israel, had consented to David: anointing at Hebron the second time, acknowledging that they were his bones and his flesh: yet now after the manner of rebels, they forgot both the bands of nature, and their duty to God; and, as all alienate resolved hearts doe, they served themselves for the present, with impudent excuses. And now over-late, and after-time, Rehoboam sent Adoram, one of the Taxers of the people, a man most hateful to all his Subjects, to pacifie them: whom they instantly beat to death with stones. Whereupon the King affrighted, got him from Sichem with all speed, and recovered Jerusalem, where preparing to invade Israel, with an hundred and fourscore thousand Cholonites, Shimei in the person of God commanding to the contrary, all was stayed for the present. About the mean time Feroboam the new King fortified Sichem on this side, and Beerseba on the other side of Jordan; and fearing that the Union and exhortation of one Religion would disjoyne the peoples hearts again to the House of David, and having in all libellous and ill promises the Egyptians to follow their Idolatry, hee set up two Calves of gold for the children of Israel to worship, impiously perswading them that those were the Gods, or at least by these hee represented those Gods which delivered them out of Egypt: and refusing the service of the Levites, hee made Priests fit for such gods. It must needs be, that by banishing the Levites which served David and Salomon through all Israel, Feroboam greatly enriched himself: as taking into his hands all those Cities which were given them by Moses and Joshua, for as it is written, The Levites left their suburbs, and their possession, and came to Juda &c. This irreligious policie of Feroboam (which was the foundation of an Idolatry that never could be rooted out, untill Israel for it was rooted out of the Land) was by Prophecy and Miracles impugned sufficiently when it first began; but the affections maintaining it, were so strong, that neither Prophecy nor Miracle could make them yeeld. Feroboam could not be removed now by the Authority of Ahia, who from the Lord had first promised unto him the Kingdom; not by the withering of his own hand as hee stretched it over the Altar, which also gave a wonder according to the signe, which the man of God had shew him by the commandment of God, who again recovered and cured him of that disease; yet he continued as obstinate an Idolater as before, for he held it the safest course in policie to proceed as he had begun. This impious invention of Feroboam, who forsook God; and the Religion of his forefathers, by God and his Ministers taught them; was by a modern Historian compared with the policies of late Ages; observing well the practice of his Nation, being an Italian born. Sic qui hodie (saith he) politici vacillant, & propria commoditate presentisq; utilitates sibi tanquam ultimum finem constituent; easdem quam vocant status in capite omnium ponunt: pro ipsa tuenda, promovenda, conservanda, amplianda, nihil non faciendum putant. Si injuria proximo irroganda, si justitia honestasq; leges subvertenda, si religio ipsa pessundanda, si deniq; omnia jura divina & humana violanda, nihil intentatum; nil per fas nefasq; relinquendum consent; cunctantur, omnia pericant, nihil ad ipsos, modo id, quod ere sua esse sibi persuadent, obtineant; ac si nullus sit qui talia curet, castigare ve possit Deus: So they who are now called Politicians, propounding to themselves as their utmost end and scope, their own commoditie and present profit, are wont to allege the case of state forsooth, as the principall point to be regarded: for the good of the state, for advancing, preserving, or encreasing of the state, they think that they may doe any thing. If they mean to oppress their neighbours; to overturn all Lawes of justice and honesty, if Religion it self must goe to wrack; yea, if all rights of God and man must be violated; they will try all courses, be it right, be it wrong, they will doe any thing. Let all goe to ruine, what care they, so long as they may have what they would; who should say, there were no God that would offer to meddle in such matters, or had power to correct them.

Indeed this allegation of raggione del stato, did serve as well to uphold, as at the first first it had done to bring in this vile Idolatry of the ten Tribes. Upon this ground Amos the Priest of Bethel counselled the Prophet Amos not to prophesie at Bethel; for (saith he) it is the Kings Court. Upon this ground even Jehu that had massacred the Priests of Baal, in zeal for the Lord, yet would not in any wise depart from that politique sinne of Feroboams the sonne of Nebad, which made Israel to sinne. It was reason of state that perswaded the last famous French King Henry the fourth to change his Religion, yet the Protestants whom he forsook, obeyed him, but some of the Papists whom hee followed, murdered him. So strongly doth the painted vizard of wise proceeding delude even those that know the foul face of impietie lurking under it: and behold the wretched ends that have ever followed it; whereof Jehu, and all the Kings of Israel had, and were themselves very great examples.

of Rehoboam his impietie; for which he was punished by Sesac: of his end, and Contemporaries.

V Hile Feroboam was occupied in setting up his new Religion, Rehoboam on the other side, having now little hope to recover the Provinces lost, strengthened the principall places remaining with all endeavour; for he fortified and victualled fifteen Cities of Juda and Benjamin: not that he feared Feroboam alone, but the Egyptians, to whom Feroboam had not only fastned himself, but withall invited them to invade Judea: laying perchance before them the uncountable riches of David and Salomon, which might now be easily had, seeing ten of the twelve Tribes were revolted, and become enemies to the Judaans. So as by those two waies (of late years of ten trodden) to wit, change of Religion, and invitation of forraign force, Feroboam hoped to settle himself in the seat of Israel, whom yet the powerfull God for his Idolatry in few years after rooted out, with all his. Rehoboam having also, as hee thought, by fortifying divers places, assured his estate, forsook the law of the living God, and made high Places, and Images, and Groves, on every high Hill, and under every green Tree.

And therefore in the fifth year of his reign, Sesac or Shishac before spoken of, being now King of Egypt, and with whom, as well Adad of Idumaea, as Feroboam, were familiar, and his instruments, entred Judea with twelve thousand Chariots, and threecore thousand Horse, besides foot-men, which Josephus numbers at four hundred thousand: This Armie was compounded of four Nations: Egyptians, Lubaans, Succaans, and Cusites. The Lubaans were Lybaans, the next bordering Region to Egypt, on the West-side. The Cusites were of Petrea, and of the desert Arabia, which afterward followed Zera against Asa King of Juda. The Succaans according to Junius his opinion, were of Succoth, which signifieth Tents: he doth suppose that they were the Troglodites, mentioned often in Plinie, Ptolomie, and other Authors. The Troglodites inhabited not farre from the banks of the red Sea, in 22. degrees from the line Northward, about six hundred English miles from the best and Maritimate part of Egypt: and therefore I do not think that the Succims or Succai were those Troglodites, but rather those Arabians which Ptolomie calls Arabes Egyptii, or Ichthyophagi, which possesse that part of Egypt behind the mountains called Alabastrini, and the red Sea, farre neerer Egypt, and readier to be levied than those removed Savages of the Troglodites.

With this great and powerfull Army, Sesac invaded Judea, and (besides many other strong Cities) wan Jerusalem it self; of which, and of the Temple, and Kings house, he took the spoyle, carrying away (besides other treasures) the golden shields which Salomon had made, in imitation of those which David recovered from Adadazer, in the Syrian war: these Rehoboam supplied with Targets of brasse, which were fit enough to guard a King of his quality: whom Syracides calleth, The foolishnesse of the people.

From this time forward the Kings of Egypt claimed the sovereignty of Judea, and held the Jews as their Tributaries: Sesac, as it seems, rendring up to Rehoboam his places on that condition. So much may be gathered out of the word of God, where promising the deliverance of Juda after their humiliation, he doth notwithstanding leave them under the yoke of Egypt, in these words: Nevertheless they (to wit, the Judaans) shall be his servants, that is, the servants of Sesac.

After

After this overthrow and dishonour, Rehoboam reigned twelve years, and his losses received by Sesac, notwithstanding, he continued the war against Feroboam all his lifetime. After his death Feroboam governed Israel four years.

Rehoboam lived 58. years, and reigned 17. his story was written at large by Shemeiah and Hiddon the Prophets, but the same perished with that of Nathan, and the rest.

With Rehoboam, Archippus, and Tersippus, the third and fourth Archontes or Governours for life after Codrus, governed in Athens. Abdastrartus, or Abstrartus, in Tyre. Dorishus the fifth of the Heraclide in Sparta, according to Eusebius (others make him the sixth) and Priminus the fourth in Corinth. Over the Latines reigned Sylvius Alba, Sylvius Atys, the fourth and fifth of the Sylvii.

About the 12. of Rehoboam, Abdastrartus King of Tyre was murdered by his Nurses sons, or foster-brethren, the elder of which usurped the Kingdome twelve years.

Toward his latter times Periciades, or Pyrithiades, began to govern Assyria, the 34. King thereof: and not long after Asartus, the son of Baleastartus, recovered the Kingdome of Tyre from the Usurpers.

of the great battell between Jeroboam and Abia, with a Corollarie of the examples of Gods judgements.

A Bijah the son of Rehoboam, inherited his Fathers Kingdome, and his vices. He raised an Armie of four hundred thousand, with which hee invaded Feroboam, who encountered him with a double number of eight hundred thousand: Both Armies joyned neer to the Mount Ephraim, where Feroboam was utterly overthrown, and the strength of Israel broken: for there fell of that side five hundred thousand; the greatest overthrow that ever was given or received of those Nations. Abijah being now master of the field, recovered Bethel, Jeshanah, and Ephron. Soon after which discomfiture, Feroboam died: who reigned in all 22. years. Abijah, the better to strengthen himself, entred into league with Heslon, the third of the Adads of Syria; as may be gathered out of the 2. of Chron. he reigned but three years, and then died: the particulars of his acts were written by Iddo the Prophet, as some part of his Fathers were.

Here we see how it pleased God to punish the sins of Salomon in his son Rehoboam: first, by an Idolator and Traitor: and then by the successor of that Egyptian, whose daughter Salomon had married, thereby the better to assure his estate, which while he served God, was by God assured against all and the greatest neighbouring Kings; and when he forsook him, it was torn asunder by his meanest Vassals. Not that the Father wanted strength to defend him from the Egyptian Sesac: For the son Abijah was able to levie four hundred thousand men, and with the same number he overthrew eight hundred thousand Israelites; and slew of them five hundred thousand; God giving spirit, courage, and invention, when, and where it pleaseth him. And as in those times the causes were exprest, why it pleased God to punish both Kings and their People; the same being both before, and at the instant delivered by Prophets: so the same just God, who liveth and governeth all things for ever, doth in these our times give victory, courage, and discourage, raise, and throw down Kings, Estates, Cities, and Nations, for the same offences which were committed of old, and are committed in the present: for which reason, in these and other the afflictions of Israel, alwayes the causes are set down, that they might be as presidents to succeeding ages. They were punished with famine in Dauids time for three years, for Saul and his bloody house, &c. And David towards his latter end suffered all sorts of afflictions, and sorrows in effect, for Uriah. Salomon had ten Tribes of twelve torn from his son for his Idolatry. Rehoboam was spoiled of his riches and honour by Sesac of Egypt, because the people of Juda made images, high places; and groves, &c. and because they suffered Sodomites in the Land. Feroboam was punished in himselfe and his posteritie, for the golden Calves that hee erected. Foram had all his sonnes slain by the Philistims, and his very bowels torn out of his body by an excoriating flux, for murdering his brethren. Ahaz and Jezebel were slain; the blood of the one, the body of the other eaten with dogges, for the false accusing and killing of Naboth. So also hath God punished the same, and the like finnes in all after-times, and in these our dayes by the same famine, plagues, warre, losse, vexation, death, sicknesse, and calamities; howsoever the wise men of the world raise these effects no higher than to second causes, and such other accidents, which, as being next their eyes and ears, seem to them to work every alteration that happeneth.

TO Abijah succeeded Asa, who enjoyed peace for his first ten years, in which time he established the Church of God, breaking down the altars dedicated to strange gods, with their images, cutting down their groves, and taking away their high places. He also spared not his own mother, who was an Idolatresse, but deposing her from her regency, brake her Idoll, stampit, and burnt it. He also fortified many Cities, and other places, providing (as provident Kings do) for the troubles of war in the leisure of peace. For not long after hee was invaded by Zerah, who then commanded all the Arabians bordering Judea, and with such a multitude entered the territorie of Asa, as (for any thing that I have read) were never assembled of that Nation, either before or since: For it is written, that there came against the Judeans, Zerah of Ethiopia, with an hoste of ten hundred thousand, and three hundred Chariots, which Asa encountered with an Armie of five hundred and fourscore thousand, levied out of those two Tribes of Juda and Benjamin, which obeyed him, and with which hee overthrew this fearfull multitude, and had the spoile both of their Cities and Campes.

That this Zerah was not an Ethiopian, I have * proved already, and were it but the length between Ethiopia and Judea, and the strong flourishing Regions of Egypt interjacent (who would not suffer a million of strangers to pass through them) it were sufficient to make it appear how foolish the opinion is, that these invaders were Ethiopians. But in that the Scriptures acknowledge that Gerar was belonging to Zerah, and the Cities thereabouts were spoiled by the Judeans, in following their victory, as places belonging to Zerah, and that all men know that Gerar standeth upon the torrent of Bejor, which David past over when he surprized the Amalekites or Arabians; this proveth sufficiently, that Zerah was leader of the Arabians, and that Gerar was a frontier town standing on the uttermost South-border of all Judea, from all parts of Ethiopia six hundred miles. Also the spoiles which Asa took, as the cattell, camels, and sheep, whereof he sacrificed five thousand, shew them to be Arabians adjoyning, and not far off, and not unknown Ethiopians. And if it be objected that these desert countries can hardly yeeld a million of men fit for the wars, I answer, that it is as like that Arabia Petraea, and the Desert, which compasse two parts of the holy Land, should yeeld ten hundred thousand, as that two Tribes of the twelve, should arm five hundred and fourscore thousand. Besides, it answereth to the promise of God to Abraham, that these Nations should exceed in number; for God spake it of Ismael, that hee would make him fruitfull, and multiply him exceedingly, that he should beget twelve Princes, &c.

Baasha a King of Israel began to reign in the third of Asa, and fearing the greatness of Asa after his great victory, entertained Benhadad King of Syria, of the race of Adadecer, to joyn with him against Asa; and to the end to block him up, he fortified Rama, which lieth in the way from Jerusalem toward Samaria.

This war began according to the letter of the Scriptures in the 36. year of Asa his reign: but because in the first of Kings the 16. it is said that Baasha died in the 26. year of Asa, therefore could not Baasha begin this war in the 35. of Asa his reign, but in the 35. year of the division of Juda & Israel; for so many years it was from the first of Rehoboam, who reigned 17. years, to the 16. of Asa. It may seem strange, that Asa being able to bring into the field an Army of five hundred & fourscore thousand good Souldiers, did not easily drive away Baasha, and defeat him of his purposes, the victories of Abia against Jeroboam, and of Asa himself against Zerah, being yet fresh in mind, which might well have emboldened the men of Juda, and asmuch disheartened the enemies. Questionlesse there were some important Circumstances, omitted in the Text, which caused Asa to fight at this time with money. It may be that the employment of so many hundred thousands of hands, in the late service against Zerah, had caused many mens private businesses to lye undispatched, whereby the people being now intentive to the culture of their lands and other trades, might be unwilling to stir against the Israelites, choosing rather to wink at apparent inconvenience, which the building of Rama would bring upon them in after-times. Such backwardnesse of the people might have deterred Asa from adventuring himself with the least part of his forces, & committing the success into the hands of God. Howsoever it were, he took the treasures remaining in the temple, with which he waged Benhadad the Syrian against Baasha, whose employments Benhadad readily accepted, and brake off confederacy with Baasha. For the Israelites were his borderers and next neighbours, whom neither himself (after his invasion) nor his successors after him ever gave over, till they had made themselves masters of that Kingdom. So Benhadad being now entered into Nepthalim, without resistance, hee spoiled divers principall Cities thereof, and inforced Baasha to quit Rama, and to leave the same to Asa, with all the materials which he had brought thither, to fortifie the same: which done, Benhadad, who loved neither party, being laden with the spoiles of Israel, and the treasures of Juda, returned to Damascus. After this, when Hanani the Prophet reprehended Asa, in that he now relied on the strength of Syria, and did not rest himself on the favour and assistance of God, he not only caused Hanani to be imprisoned, but he began to burden and oppress his people, and was therefore stricken with the grievous paines of the gout in his feet, wherewith after he had been two years continually tormented, he gave up the ghost when he had reigned 41. years.

There lived with Asa, Agesilaus the sixth of the Heraclide, and Bacis the fifth King of the same race in Corinth, of whom his successors were afterward called Bacide, Astartus, and Astarimus were Kings in Tyre. Astarimus took revenge on his brother Phelletes, for the murder of Ithobalus Priest of the goddesse Astarta, whom Salomon in dorage worshipped. Atys and Capys ruled the Latines: Pirithiades and Ophrateus the Assyrians: Tersippus and Phorbas the Athenians: Chemmis reigned in Egypt; who dying in the 36. year of Asa, left Cheops his successour, that reigned fifty six years, even to the 16. of Josiah.

S. V.

Of the great alteration falling out in the ten Tribes during the reign of Asa.

IN the reign of Asa the Kingdom of Israel felt great and violent commotions, which might have reduced the ten Tribes unto their former allegiance to the house of David, if the wisdom of God had not otherwise determined. The wickednesse of Jeroboam had, in his latter dayes, the sentence of heavie vengeance laid upon it, by the mouth of Abia, the same Prophet which had foretold the division of Israel, for the sinne of Salomon, and his reign over the ten Tribes. One son Jeroboam had among others, in whom onely God found so much piety, as (though it sufficed not to with-hold his wrath from that Family) it procured unto him a peaceable end, an honourable testimony of the peoples love, by their generall mourning and lamentation at his death, and (wherewith he was most happy) the favourable approbation of God himself.

After the losse of this good son, the ungodly father was soon taken away: a miserable creature, so conscious of his vile unthankfulnesse to God, that hee durst not suffer his own name to be used in consulting with an holy Prophet, assured of the ruine hanging over him and his, yea of Gods extreme hatred; yet forbearing to destroy those accursed Idols that wrought his confusion. So loath he was to forsake his worldly wisdom, when the world was ready to forsake him, and all belonging to him, his hatefull memory excepted.

Nadab the son of Jeroboam, reigned in the second and third years of Asa, which are reckoned as two years, though indeed his fathers last year of two and twenty did run along (how farre is uncertain) with the second of Asa, whose third year was the first of Nadab, so that perhaps this Nadab enjoyed not his Kingdom one whole year. Hee did not alter his fathers courses, neither did God alter his sentence. It seems that Hee little feared the judgements denounced against his fathers house: for as a Prince that was secure of his own estate, he armed all Israel against the Philistims, and besieged one of their Towns. There (whether it were so, that the people were offended with his ill success, and recalled to mind their grievous losse of five hundred thousand under Feroboam, counting it an unluckie family to the Nation; or whether by some particular indiscretion, he exasperated them) slain he was by Baasha, whom the Army did willingly accept for King in his stead. Baasha was no sooner proclaimed King, than hee began to take order with the house of Feroboam, that none of them might molest him, putting all of them, without mercy, to the sword. That he did this for private respects, and not in regard of Gods will to have it so, it is evident by his continuing in the same form of Idolatry which Feroboam had begun. Wherefore he received the same sentence from God that had been laid upon Feroboam; which was executed upon him also in the same fort. He began to infect Asa, by fortifying Ramah; but was diverted from thence by the Syrian Benhadad, who did waite his Countrey, destroying all the Land of Nephtalim. Four and twenty years he reigned, and then dying, left the Crown to Ela his son; who enjoyed it, as Nadab the son of Feroboam had done, two years current, perhaps not one compleat.

Ela was as much an Idolater as his father; and withall a riotous person. Hee sent an Army against Gibbethon, the same town of the Philistims, before which Nadab the son of Feroboam perished; but he sat at home the whilest, feasting and drinking with his Minions, whereby he gave such advantage against himself, as was not neglected. Zimri, an ambitious man; remaining with the King at Tirza, finding his Master so dissolute, and his behaviour so contemptible, conceived hope of the like fortune as Baasha had found, by doing as Baasha had done. Wherefore he did set upon Ela in his drunkenness, and slew him. Presently upon which fact, he stiled himself King of Israel: and began his reign with massacring all the house of Baasha, extending his cruelty not onely to his children, and kinsfolk, but unto all his friends in Tirza. These newes were quickly blown to the Camp at Gibbethon, where they were not welcommed according to Zimri his expectation. For the Souldiers in stead of proclaiming him King, proclaimed him Traitor: and being led by Omri, whom they saluted King, they (quitting the siege of Gibbethon) presented themselves before Tirza; which in short space they may seem to have forced. Zimri wanting strength to defend the City, not courage to keep himself from falling alive into his enemies hands, did set fire on the Palace, consuming it and himself together to ashes. Seven dayes he is said to have reigned: accounting (as is most likely) to the time that Omri was proclaimed in the Camp. For Zimri was also an Idolater. Walking in the way of Feroboam; and therefore is likely to have had more time wherein to declare himself, than the reign of seven dayes, and those consumed partly in murdering the friends of Baasha, partly in seeking to have defended his own life. After the death of Ela, there arose another King to oppose the faction of Omri; whereby it may seem, that Zimri had made his party strong, as being able to set up a new head, who doubtlesse would never have appeared, if there had not been ready to his hand, some strength, not unlikely to resist and vanquish the Army which maintained Omri. How long this Tibni, the new competitor of Omri, held out, I doe not find; onely it appears that his side was decayed, and so he died, leaving no other Successor than his concurrent.

A conjecture of the causes hindering the re-union of Israel with Juda, which might have been effected by these troubles.

Any man that shall consider the state of Israel in those times, may justly wonder how it came to passe, that either the whole Nation, wearied with the calamities already suffered under these unfortunate Princes, and with the present civil warres, did not return to their ancient Kings, and re-unite themselves with the mighty Tribes of Juda and Benjamin; or that Zimri and Tibni, with their oppressed factions, did not call in Asa, but rather chose the one to endure a desperate necessity of yeelding, or burning himself, the other to languish away, as a man forsaken; than to have recourse unto a remedy, so sure, so ready, and so honourable. To say that GOD was pleased to have it so, were a true, but an idle answer (for his secret will is the

the cause of all things) unlesse it could be proved, that he had forbidden Asa to deal in that business, as he forbade Rehoboam to force the rebellious people to obedience. That the restraint laid by God upon Rehoboam, did only binde his hands from attempting the suppression of that present insurrection, it appears by the Warre continued between Israel and Juda, so many yeers following; wherein Asa so farre prevailed, that hee was a great battail, and recovered some Townes belonging to the other Tribes, which hee annexed to his own Dominion. Wherefore we may boldly look into the second causes, moving the People and Leaders of the ten Tribes, to suffer any thing under new upstarts, rather than to cast their eyes upon that Royall house of David, from which the succession of five Kings in lineall descent, had taken away all imputation, that might formerly have been laid upon the mean beginnings thereof. To think that Omri had prevented his Competitors in making peace with Asa; were a conjecture more bold than probable. For Omri was not onely an Idolater, but did worse than all that were before him; which as it might serve alone to prove, that Asa, being a goodly King, would not adhere to him, so the course which he professed to take at the very first, of revenging the massacre committed upon the family and friends of Baasha (Asa his mortal enemy) gives manifest reason, why Zimri, who had wrought that great execution, should more justly than he have expected the friendship of Juda in this quarrel. Wherefore in searching out the reason of this backwardnes in the ten Tribes (which was such, that they may seeme to have never thought upon the matter) to submit themselves to their true Principles; it were not amiss to examine the causes moving the people to revenge the death of Ela, an idle drunkard rather than of Nadab the son of Feroboam, who followed the wars in person, as a man of spirit & courage. Surely it is apparent, that the very first defection of the ten Tribes, was (if we look upon human reason) occasioned by desire of breaking that heavie yoke of bondage, wherewith Salomon had galled their neckes. Their desire was to have a King that should not oppress them; nor to have no King at all. And therefore when the arrogant follie of Rehoboam had caused them to renounce him, they did immediately choose Feroboam in his stead, as a man likely to afford that liberty unto them, for which he had contended in their behalfe. Neither were they (as it seemes) herein altogether deceived. For his affection of popularity, appears in his building of decayed Towers, and in the institution of his new devised Idolatry; where he told the people, that it was too much for them to travaile so far as to Jerusalem. But whether it were so, that his moderation, being voluntary, began to cease, towards the latter end of his reign, and in the reign of his son, when long time of possession had confirmed his title, which at the first was onely good by courtesy of the people; or whether the people (as often happens in such cases) were more offended by some prerogatives of a King, that hee still retained in his own hands, than pleased with his remission of other burdens, it is cleerly apparent, that the whole army of all Israel joyned with Baasha; taking in good part the death of Nadab, and eradication of Feroboams house.

Now the reign of Baasha himself, was (for ought that remaineth in writing of it) every way unfortunate; his labour and cost at Rama was cast away; the other side of his Kingdom harried by the Syrians; neither did he win that one town of Gibbethon from the Philistims, but left that business to his son, who likewise appears an unprofitable sluggard. Wherefore it must needs bee, that the favour of the people toward the house of Baasha grew from his good forme of Civill government, which happily he reduced to a more temperate method than Feroboam ever meant to doe. And surely he that shall take pains to look into those examples which are extant of the different courses, held by the Kings of Israel and Juda, in administration of justice, will finde it most probable, that upon this ground it was that the ten Tribes continued so averse from the line of David, as to thinke all adversity more tolerable, than the weighty Scepter of that house. For the death of Joab and Shimei was indeed by them deserved; yet in that they suffered it without forme of judgement, they suffered like unto men innocent. The death of Adonijah was both without judgement, and without any crime objected, other than the Kings jealousy: out of which by the same rule of arbitrary justice (under which it may bee supposed that many were cast away) hee would have slaine Feroboam (if hee could have caught him) before he had yet committed any offence; as appears by his confident returne out of Egypt, like one that was knowne to have endured wrong, having not offered any.

The like and much more barbarous execution, to wit, without law, Fehoram did upon his brethren, & upon sundry of his greatest men; as also Joash did so put to death Zachariah the son of Fehojada, who had made him King, even in the court of the house of the Lord: and Manasses did shed innocent blood exceeding much, till hee replenished Jerusalem from corner to corner: and this was imputed to him as another fault; besides his sinne, wherein he made Juda to sinne. Contrariwise, among the Kings of Israel we find no monument of such arbitrary proceeding, unless perhaps the words of Fehoram the sonne of Ahab (which were but words) may be taken for an instance, when he said, God doe so to mee, and more also, if the head of Elisba the sonne of Shaphat shall stand on him this day: whereby it is not plain whether hee meant to kill him without more ado, or to have him condemned as a false Prophet, that had made them hold out against the Ammites, till they were faine to eat their own children; which he thought a sufficient argument to prove, that it was not Gods purpose to deliver them. The death of Naboth sheweth rather the liberty which the Israelites enjoyed, than any peremptory execution of the Kings will. For Naboth did not feare to stand upon his own right, though Ahab were even sicke for anger; neither was he for that cause put to death, as upon commandement, but made away by conspiracie, the matter being handled after a judiciall forme, which might give satisfaction to the people, ignorant of the device, thought God it could not.

The murder of the Prophets is continually ascribed to Fehabel, an impudent woman, and not unto the King her husband. Neither is it certaine, that there was no Law made whereby their lives were taken from them; but certaine it is, that the people being Idolaters, were both pleased with their death, & laboured in the execution: So that the doings of the Kings of Juda (such as are registred) prove them to use a more absolute manner of command, than the Kings of the ten Tribes. Neither doe their sufferings witness the contrary. For of those which reigned over Juda, from the division of the Kingdome, to the captivity of the ten Tribes, three were slaine by the people, and two were denied a buriall amongst their ancestors. Yea, the death of Ahab and his brethren, slaine by Jehu, with the destruction of all that Royall seed of Athalia, did not (for ought that we can read) stirre up in the people any such thirst of revenge, as might by the suddenesse and uniformity testifie the affection to bee generall, and proceeding from a loving remembrance of their Princes: unless we should think that the death of Athalia, after seven yeeres reign, were occasioned rather by the memory of her ill purchasing, than by the present sense of her tyrannicall abusing the government, whereon she had seized. On the other side, such of the Kings of Israel as perished by treason (which were seven of the twenty) were all slaine by conspiracie of the great men, who aspired by treason to the Crown: the people being so far from embruining their hands in the blood of their Sovereignes, that (after Nadab) they did never forbear to revenge the death of their Kings, when it lay in their power; nor approve the good successe of treason, unless feare compelled them. So that the death of two Kings, being thoroughly revenged upon other two, namely the death of Ela and Zacharia, upon Zimri and Shallum, who traitorously got and usurped, for a little while, their places; onely three of the seven remain, whose ends how the people took, it may be doubtfull. Though indeed it is precisely said of the slaughter committed on Ahabs children by Jehu, that the people durst not fight with him that did it, because they were exceedingly affraid: and the same feare might be in them at the death of Peka, whose history (as others of that time) is cursorily passed over. The like may be pronounced, and more absolutely, of the Kings of England; that never any of them perished by fury of the people, but by treason of such as did succeed them; neither was there any motive urging to forcibly the death of King Edward and King Richard when they were in prison, as feare lest the people should stirre in their quarrell. And certainly (howsoever all that the Law calls treason, bee interpreted, as tending finally to the Kings destruction) in those treasonable insurrections of the vulgar, which have here most prevailed, the fury of the multitude hath quenched it selfe with the blood of some great Officers; no such rebellions, howsoever wicked and barbarous otherwise, thirsting after the ruine of their naturall Sovereigne, but rather forbearing the advantages gotten upon his Royall person: which if any man impute unto grosse ignorance, another may more charitably, and I think, more truly, ascribe to a reverent affection. Wherefore that fable of Briareus, who who, being loosened by Pallas, did with his 100 hands give assistance to Jupiter, when all the rest of the gods conspired against him, is very fitly expounded by Sir Francis Bacon, as signifying that Monarches need not to feare any curbing of their aboluteness by mighty subjects, as long as by wisdom they keep the hearts of the people, who will bee sure to come in on their side. Though indeed the storie might very well have borne the same interpretation, as it is rehearsed by Homer; who tells us that Pallas was one of the conspiracie, and that Thetis alone did marre all their practice, by loosening Briareus. For a good forme of government sufficeth by it selfe to retain the people, not only without assistance of a laborious Wit, but even against all devices of the greatest and shrewdest Politicians: every Sheriffe and Constable, being sooner able to arme the multitude, in the Kings behalfe, than any over-weening Rebell, how mighty soever, can against him.

This declaration of the peoples love, being seldome found in Juda, makes it very likely, that the rule it selfe of government there was such, as neither gave occasion of contentment unto the subjects, nor of confidence in their good affection to the Kings. Upon which reasons it may seem that the multitude was kept usually disarmed. For otherwise it would have beene almost impossible, that Athalia the sister of Ahab, a stranger to the Royall blood of Juda, should by the onely authority of a Queene-mother have destroyed all the seed of David, and usurped the Kingdome very neere 7. yeeres, without finding any resistance. Yea when Fehojada the high Priest had agreed with the Captains and principall men of the Land to set up Joash their lawfull King, whereunto the whole nation were generally well affected, hee was faine to give to these Captains and their men, the spears and the shields that were King David's, & were in the house of the Lord. But we need not enter into such particulars. Questionlesse, the Tribes which thought obedience to their Princes to be a part of their duty toward God, would endure much more with patience, than they which had Kings of their own choice or admission, holding the Crowne by a more uncertaine tenure.

And this, in my opinion, was the reason, why the ten Tribes did never seeke to returne to their ancient Lords: but after the destruction of their sixe first Kings, which died in the reigne of Asa, admitted a seventh of a new family, rather than they would consubject themselves with those of Juda and Benjamin, under a more honourable, but more heave yoke.

So Asa having seen the death of 7. Kings of Israel, died him selfe after one and fortie yeeres reigne, leaving Fehosaphat his sonne to deale with Ahab the sonne of Omri, who was the eighth King over the ten Tribes.

Of Jehosaphat and his contemporaries.

Jehosaphat, who succeeded Asa, was a Prince, religious and happy; hee destroyed all the Groves, Altars, and high places dedicated to Idolatry, and sent teachers to all places and people wanting instruction; he recovered the tribute due unto him by the Arabians and Philistims: from the one he had silver, from the other sheepe & goates to the number of fiftene thousand & foure hundred. The numbers of men of war were more than admirable; for it is written that Adnah had the command of three hundred thousand, Fehobanani of two hundred and fourescore thousand, and Amasia of two hundred thousand; also that he had, besides these in Benjamin, of those that bare shields, which we call Targetiers, and of Archers under Eliada, two hundred thousand, & under the commandement of Fehozabada a hundred and fourescore thousand: which numbred together make eleven hundred and sixty thousand, all which are said to have waited upon the King; besides his garrisons.

That Juda & Benjamin, a territory not much exceeding the Countie of Kent, should muster eleven hundred and sixtie thousand fighting men, is very strange, & the number farre greater than it was found upon any other view. Joab in David's time found five hundred thousand: Rehoboam found but an hundred and fourescore thousand: Abia four hundred and eight thousand: Asa five hundred and fourescore thousand: Amazja inrolled all that could beare arms, & they amounted to three hundred thousand. Surely, whereas whereas it is written that when news was brought to Jehosaphat that Moab & Ammon were entred his territory to the West of Jordan, and that their numbers were many, he feared (to wit) the multitude; it is not likely that he would have feared even the army of Xerxes, if he could have brought into the field 11. hundred and 60. thousand fighting men, leaving all his strong Cities manned. I am therefore of opinion (referring my self to better judgement) that these numbers specified in the second of Chronicles the 17. distributed to severall Leaders, were not all at one time, but that the 300. thousand under Adnah, and the 200. and fourescore thousand under Jehobanah, were afterward commanded and mustered by Amasiah, Eliad, and Jehosabad: for the grosse & totall is not in that place set downe, as it was under the other Kings formerly named. Again, as the aides which Jehosaphat brought to Ahab did not shew that he was a Prince of extraordinary power, for the Moabites & Ammonites which he feared, could never make the one halfe of those numbers, which he that commanded least among Jehosaphats Leaders had under him.

This mighty Prince, notwithstanding his greatnesse, yet he joyned in friendship with Ahab King of Israel, who had married that wicked woman Jezabel. Him Jehosaphat visited at Samar, and caused his son Joram to marry Athalia, this Achabs daughter.

Ahab perswaded Jehosaphat to assist him in the Warre against the Syrians, who held the City of Ramoth Gilead from him, & called together foure hundred of his Prophets, or Baalites, to foretell the successe: who promised him victory. But Jehosaphat believed nothing at all in those diviners; but resolved first of all to confere with some one Prophet of the Lord God of Israel. Hereupon Ahab made answer, that he had one called Michaiab, but he hated that Prophet, because he alwayes foretold of evill, and never of any good towards him. Yet M. Michaiab was sent for to the King, but by the way the messenger prayed him to consent with the rest of the Prophets, and to promise victory unto them, as they did. But Michaiab spake the truth, and repeated his vision to both the Kings, which was, that God asked who shall perswade Ahab, that hee may goe up and fall at Ramoth Gilead? to whom a spirit that stood before the Lord, answered, that hee would enter into his Prophets, & be in them a false spirit to delude. For as it is said by Christ: Non enim vos estis qui loquimini, sed spiritus patris vel iri loquuntur in vobis: It is not you that speake, but the Spirit of your Father speaks in you: so in a contrary kinde did the devill in the Prophets of Baal, or Satan, incourage Ahab to his destruction. And as Martyr upon this place well observeth, these evill spirits are ministers of Gods vengeance, & are used as the hangmen and tormentors, which Princes sometime employ. For as it pleaseth God by his good Angels, to save & deliver from destruction, of which the Scriptures have many examples: so on the contrary, it is by the evill that hee punisheth and destroyeth; both which are said to performe the will of their Creator, licet non eodem animo. Ecclesiasticus remembreth a second sort of malignant natures, but they are every where visible. There are spirits, saith he, created for vengeance, which in their rigour lay on fure strokes. In the time of destruction they shew forth their power, and accomplish the wrath of him that made them.

Now Michaias having by this his revelation greatly displeased the King, & the Prophets, whose spirit he discovered, was stroken by Zidkiah one of Baals Prophets, and by Ahab himselfe committed to prison: where hee appointed him to bee reserved and fed with bread of affliction till he returned in peace. But Michaiab, not fearing to reply, answered, If thou returne in peace, the Lord hath not spoken by mee. Nevertheless Ahab went on in that warre, and was wounded to death: Jehosaphat returned to Jerusalem, where he was reprehended by Jehu the Prophet for assisting an idolatrous Prince, and 2 Chron. 18. one that hated God.

After this the Aramites or Damascens, joyned with the Moabites, Ammonites & Idumeans to invade Juda: who passe Jordan & encamp at Engaddi; & when Jehosaphat gathered his army, the prophet Jahaziel fortold him of the victory, which should be obtained without any bloodshed of his part: & so when Jehosaphat approached, this assembly of Nations, the Ammonites & Moabites, disagreeing with the Idumeans, & quarrelling for some causes among themselves, those of Ammon & Moab set upon the Idumeans, & brake them utterly: which done, they also invaded each other; in which broil Jehosaphat arriving, took the spoile of them all without any loss of his part, as it was foretold & promised missed by God. Notwithstanding this victory, Jehosaphat, forgetting that he was formerly reprehended for assisting an Idolatrous King, did notwithstanding joyn with Ochaziah, the son of Ahab, in preparing a Fleet to send to Ophir, hoping of the like return which Salomon had: but as Eleizer the Prophet foretold him, his ships perished, and were broken in the port of Ezion Gaber, and so that enterprize was overthrown.

2 Chron. 19.

Yet he taketh part with Jehoram, the brother of Ochozias, against the Moabites, which Kings of Juda and Israel, the Edomites joyn their forces, not forgetting, it seems, that the Moabites, assisted by the Ammonites, had not long before destroyed their army.

The Moabites, subjects to David and Salomon, forsaking the Kings of Juda, gave themselves for vassals to Feroboam, and so they continued to his successors till the death of Achab: but Jehosaphat, notwithstanding the Idolatry of his Colleague; yet as it seemeth he was drawn into this war, both to be avenged of the Moabites for their defection from Juda to Israel, as also because they had lately joyned themselves with the Syrians against Jehosaphat, and thirdly, to punish their double rebellion who first forsook Juda, & now Israel.

Both Kings resolved to passe by the way of Idumea, thereby the better to assure that Nation, for we find that both Moab, Ammon and Edom were all in the field together at Engaddi against Jehosaphat: But whether they had then declared themselves against Jehosaphat, it is not certain; for in the 2. of Chron. 11. vers. 8. it is written, that in the time of Iehoram the son of Jehosaphat, Edom rebelled: and therefore it seemeth to me that the Edomites, when they were slain by Moab and Ammon, not finding themselves satisfied in such conditions as they required, offered to return from them, and to joyn themselves with the army of Juda. For, that they were numbred among the enemies of Jehosaphat, it is plain in the 2. of Chron. the 20. and as plain c. 21. v. 8. that they were not declared; nor had made them a King, till Jehosaphats death. Now in the passage of these Kings towards Moab, whether it were by the extraordinary heat of the year, or whether the Idumeans having a purpose to rebell, missed the army of Juda and Israel, with intent to infeebly them for want of water; true it is, that they suffered the same, if not a greater thirst than the armies of Crassus and M. Antonius did in their Parthian expeditions; and had in all likelihood utterly perished, had not Elisha taught them to cut trenches where-into the water spring, by which not onely Jehosaphat and his army, but Iehoram King of Israel, an Idolater was relieved: the great mercy and goodness of God having ever been prone to save the evill for the good, whereas he never destroyed the good for the evill.

The miserable issue of this warre, and how Moab burnt his son, or the son of the King of Edom, for sacrifice, on the rampire of his own City, I have already written in the life of Jehoram among the Kings of Israel. Jehosaphat reigned 25. years and died; he was buried in the valley of Jehosaphat, and a part of the Pyramis set over his grave is yet to be seen; saith Brocard. His acts are written at large by Jehu the son of Hanani.

There lived with Jehosaphat, Ophratenes in Assyria, Capetus, and Tiberinus Kings of the Albans in Italy; of the latter the river Tiber (formerly Albula) took name.

CHAP. XX.

Of Jhoram the sonne of Jehosaphat, and Ahazia.

S. I.

That Jhoram was made King sundry times.

JEHORAM the Son of Jehosaphat King of Juda began to reign at thirty two years of age; and lived untill hee was forty years old, being eight years a King: but of these eight years, which Jehoram is said to have reigned, four are to be reckoned in the life of his father, who going to the Syrian warre with Ahab, left this Jehoram King in his stead, as Ahab did his son Ahazia. This appears by the severall beginnings, which are given in Scripture to the two Jehorams Kings of Israel and Juda, and to Ahazia the eldest son of Ahab. For Ahazia is said

said to have begun his reign, in the seventeenth year of Jehosaphat. Jehoram the brother of Ahaziah succeeded him in the 2. year of Jehoram the son of Jehosaphat King of Juda; that is, in the next year after that Jehoram of Juda was designed King by his father; it being (as we find elsewhere) the eighteenth year of Jehosaphat himself, who went with the Israelites against Moab. Hereby it appears that the full power and execution of the royall office was retained still by Jehosaphat, who governed absolutely by himself, not communicating the rule with his son. But in the fifth year of Jehoram King of Israel, which was the two and twentieth of Jehosaphat, the old King took unto him, as partner in the government, this his eldest son, who was at that time 32. years old, his Father being 57. Now forasmuch as Jehosaphat reigned 25. years, it is evident that his sonne did not reign alone till the eighth of Joram King of Israel. The like regard is to be had in accounting the times of other Kings of Juda & Israel, who did not alwayes reign precisely so long as the bare letter of the Text may seem at first to affirm: but their years were sometimes compleat, sometimes onely current, sometimes confounded with the years of their successors or foregoers, and must therefore be found by comparing their times with the years of those others, with whom they did begin and end.

It were perhaps a thing lesse needfull than curious, to enquire into the reasons moving Jehosaphat either to assume unto him his son as partner in the Kingdome, whilst hee was able himself to command both in peace and in warre, the like having never been done by any of his progenitors, or having once (in the 17. of his reign) vouchsafed unto him that honour, to resume it unto himself, or at least wife to deferre the confirmation of it, untill four or five years were passed. Yet forasmuch as to enter into the examination of these passages, may be a mean to find some light, whereby we may more clearly discover the causes of much extraordinary businesse ensuing, I hold it not amisse to make such conjecture, as the circumstances of the Story briefly handled in the Scriptures may seem to approve.

We are therefore to consider, that this King Jehosaphat was the first of Rehoboams issue that ever entred into any freight league with the Kings of the ten Tribes. All that reigned in Juda before him, had with much labour and long war, tired themselves in vain, making small profit of the greatest advantages that could be wished. Wherefore Jehosaphat thought it the wisest way, to make a league offensive and defensive between Israel and Juda, whereby each might enjoy their own in quiet.

This confederacy made by a religious King, with one that did hate the Lord, could not long prosper, as not issuing from the true root and fountain of all wisdom: yet as a piece of sound policy, doubtlesse it wanted not fair pretences of much common good thereby likely to arise, with mutuall fortification of both those Kingdoms, against the uncircumcised Nations their ancient enemies. This apparent benefit, being so inestimable a jewel, that it might not easily be lost, but continue as hereditary from father to son, it was thought a very good course to have it confirmed by some sure bond of affinity, and thereupon was Ataliah the daughter of Omri, and sister of Ahab King of Israel, given in marriage to Jehoram, who was son and heir apparent to the King of Juda. This Lady was of a masculine spirit, and had learned so much of Queen Jezebel her brothers wife, that she durst undertake, and could thoroughly perform a great deal more in Jerusalem, than the other knew how to compass in Samaria. Shee was indeed a fire-brand ordained by God to consume a great part of the noblest houses in Juda, and perhaps of those men or their children, whose worldly wisdom, regardless of Gods pleasure, had brought her in.

The first fruits of this great league, was the Syrian war at Ramoth Gilead, wherein Juda and Israel did adventure equally, but the profit of the victory should have redounded wholly to Ahab: as godly Princes very seldom thrive by marching with Idolaters, but rather serve the turns of those false friends, who being ill affected to God himself, cannot be well affected to his servants. Before their setting forth, Ahab designed, as King, his son Ahaziah; not so much perhaps in regard of the uncertain events of war (for none of his predecessors had ever done the like, upon the like occasions) nor as fearing the threatnings of the Prophet Micahiah (for he despised them) as inviting Jehosaphat by his own example, to take the same course, wherein he prevailed.

S. II.

Probable conjectures of the motives inducing the old King Jehosaphat to change his purpose often, in making his son Jehoram King.

Many arguments do very strongly prove Jehoram to have been wholly over-ruled by his wife, especially for his forsaking the religion of his godly Ancestors, and following the abominable superstitions of the house of Ahab.

That she was a woman of intollerable pride, and abhorring to live a private life, the whole course of her actions witnesseth at large. Much vain matter she was able to produce, whereby to make her husband think that his brethren and kindred were but mean and unworthy persons in comparison of him, and of his children, which were begotten upon the daughter and sister of two great Kings, not upon base women, and meer subjects. The Court of Ahab, and his famous victories obtained against the Syrian Benhadad, were matter sufficient to make an insolent man think highly of himself, as being allied so honourably; who could otherwise have found in his heart well enough, to despise all his brethren, as being the eldest, and heir apparent to the Crown, whereof already he had, in a manner, the possession.

How soon his vices brake out, or how long hee dissembled them and his idolatrous religion, it cannot certainly be known. Like enough it is, that some smoke, out of the hidden fire, did very soon make his fathers eyes to water; who thereupon caused the young man to know himself better, by making him fall back into rank among his younger brethren. And surely the doings of Jehosaphat about the same time, argue no small distemper of the whole country, through the misgovernment of his ungodly son. For the good King was faine to make his progresse round about the Land, reclaiming the people unto the service of God, and appointing Judges throughout all the strong Cities of Juda City by City. This had been a needlesse labour, if the religion taught and strongly maintained by Aza, and by himself, had not suffered alteration, and the course of Justice been perverted, by the power of such as had born authority. But the necessitie that then was of reformation, appears by the charge which the King did give to the Judges; and by his commission given to one of the Priests in spirituall causes, and to the Steward of his house in temporall matters, to be generall overseers.

This was not till after the death of Ahaziah the son of Ahab; but how long after it is uncertain. For Jehoram the brother of Ahaziah began his reign (as hath been already noted) in the eighteenth of Jehosaphat, which was then accounted the second of Jehoram, Jehosaphats son, though afterward this Jehoram of Juda had another first and second year, even in his fathers time, before he reigned alone, as the best Chronologers and Expositors of the holy Text agree. So he continued in private estate, untill the two and twentieth of his fathers reign, at which time, though the occasions, inducing his restitution to former dignity are not set down, yet wee may not think, that motives thereto, appearing substantially, were wanting. Jehoram of Israel held the same correspondency with Jehosaphat that his father had done; and made use of it. He drew the Judeans into the war of Moab, at which time it might well be, that the young Prince of Juda was again ordained King by his father, as in the Syrian expedition he had been. Or if wee ought rather to think, that the preparations for the enterprize against Moab did not occupy so much time, as from the eighteenth of Jehosaphat, in which year that Nation rebelled against Israel, unto his two and twentieth; yet the daily negotiations between the two Kings of Juda and Israel, and the affinity between them contracted in the person of Jehoram, might offer some good occasions thereunto. Neither is it certain how the behaviour of the younger sons, in their elder brothers disgrace, might cause their Father to put him in possession for fear of tumult after his death; or the deep dissimulation of Jehoram himself might win the good opinion both of his Father and Brethren; it being a thing usuall in mischievous fell natures, to be as abject and servile in time of adversity, as insolent and bloody upon advantage. This is manifest, that being repossessed of his former estate, he demeaned himself in such wise toward his brethren, as caused their father to enable them, not onely with store of silver and gold, and of precious things, (which kind of liberality other Kings doubtlesse had used unto their younger sons) but with the custody of strong Cities in Juda, to assure them, if it might have been, by unwonted means, against unwonted perils.

S. III.

The doings of Jehoram when hee reigned alone; and the rebellion of Edom and Libna.

BUt all this providence availed nothing; for an higher providence had otherwise determined of the sequell. When once the good old man, their Father, was dead, the younger sons of Jehosaphat found strong Cities, a weak defence, against the power of him unto whom the Citizens were obedient. If they came in upon the summons of a King their brother, then had he them without any more ado; if they stood upon their guard, then were they Traitors, and so unable to hold out against him, who besides his own power, was able to bring the forces of the Israelitish Kingdom against them; so that the apparent likelihood of their finall overthrow, sufficed to make all forsake them in the very beginning. Howsoever it was, they were all taken and slain, and with them for company many great men of the Land, such belike, as either had taken their part, when the Tyrant fought their lives, or had been appointed Rulers of the Country, when Jehoram was deposed from his Government; in which Office they, without forbearing to do justice, could hardly avoid the doing of many things derogatory to their young Master, which if hee would now call treason, saying that he was then King, who durst say the contrary?

After this Jehoram took upon him, as being now Lord alone, to make invasions in Religion, wherein he was not contented, as other Idolatrous Princes, to give way and safe conduct unto Superstition and Idolatry, nor to provoke and encourage the people to that sinne, whereto it is wonderfull that they were so much addicted, having such knowledge of God, and of his detesting that above all other sins; but hee used compulsion, and was (if not the very first) the first that is registred, to have set up Irreligion by force.

Whilest he was thus busied at home, in doing what he listed, the Edomites his Tributaries rebelled against him abroad; and having hitherto, since Dauids time, been governed by a Vice-Roy, did now make unto themselves a King. Against these Jehoram in person made an expedition, taking along with him his Princes, and all his Chariots, with which he obtained victory in the field, compelling the rebels to flee into their places of advantage, whereof he forced no one, but went away contented with the honour that he had gotten in beating and killing some of those whom he should have subdued, and kept his servants. Now began the prophecy of Isaac to take effect, wherein he foretold, that Esau in proesse of time should break the yoke of Jacob. For after this the Edomites could never be reclaimed by any of the Kings of Juda, but held their own so well, that when, after many civill and foreign wars, the Jewes by sundry Nations had been brought low; Antipater the Edomite, with Herod his son, and others of that race following them, became Lords of the Jewes, in the decrepit age of Israel, and reigned as Kings, even in Jerusalem it self.

The freedom of the Edomites, though purchased somewhat dearly, encouraged Libna, a great City within Juda, which in the time of Solomon had a peculiar King, to rebel against Jehoram, and set it self in liberty. Libna stood in the confines of Benjamin and of Dan, far from the assistance of any bordering enemies to Juda, and therefore so unlikely it was to have maintained it self in liberty, that it may seem strange how it could escape from utter destruction, or at the least from some terrible vengeance, most likely to have been taken, by their powerfull, cruell, and thoroughly incensed Lord. The Israelites held such good intelligence at that time with Juda, that he would not have accepted the Town, had it offered it self unto him: neither doe we read that it fought how to cast it self into a new subjection, but continued a free state. The rebellion of it against Jehoram, was, because he had forsaken the Lord God of his Fathers; which I take to have not only been the first & remote cause, but even the next and immediate reason, moving the inhabitants to do as they did: for it was a Town of the Levites, who must needs be driven into great extremities, when a religion, contrary to Gods Law, had not onely some allowance to countenance it by the King, but compulsive authority to force unto it all that were unwilling. As for the use of the Temple at Jerusalem (which, being desolate, they might fear to lose by this rebellion) it was never denied to those of the desecrated Temples by any of the Religious Kings, who rather invited the Israelites thither, and gave them kind entertainment: under Idolaters they must have been without it, whether they lived free, or in subjection. Yet it seems that private reasons were not wanting, which might move them rather to doe than suffer that which was unwarrantable. For in the generall visitation before remembred, wherein Jehosaphat reformed his kingdom, the good old King appointing new Governours, and giving them especiall charge to doe justice without respect of persons, used these words: The Levites shall be before you, Be of good courage, and doe it, and the Lord shall be with you. By these phrases, it seems, than he encouraged them against the more powerfull, than just proceedings of his son; whom if the Levites did (according to the trust reposed in them) neglect in discharging their duties, likely it is that he meant to be even with them, and make them now to feel, as many Princes of the land had done, his heave indignation. How it happened that Libna was not hereupon destroyed, yea, that it was not (for ought that we can read) so much as besieged or molested, may justly seem very strange. And the more strange it is in regard of the mighty Armies which Jehosaphat was able to raise, being sufficient to have overwhelmed any one Town, and buried it under the earth, which they might well in one month have cast into it with shovels, by ordinarie appliances.

But it seems that of those great numbers which his Father could have levied, there were not many whom Jehoram could well trust; and therefore perhaps he thought it an easier losse, to let one Town goe, than to put weapons into their hands, who were more likely to follow the example of Libna, than to punish it. So desperate is the condition of Tyrants, who thinking it a greater happiness to be feared, than to be loved; are faine themselves to stand in fear of those, by whom they might have been dreadfull unto others.

S. IV.

Of the miseries falling upon Jehoram, and of his death.

THese afflictions not sufficing to make any impression of Gods displeasure in the mind of the wicked Prince, a Prophecie in writing was delivered to him, which threatened both his people, his children, his wives, and his own body. Hereby likewise it appears that he was a cruell persecutor of Gods servants; in as much as the Prophets durst not reprove him to his face, as they had done many of his predecessors, both good and evil Kings; but were faine to denounce Gods Judgements against him by letters, keeping themselves close and far from him. This Epistle is said to have been sent unto him from Elias the Prophet. But Elias was translated, and Elizeus prophesied in his stead before this time, even in the dayes of Jehosaphat. Wherefore it may be that Elias left this prophecie in writing behind him, or that (as some conjecture) the error of one letter in writing, was the occasion that we read Elias for Elizeus. Indeed any thing may rather be believed than the Tradition held by some of the Jewish Rabbins, that Elias from heaven did send this Epistle; a tale somewhat like to the fable of our Ladies letters, devised by Erasmus, or of the Verse that was sent from heaven to S. Giles.

But whosoever was the Author of this threatening Epistle, the accomplishment of the prophecie was as terrible as the sentence. For the Philistines and Arabians brake into Juda, and took the King's house, wherein they found all, or many of his children, and wives, all which they slew, or carried away, with great part of his goods. These Philistines had not presumed since the time of David, to make any offensive warre till now; for they were by him almost consumed, and had lost the best of their Towns, maintaining themselves in the rest of their small territories, by defensive arms, to which they were constrained at Gibbethon by the Israelites. The Arabians were likely to have been then, as they are now, a naked people, all horsemen, and ill appointed; their Countrey affording no other furniture, than such as might make them fitter to rob and spoile in the open fields, than to offend strong Cities, such as were thick set in Juda. True it is that in ages long after following, they conquered all the South parts of the world then known, in a very short space of time, destroying some, and building other some very large Cities. But it must be considered, that this was when they had learned of the Ramath the Art of Warre; and that the provisions which they found, together with the Arts which they learned, in one subdued Province, did make them able and skilfull in pursuing their conquest, and going on into Regions far removed from them. At this day, having lost in effect all that they had gotten, such of them as lived in Arabia in self defence, good horsemen, but ill appointed; very dangerous to passengers, but unable to deal with good Souldiers, as riding stark naked, and rather trusting in the swiftnesse of their horses, than in any other means of resistance, where they are well opposed. And such, or little better, may they seem to have bin, that spoiled Judea in the time of Jehoram. For their Countrey was alwaies barren and desert, wanting manuell Arts, whereby to supply the naturals with furniture, neither are these bands named as chiefe in that action, but rather adherents of the Philistims. Out of this we may infer, that one half, yea, more quarter of the numbers found in the least muster of Juda and Benjamin, under Jehosaphat (wherein were enrolled three hundred and eightie thousand fighting men) had been enough to have driven away farre greater forces than these enemies are likely to have brought into the field, had not the people been unable to deal with them, for lack of weapons, which were now kept from them by their Princes jealousy, as in Sauls time by the policie of the Philistims.

It may seem that the house of the King which these invaders took, was not his Palace in Jerusalem, but rather some other house of his abroad in the Countrey, where his wive and children at that time lay for their recreation: because we read not that they did sack the Citie, or spoyle the Temple, which would have invited them as a more commodious boote, had they got possession thereof. Yet perhaps, they took Jerusalem itself by surprize, the people being disarmed, and the Kings guard too weak to keep them out; yet had not the courage to hold it, because it was so large and populous, and therefore having done what spoyle they could, with-drew themselves with such purchase as they were able safely to convey away.

The slaughter committed by Jehu on the two and fortie brethren of Ahazia, or (as they are called elsewhere) so many of his brothers sons, and the cruell massacre wherein all the Royall seed perished (only *Joa*s excepted) under the tyrannie of Athalia, following within two years after this invasion of the Philistims and Arabians, make it seem probable, that the sons of Jehoram were not all slain at once, but that rather the first murder began in his own time, and was seconded by many other heave blows, wherewith his house was incessantly stricken, untill it was in a manner quite hewed down.

After these calamities, the hand of God was extended against the body of this wicked King, smiting him with a grievous disease in his bowels, which left him not untill his guts fell out, and his wretched soul departed from his miserable carcase. The people of the Land, as they had small cause of comfort in his life, so had they not the good manners to pretend sorrow for his death, wherefore hee was denied a place of buriall among his Ancestors the Kings of Juda, though his own sonne succeeded him in the Kingdome, who was guided by the same spirits that had been his Fathers evil Angels. Athalia had other matters to trouble her head, than the pompous interring of a dead husband. Shee was thinking how to provide for the future, to maintain her own greatnesse, to retain her favourites in their authoritie, and to place about her son such Counsellours of the house of Ahab, as were fittest for her turn. Wherefore she thought it unreasonable to make much a-doe about a thing of nothing, and offend the peoples eyes, with a stately funerall of a man by them detested: but rather chose to let the blame of things passed be layd upon the dead, than to procure an ill opinion of her self and hers, which it now did concern her to avoyd. Such is the qualitie of wicked Instigators, having made greedy use of bad employments, to charge, not only with his own vices, but with their faults also, the man whose evil inclinations their sinister counsells have made worse, when once he is gone, and can profit them no longer. The death of Jehoram fel out indeed in a busie time, when his friend and cousin the Aramese, who had the same name, was entangled in a difficult warre against the Aramese; and therefore could have had no better leisure to help Athalia, in setting of things according to her own mind, than hee had (perhaps through the same hinderance) to help her husband, when he was distressed by the Philistims; Yea, rather he needed and craved the assistance of the men of Juda, for the taking in of Ramoth Gilead, where they had not not sped so well the last time, that they should willingly run thither again, unlesse they were very fairly intreated.

The acts of his wicked man I have thought good to handle the more particularly (pursuing the examination of all occurrences, as far as the circumstances remembred in holy Scripture would guide me by their directions) to the end that it might more plainly appear, how the corrupted affections of men, impugning the revealed will of God, accomplish neverthelesse his hidden purpose, and without miraculous means, confound themselves in the seeming-wise devices of their own folly: as likewise to the end that all men might learn to submit their judgements to the ordinance of God, rather than to think, that they may safely dispense with his commandements, and follow the prudent conceits which worldly wisdom dictateth unto them. For in such kind of unhappy subtilties, it is manifest that Athalia was able to furnish both her Husband and her Son; but the issue of them partly hath appeared already, and partly will appear, in that which immediately followeth.

S. V.

Of the reign of Ahazia, and his businesse with the King of Israel.

Chazias, or Ahazia, the son of Jehoram and Athalia, began his reign over Juda, in the twelfth year of Iehoram the son of Ahab King of Israel, and reigned but one year. Touching his age, it is a point of much more difficulty than importance to know it: yet hath it bred much disputation, whereof I see no more probable conclusion than that of Torniellus, alleging the Edition of the Septuagint at Rome, Anno Domini 1588, which saith that he was twenty years old in the beginning of his kingdom; and the Annotations thereupon, which cite other Copies, that doe give him two years more. Like enough he is to have been young: for he was governed by his Mother, and her Ministers, who gave him counsell, by which he perished. In matter of Religion he altered none of his fathers courses. In matter of State he likewise upheld the league made with the house of Ahab. He was much busied in doing little, and that with ill successe. He accompanied his Cousin the Israelite against Ramoth Gilead, which they wan, but not without blowes: for the Aramese fought so well, that the King of Israel was faine to adventure his own person, which escaped not unwounded.

The Town being won, was manned strongly, in expectation of some attempt likely to be made by Hazael King of Ararn: which done, Jehoram King of Israel with-drew himself to the City of Iezrael, where with more quiet he might attend the curing of his wounds; and Ahazia returned to Jerusalem. It seems that he was but newly come home (for he reigned in all scanty one year, whereof the former expedition, with the preparations for it, had taken up a great part,) when he did make a new journey, as it were for good manners sake, to visit the King of Israel, who lay sore of his wounds. Belike Athalia was brewing some new plots, which his presence would have hindered, and therefore sought every occasion to thrust him abroad: for otherwise it was but a vain piece of work to leave his kingdome, having no other businesse than by way of complement to goe see one whom he had seen yesterday. Certain it is, that the Lord had resolved at this time to put in execution that heavy judgement, which he had laid by the mouth of Eli- the Prophet upon the house of Ahab. And hereupon at this time had he disposed not only the concurrence of all other things, which in mans eyes might seem to have been accidental, but the very thoughts and affections of such persons, as intended nothing less than the fulfilling of his high pleasure. Of these Athalia doubtlesse was one, whose mischievous purposes it will shortly be needfull, for explanation of some difficulties arising, that we diligently consider and examine.

S. VI.

How Ahazia perished with the house of Ahab: and how that Familie was destroyed by Jehu.

THe whole Armie of Israel, with all the principall Captains, lying in Ramoth Gilead, a Disciple of Elizeus the Prophet came in among the Captains, that were sitting together, who calling out among them Jehu, a principall man, took him apart, and anointed him King over Israel, rehearsing unto him the Prophecie of Elias against the house of Ahab, and letting him understand that it was the pleasure of God to make him executioner of that sentence. The fashion of the Messenger was such as bred in the Captains a desire to know the errand, which Jehu thought meet to let them know, as doubting whether they had over-heard all the talk or no. When hee had acquainted them with the whole matter, they made no delay, but forth-with proclaimed him king. For the Prophecie of Elias was well known among them, neither durst any one oppose himself against him, that was by God ordained to perform it.

Jehu, who had upon the sudden this great honour thrown upon him, was not slow to put himself in possession of it, but used the first heat of their affections, who joynd with him, in setting on foot the businesse which neerly concerned him, and was not to be fore-slowed, being no more his own than Gods.

The first care taken was that no news of the revolt might be carried to Fezeel, whereby the King might have had warning either to fight or flee: this being foreseen, he marched swiftly away, to take the Court while it was yet secure. King Jehoram was now so well recovered of his wounds, that he could endure to ride abroad, for which cause it seems that there was much feasting, and joy made, especially by Queen Fezabel, who kept her state so well, that the brethren of Ahazia, comming thither at this time, did make it as well their errand to salute the Queen, as to visit the King.

Certain it is, that since the rebellion of Moab against Israel, the house of Ahab did never so much flourish as at this time. Seventy Princes of the blood Royall there were that lived in Samaria; Jehoram the son of Queen Fezabel had won Ramoth Gilead, which his Father had attempted in vain, with losse of his life; and hee won it by valiant fight, wherein he received wounds, of which the danger was now past, but the honour likely to continue. The amitie was so great between Israel and Juda, that it might suffice to daunt all their common enemies, leaving no hope of successe to any rebellious enterprizer: so that now the prophecie of Elias might be forgotten, or no otherwise remembered, than as an unlikely tale by them that beheld the majesticall face of the Court, wherein to great a friend as the King of Juda was entertained, and fortie Princes of his blood expected.

In the midst of this securitie, whilst these great Estates were (perhaps) either consulting about prosecution of their intents, first against the Aramites, and then against Moab, Edom, and other rebels and enemies: or else were triumphing in joy of that which was already achieved, and the Queen-mother dressing her self in the bravest manner to come down amongst them, tidings were brought in, that the watchman had from a Tower discovered a company comming. These newes were not very troublesome: for the Armie that lay in Ramoth Gilead, to be readie against all attempts of the Aramites, was likely enough to be discharged upon some notice taken that the enemy would not, or could not stirre. Onely the King sent out an Horse-man to know what the matter was, and to bring him word. The messenger comming to Jehu, and asking whether all were well, was retained by him, who intended to give the King as little warning as might be. The seeming negligence of this fellow in not returning with an answer, might argue the matter to be of small importance: yet the King to be satisfied, sent out another that should bring him word how all went; and hee was likewise detained by Jehu. These dumb shewes bred some suspicion in Jehoram, whom the watchman certified of all that happened. And now the companie drew so neer, that they might, though not perfectly, be discerned, and notice taken of Jehu himself by the furious manner of his marching. Wherefore the King that was loth to discover any weakness, caused his Chariot to be made ready, and issued forth with Ahazia King of Juda in his companie, company, whose presence added majesty to his train, when strength to resist, or expedition to flee, had bin more needfull. This could not be done so hastily, but that Jehu was come even to the towns end, & there they met each other in the field of Naboth. Jehoram began to salute Jehu with termes of peace, but receiving a bitter answer, his heart failed him, so that crying out upon the treason to his fellow king, he turned away to have fled. But Jehu soon overtook him with an arrow, wherewith he strook him dead, and threw his carcase into that field, which, purchased with the blood of the rightfull owner, was to be watered with the blood of the unjust possessor. Neither did Ahazia escape so well, but that he was arrested by a wound, which held him till death did seize upon him.

10 The Kings Palace was joyning to the wall, by the gate of the Citie, where Fezabel might soon be advertised of this calamitie, if she did not with her own eyes behold it. Now it was high time for her to call to God for mercie, whose judgement, pronounced against her long before, had overtaken her, when she least expected it. But she, full of indignation and proud thoughts, made her self ready in all haste, and painted her face, hoping with her stately and imperious looks to daunt the Traitor, or at least to utter some Apophthegme that should expresse her brave spirit, and brand him with such a reproach as might make him odious for ever. Little did she think upon the hungry dogs that were ordained to devour her, whose paunches the stibium, with which she besmeared her eyes, would more offend, than the scolding language wherewith she armed her tongue could trouble the ears of him that had her in his power. As Jehu drew neer, she opened her window, & looking out upon him, began to put him in mind of Zimri, that had not long enjoyed the fruits of his treason, and murder of the King his Master. This was in meer humane valuation stoutly spoken, but was indeed a part of miserable folly; as are all things, howsoever laudable, if they have an ill relation to God the Lord of all. Her own Eunuchs that stood by and heard her, were not affected so much as with any compassion of her fortune; much lesse was her enemy daunted with her proud spirit. When Jehu saw that she did use the little remainder of her life in seeking to vex him, hee made her presently to understand her own estate, by deeds and not by words. He only called to her servants to know which of them would be on his side, and soon found them ready to offer their service before the very face of their proud Lady. Hereupon he commanded them to cast her down head-long: which immediatly they performed, without all regard of her greatnesse and estate; wherein she had a few hours before shined so gloriously in the eyes of men; of men that considered not the judgements of God that had been denounced against her.

So perished this accursed woman by the rude hands of her own servants, at the commandment of her greatest enemy, that was yesterday her subject, but now her Lord: and she perished miserably, struggling in vain with base groomes, who countemselously did hale and thrust her, whilst her insulting enemy fate on Horse-back, adding indignitie to her griefe by scornfull beholding the shamefull manner of her fall, and trampling her body under foot. Her dead carcase that was left without the walls, was devoured by dogs, and her very memorie was odious. Thus the vengeance of God rewarded her Idollatry, murder, and oppression, with slow, but sure payment, and full interest.

Ahazia King of Juda fleeing a pace from Jehu, was over-taken by the way where he lurked; and receiving his deadly wound in the kingdome of Samaria, was suffered to get him gone (which he did in all haste) and seek his buriall in his own kingdome: and this favour he obtained for his grand-fathers sake, not for his fathers nor his own. He died at Megiddo, and was thence carried to Jerusalem, whete he was entered with his Ancestors, having reigned about one year.

CHAP. XXI.

Of Athalia; and whose son he was that succeeded her.

s. I.

Of Athalia's usurping the Kingdome, and what pretences she might forge.

2 Chro. 22. 9

After the death of Ahazia, it is sayd that his house was not able to retain the Kingdome: which Note, and the proceedings of Athalia upon the death of her son, have given occasion to divers opinions concerning the Pedigree of Joas, who reigned shortly after. For Athalia being thus dispoiled of her son, under whose name she had ruled at her pleasure, did forth-with lay hold upon all the Princes of the blood, and slew them, that so she might occupie the Royall Throne her self, and reign as Queen, rather than live a Subject. She had before-hand put into great place, and made Counsellors unto her son, such as were fittest for her purpose, and ready at all times to execute her will: that she kept a strong guard about her, it is very likely; and as likely it is that the great execution done by Je-horam, upon the Princes, and many of the Nobilitie, had made the people tame, and fearfull to stir, whatsoever they saw or heard.

Yet ambition, how violent soever it be, is feldome or never so shamelesse as to refuse the commoditie of goodly pretences offering themselves; but rather scrapes together all that will any way serve to colour her proceedings. Wherefore it were not absurd for us to think, that Athalia, when she saw the Princes of the Royall blood, all of them in a manner, slain by her husband, and afterwards his own children destroyed by the Philistines, began even then to play her own game, reducing by artificiall practice, into fair likelihoods, those possibilities wherewith her husbands bad fortune had presented her. Not without great shew of reason, either by her own mouth, or by some trustie creature of hers, might she give him to understand, how needfull it were to take the best order whilst as yet he might, for fear of the worst that might happen. If the issue of David, which now remained only in his Familie, should by any accident fail (as wofull experience had already shewed what might after come to passe) the people of Juda were not unlikely to choose a King of some new stock, a popular seditious man peradventure, one that to countenance his own unworthinesse, would not care what aspersions he layd upon that Royall house, which was fallen down. And who could assure him, that some ambitious spirit, fore-seeing what might be gotten thereby, did not already contrive the destruction of him, and all his seed? Wherefore it were the wisest way to design by his authoritie not only his succellour, but also the reverfioner, and so to provide, that the Crown might never be subject to any rising, but remain in the disposition of them that loved him best, if the worst that might be feared comming to passe, his own posteritie could not retain it.

Such perswasions being urged, and earnestly followed, by the importunate sollicitation of her that governed his affections, were able to make the jealous Tyrant think, that the onely way to frustrate all devices of such as gaped after a change, was to make her Heir the last and youngest of his house, whom it most concerned, as being the Queen-Mother, to uphold the first and eldest.

If Athalia took no such course as this in her husbands time, yet might she do it in her sons. For Ahazia (besides that he was wholly ruled by his mother) was not likely to take much care for the securitie of his half-brethren, or their children; as accounting his Fathers other wives, in respect of his own-born-Mother, little better than Concubines, and their children basely begotten. But if this mischievous woman forgot her self so far in her wicked policie, that the lost all opportunitie which the weaknesse of her husband and son did afford, of procuring unto her self some seeming Title; yet could shee afterwards feign some such matter, as boldly shee might: being sure that none would ask to see her evidence, for fear of being sent to learn the certaintie of her son or husband in another World. But I rather think that shee took order for her affairs before-hand. For though she had no reason to suspect or fear the sudden death of her son, yet it was the wisest way to provide betimes against all that might happen, whilst her husbands issue by other women was young and unable to resist. We plainly find that the Brethren or Nephewes of Ahazia, to the number of two and forty; were sent to the Court of Israel, only to salute the children of the King, and the children of the Queen. The slender occasion of which long journey, considered together with the qualitie of these persons (being in effect all the stock of Je-horam that could be grown to any strength) makes it very suspicious, that their entertainment in Jezebel's house would onely have been more formall, but little differing in substance, from that which they found at the hand of Je-hu. He that looks into the courses held both before and after by these two Queens, will find cause enough to think no lesse. Of such as have aspired unto Lordships not belonging to them, and thrust out the right Heirs by pretence of Testaments, that had no other validitie than the sword of such as claimed by them could give, Histories of late, yea of many Ages, afford plentifull examples: and the rule of Salomon is true: Is there any thing whereof one may say, Behold, this is new? It hath been al-ready in the old time that was before us. That a King might shed his brothers blood, was proved by Salomon upon Adonia; that hee might alien the Crown from his naturall Heirs, David had given proof; but these had good ground of their doings. They which follow examples that please them, will neglect the reasons of those examples, if they please them not, and rest contented with the practice, as more willing by shewing what they may do, than acknowledging why Salomon slew his brother that had begun one rebellion, &c. was entering into another. Je-horam slew all his brethren, which were better than he: David purchased the kingdome, and might the more freely dispose of it, yet he disposed of it as the Lord appointed: if Je-horam, who had lost much and gotten nothing; thought that he might alien the remainder at his pleasure; or if Ahazia sought to cut off the succession of his brethren, or of their issue, either of these was to be answered with the words which Je-hojada the Priest used afterwards, in declaring the title of Joash: Behold, the Kings son must reign; as the Lord hath said of the sons of David. Wherefore though I hold it very probable, that Athalia did pretend some title, whatsoever it might be, to the Crown of Juda; yet it is most certain that she had thereunto no right at all, but only got it by treacherie, murder, and open violence; and so she held it six whole years, and a part of the seventh, in good seeming securitie.

How Jehu spent his time in Israel, so that hee could not molest Athalia.

In all this time Je-hu did never go about to disturb her, which in reason he was likely to desire, being anemie to her whole House. But hee was occupied at the first in establishing himself, rooting out the posteritie of Ahab, and reforming somewhat in Religion: afterwards in wars against the Aramites, wherein hee was so far overcharged, that hardly he could retain his own, much lesse attempt upon others. Of the line of Ahab there were seventie living in Samaria, out of which number Je-hu by letter advised the Citizens to set up some one as King, and to prepare themselves to fight in his defence. Hereby might they gather how confident he was; which they well understood to proceed from greater power about him, than they could gather to resist him: Wherefore they took example by the two Kings whom he had slain, and being exceedingly afraid of him, they offered him their service; wherein they so readily shewed themselves obedient, that in lesse than one dayes warning; they sent him the heads of all those Princes, as they were enjoined by a second letter from him: After this he surprized all the Priests of Baal by a subtiltie, feigning a great sacrifice to their god, by which means he drew them altogether into one Temple, where hee slew them: and in the same zeal to God utterly demolished all the monuments of that impietie.

Concerning the Idolatrie devised by Je-roboam, no King of Israel had ever greater reason than Je-hu to destroy it. For he needed not to fear lest the people should be allured unto the house of David; it was (in appearance) quite rooted up, and the Crown of Juda in the possession of a cruell Tyrannesse: he had received his kingdom by the unexpected grace grace of God; and further in regard of his zeal expressed in destroying Baal out of Israel, he was promised, notwithstanding his following the sin of Feroboam, that the kingdom should remain in his Familie to the fourth Generation. But all this would not serve; he would needs help to piece out Gods providence with his own circumspection, doing therein like a foolish greedie gamester, who by stealing a needlesse Card to assure himself of winning a stake, forfeits his whole test. He had questionlesse displeased many, by that which he did against Baal; and many more he should offend by taking from them the use of a superstition, so long practised as was that Idolatrie of Feroboam. Yet all these, how many soever they were, had never once thought upon making him King, if God, whom (to retain them) he now forsook, had not given him the Crown, when more difficulties appeared in the way of getting it, than could at any time after be found in the means of holding it.

This ingratitude of Jehu drew terrible vengeance of God upon Israel, wherof Hazael King of Damascus was the executioner. The cruelty of this barbarous Prince we may find in the Prophecie of Elizeus, who fore-told it, saying: Their strong Cities shalt thou set on fire; and their young men shalt thou slay with the sword, and shalt dash their Infants against the stones, and rend in pieces their women with child. So did not onely the wickednesse of Ahab cause the ruine of his whole house, but the obstinate Idolatrie of the people bring a lamentable miserie upon all the Land. For the furie of *Hazael*s victorie was not quenched with the destruction of a few towns, nor wearied with one invasion; but he smote them in all the coast of Israel, and wasted all the Countrey beyond the River of Jordan. Notwithstanding all these calamities, it seems that the people repented not of their Idolatrie; (For in those dayes the Lord began to loath Israel;) but rather it is likely, that they bemoaned the noble house of Ahab, under which they had beaten those enemies to whom they were now a prey, and had bravely fought for the conquest of Syria, where they had enlarged their border, by winning Ramoth Gilead, and compelled Benhadad to restore the Cities which his Father had won: whereas now they were faine to make wofull shifts, living under a Lord that had better fortune and courage in murdering his master that had put him in trust, than in defending his people from their cruell enemies. Thus it commonly falls out, that they who can find all manner of difficulties in serving him, to whom nothing is difficult, are, in stead of the ease and the pleasure to themselves propounded by contrary courses, overwhelmed with the troubles which they sought to avoid; and therein by God, whom they first forsook, forsaken, and left unto the wretched labours of their own blind wisdom, wherein they had reposed all their confidence.

of Athaliah's Government.

These calamities falling upon Israel, kept Athalia safe on that side, giving her leisure to look to things at home: as having little to doe abroad, unlesse it were so that she held some correspondencie with Hazael, pretending therein to imitate her husbands grandfather King Aza, who had done the like. And some probability that she did so, may be gathered out of that which is recorded of her doings. For we find, that this wicked Athalia and her children brake up the house of God, and all things that were dedicate for the house of the Lord did they bestow upon Baalim. Such a sacrifice, though it proceeded from a desire to set out her own Idolatrie, with such pomp as might make it the more glorious in the peoples eyes, was not likely to want some fair pretext of necessitie of the State so requiring: in which case others before her had made bold with that holy place, and her next successour was faine to doe the like, being thereunto forced by Hazael, who perhaps was delighted with the taste of that which was formerly thence extracted for his sake.

Under this impious government of Athalia, the devotion of the Priests and Levites was very notable, and served (no doubt) very much to retain the people in the religion taught by God himself, howsoever the Queens proceedings advanced the contrary. For the povertie of that sacred Tribe of Levi must needs have been exceeding great at this time, all their lands and possessions in the ten Tribes being utterly lost, the oblations and other perquisites, by which they lived, being now very few and small; and the store laid up in better times under godly Kings, being all taken away by shamefull robbery. Yet they up-held in all this miserie the service of God, and the daily sacrifice, keeping daily their courses, and performing obedience to the high Priest, no lesse than in those dayes wherein their entertainment was farre better.

of the preservation of Joas.

Jehojada then occupied the high Priesthood, an honourable, wise, and religious man. To his carefulnesse it may be ascribed, that the state of the Church was in some slender sort up-held in those unhappy times. His wife was Jehoshabeth, who was daughter of King Iehoram, and sister to Ahaziah, a godly Lady and vertuous, whose piety makes it seem that Athalia was not her mother, though her access to the Court argue the contrary: but her discreet carriage might more easily procure her welcome to her own Fathers house, than the education under such a Mother could have permitted her to be such as she was. By her care Joash the young Prince that reigned soon after, was conveyed out of the nurserie, when Athalia destroyed all the Kings children, and was carried secretly into the Temple, where as secretly he was brought up. How it came to passe that this young child was not hunted out, when his body was missing; nor any great reckoning (for ought that we find) made of his escape, I will not stand to examine: for it was not good in policie, that the people should hear say, that one of the children had avoyded that cruell blow; it might have made them hearken after innovations, and so be the lesse conformable to the present government. So Joash was delivered out of that slaughter; he and his nurse being gone no man could tell whither, and might be thought peradventure to be cast away, as having no other guard than a poor woman that gave him suck, who foolishly doubting that she her self should have been slain, was fled away with him into some desolate place, where it was like enough that she and he should perish. In such cases flatterers, or men desirous of reward, easily coin such tales, and rather swear them to be true in their own knowledge, than they will lose the thanks due to their joyfull tidings.

S. V.

Whose Sonne Joas was.

I.

Whether Joas may be thought likely to have been the son of Ahaziah.

Now concerning this Joash, whose son hee was, it is a thing of much difficultie to affirm, and hath caused much controversie among writers. The places of Scripture, which call him the son of Ahaziah, seem plain enough. How any figure of the Hebrew language might give title of Sonne unto him, in regard that hee was his successour, I neither by my self can find, nor can by any help of Authors learn how to answer the difficulties appearing in the contrary opinions of them, that think him to have been, or not, the naturall son of Ahaziah. For whereas it is said, that the house of Ahaziah was not able to retain the Kingdom; some doe inferre that this Joash was not properly called his son, but was the next of his kindred, and therefore succeeded him, as sonne in the inheritance of his father. And hereunto the murder committed by Athalia, doth very well agree. For she perceiving that the Kingdom was to fall into their hands, in whom shee had no interest, might easily find cause to fear, that the tyrannie exercised by her husband at her instigation upon so many noble Houses, would now be revenged upon her self. The ruine of her Idolatrous Religion might in this case terrifie both her and her Minions; the sentence of the Law rewarding that offence with death; and the Tragedie of Jezebel teaching her what might happen to another Queen. All this had litle concerned her, if her own grand-child had been heir to the Crown; for she that had power enough to make her self Queen, could with more ease, and lesse envie, have taken upon her the office of a Protector, by which authoritie she might have done her pleasure, and been the more both obeyed by others; and and secure of her own estate, as not wanting an heir. Wherefore it was not needfull, that she should be so unnatural, as to destroy the Child of her own Son, of whose life she might have made greater use than the could of his death: whereas indeed, the love of Grand-mothers to their Nephewes, is little lesse than the Mothers to their Children.

This argument is very strong. For it may seem incredible, that all naturall affection should be cast a-side, when as neither necessitie urgeth, nor any commoditie thereby gotten requireth it, yea, when all humane policie doth teach one the same, which nature without reason would have perswaded.

†. II.

That Joas did not descend from Nathan.

BUt (as it is more easie to find a difficultie in that which is related, than to shew how it might have otherwise been) the pedigree of this Joash is, by them which think him not the son of Ahaziah, set down in such sort, that it may very justly be suspected. They say, that he descended from Nathan the son of David, and not from Salomon: to which purpose they bring a Historie (I know not whence) of two families of the race of David, saying, that the line of Salomon held the kingdom with this condition, that if at any time it failed, the familie of Nathan should succeed it. Concerning this Nathan the son of David, there are that would have him to be Nathan the Prophet, who, as they think, was by David adopted. And of this opinion was Origen, as also S. Augustine sometime was, but afterward he revoked it, as was meet; for this Nathan is reckoned among the sons of David, by Bathsua the daughter of Amnes, and therefore could not be the Prophet Gregory Nazianzen (as I find him cited by Peter Martyr) and after him Eusebius, and Faber Stapulensis, who likewise held the same of Joash, deriving him from Nathan. But Nathan and thole other brethren of Salomon by the same Mother, are thought, upon good likelihoods, to have bin the children of Uria the Hittite: and so are they accounted by sundrie of the Fathers, and by Lyrus, and Abulensis, who follow the Hebrew Expositors of that place in the first of Chronicles. The words of Salomon calling himself the only begotten of his mother, doe approve this exposition: for we read of no more than two sons which Bathsua or Bathsheba did bear unto David, whereof the one begotten in adultery, died an Infant, and Salomon onely of her children by the King did live. So that the rest must needs have bin the children of Uria, and are thought to have bin David only by adoption. Wherefore if Joas had not bin the son of Ahaziah, then must that pedigree have bin false, wherein S. Matthew deriveth him lineally from Salomon; yea, then had not our blessed Saviour issued from the loins of David, according to the flesh, but had only bin of his line by courtisie of the Nation, and form of law, as any other might have bin. As for the authority of Philo, which hath drawn many late writers into the opinion that Joash was not of the posteritie of Salomon, it is enough to say, that this was Frit Annius his Philo: for no other edition of Philo hath any such matter; but Annius can make Authors to speak what he list.

†. III.

That Joas may probably be thought to have been the son of Jehoram.

IN so doubtfull a case, if it seem lawfull to hold an opinion that no man hath yet thought upon, me thinks it were not amisse to lay open at once, and peruse together two places of Scripture, whereof the one telling the wickedness of Jehoram the son of Jehoshaphat King of Juda, for which he and his children perished, rehearseth it as one of Gods mercies towards the house of David, that according to his promise hee would give him a light, and to his children for ever: the other doth say, that for the offences of the same Jehoram, there was not a son left him, save Jehoahas the youngest of his sons. Now, if it were in regard of Gods promise to David, that after thole massacres of Jehoram upon all his brethren, and of the Philistines and Arabians upon the children of Jehoram, one of the seed of David escaped; why may it not be thought that hee was said to have escaped, in whom the line of David was preserved: for had all the race of Salomon been rooted up in these wofull Tragedies, and the progenie of Nathan succeeded implacethereof, little enough it is that some remembrance more particular would have been want; of an event so memorable. That the race of Nathan was not extinguished, it is indeed appaerent by the Genealogie of our Lord, as it is recounted by S. Luke: but the preservation of the house of David, mentioned in the books of Kings and Chronicles, was performed in the person of Jehoahas; in whom the Royall branch of Salomon, the naturall, and not only legall issue remaining of David, was kept alive. Wherefore it may be thought that this Joash, who followed Athalia in the Kingdom, was the youngest son of Jehoram, whose life Athalia, as a stepdame, was not likely to pursue. For it were not easily understood, why the preservation of David's line, by Gods especiall mercie, in regard of his promise made, should pertain rather to that time, when besides Athalia himself, there were two and fortie of his brethren, or (as in another place they are called) sons of his brethren remaining alive, which afterwards were all slain by Jehu; than have reference to the lamentable destruction and little lesse than extirpation of that progenie, wherein onely one did escape. Certainly that inhumane murder which Jehoram committed upon his brethren, if it were (as appeareth in the Historie) revenged upon his own children, then was not this vengeance of God accomplished by the Philistines and Arabians, but being only begun by them, was afterwards prosecuted by Jehu; and finally took effect by the hands of that same wicked woman; at whose instigation he had committed such barbarous outrage. And from this execution of Gods heave judgement laid upon Jehoram and all his children, onely Jehoahas his youngest sonne was exempted, whom therefore if I should affirm to be the same with Joas, which is called the son of Ahaziah, I should not vvant good probabilitie. Some further appearance of necessitie there is, which doth argue that it could no otherwise have been. For it was the youngest sonne of Jehoram in whom the race was preserved; which could not in any likelihood be Ahaziah, seeing that he was twenty years old at the least (as is already noted,) when he began to reign, and consequently, was born in the eighteenth or twentieth year of his Fathers age. Now I know not whether of the two is more unlikely, either that Jehoram should have begotten many children before hee was eighteen years old, or that having (as he had) many wives and children, he should upon the sudden, at his eighteenth year, become unfruitfull, and beget no more in twenty years following: each of which must have bin true, if this were true that Ahaziah was the same Jehoahas which was his youngest sonne. But this inconvenience is taken away, and those other doubts arising from the causelesse crueltie of Athalia, in seeking the life of Joas are easily cleared, if Joas and Jehoahas were one. Neither doth his age withstand this opinion; For he was seven years old when he began to reign; which if we understand of years compleat, he might have been a year old at the death of Jehoram, being begotten somewhat after the beginning of his sicknesse. Neither is it more absurd to say that he was the naturall son of Jehoram, though called the son of Ahaziah, than it were to say, as great Authors have done, this difficultie notwithstanding, that he was of the posteritie of Nathan. One thing indeed I know not how to answer; which, had it concurred with the rest, might have served as the foundation of this opinion. The name of Jehoahas, that soundeth much more neer to Joas, than to Ahaziah, in an English ear, doth in the Hebrew (as I am informed by some, skilfull in that language) through the diversitie of certain letters, differ much from that which it most resembleth in our Western manner of writing, and little from the other. Now, although it be so that Ahaziah himself be also called Azariah, and must have had three names, if he were the same with Jehoahas; in which manner Joas might also have had severall names; yet, because I find no other warrant hereof than a bare possibilitie, I will not presume to build an opinion upon the weak foundation of mine own conjecture, but leave all to the consideration of such as have more abilitie to judge, and leisure to consider of this point.

†. IV.

Upon what reasons Athalia might seek to destroy Joas, if he were her own grandchild.

IF therefore we shall follow that which is commonly received, and interpret the text according to the letter, it may be said; that Athalia was not only blinded by the passions pass of ambition and zeal to her idolatrous worship of Baalim, but pursued the accomplishment of some unnatural desires, in seeking the destruction of her grand-child, and the rest of the bloud Royall. For whether it were so that Athalie (as proud and cruel women are not always chaste) had imitated the libertie of Jezebel her sister in law, whose whose domes were upbraided by Jezebel her son; or whether she had children by some former husband, before she was married unto Jehoram (which is not unlikely, in regard of her age, who was daughter of Omri, and sister to Ahah) certain it is, that she had sons of her own, and those old enough to be employed as they were, in robbing of the Temple. So it is not greatly to be wondered at, that to settle the crown upon her own children, she did seek to cut off, by wicked policie, all other claims. As for Joas, if she were his grand-mother, yet she might mistrust the interest which his mother would have in him, lest when he came to years, it might draw him from her devotion. And hereof (believe that women doe commonly better love their daughters husbands, than their sons wives) there is some appearance in the reign of her son; for he made him spend all his time in idle journeys; to no other apparent end, than that he might rule at home; and he having abroad be estranged from his wife, and entertain some new fancies, wherein Jezebel had cunning enough to be his Tutoresse. But when the sword of Jezebel had rudely cut in under all these fine devices, then was Athalie faine to goe roundly to work, and doe as she did, whereby she thought to make all sure. Other wise, if (as I could rather think) she were onely stepdame to Joas, we need not seek into the reasons moving her to take away his life; her own hatred was cause enough to dispatch him among the first.

A digression, wherein is maintained the libertie of using conjecture in Histories.

Thus much concerning the person of Joas, from whom, as from a new root, the tree of David was propagated into many branches. In handling of which matter, the more I consider the nature of this Historie, and the diversity betwixt it and others, the lesse me thinks I need to suspect mine own presumption, as deserving blame, for curiositie in matter of doubt, or boldnesse in libertie of conjecture. For all Histories doe give us information of humane counsels and events, as farre forth as the knowledge and faith of the writers can afford; but of Gods will, by which all things are ordered, they speak onely at random, and many times falsely. This we often find in profane writers, who ascribe the ill successe of great undertakings, to the neglect of some impious Rites, whereof indeed God abhorred the performance as vehemently, as they thought him to be highly offended with the omission. Hereat we may the lesse wonder, if we consider the answer made by the Fewes in Egypt unto Jeremie the Prophet reprehending their Idolatry. For howsoever the written Law of God was known unto the people, and his punishments laid upon them for contempt thereof were very terrible, and even then but newly executed; yet were they to obstinately bent unto their wills, that they would not by any means be drawn to acknowledge the true cause of their affliction. But they told the Prophet roundly, that they would worship the Queen of heaven, as they and their fathers, their Kings and their Princes had used to doe: For then (sayd they) had we plenty of victuals, and were well, and felt no evil: adding, that all manner of miseries were befallen them, since they left off that service of the Queen of Heaven. So blind is the wisdom of man, in looking into the counsell of God, which to find out, there is no better nor other guide than his own written will, not perverted by vain additions.

Jer. 44. 17, 18.

But this Historie of the Kings of Israel and Juda hath herein a singular prerogative above all that have been written by the most sufficient of merely humane Authors: it setteth down expressly the true, and first causes of all that happened; not in imputing the death of Ahah to his over-forwardnesse in battell; the ruine of his Familie, to the securitie of Jehoram in Jezebel; nor the victories of Hazael, to the great commotions raised in Israel, by the comming of Jezebel; but referring all unto the will of God, I mean, to his revealed will, from which that his hidden purposes doe not varie, this Story, by many great examples, gives most notable prooffe. True it is, that the concurrence of second causes with their effects, is in these books nothing largely described; nor perhaps exactly in any of those Histories that are in these points most copious. For it was well noted by that worthy Gentleman, Sir Philip Sidne, that Historians doe borrow of Poets, not onely much of their ornament, but somewhat of their substance. Informations are often false, records not alwaies true, and notorious actions commonly insufficient to discover the passions which doe set them first on foot. Wherefore they are faine (I speak of the best, and in that which is allowed; for to take out of Livie every one circumstance of Claudius his journey against Asdrubol in Italy, fitting all to another businesse, or any practice of that kind, is neither Historically, nor Poetically) to search into the particular humour of Princes, and of those which have governed their affections, or the instruments by which they wrought; from whence they do collect the most likely motives or impediments of every businesse; and so figuring as neer to the life as they can imagine, the matter in hand, they judiciously consider the defects in counsell, or obliquity in proceeding.

S. Phil. Sid. in his Apol. for Poetry.

Yet all this, for the most part, is not enough to give assurance, howsoever it may give satisfaction. For the heart of man is unsearchable: and Princes, howsoever their intents bee seldome hidden from some of those many eyes which prie both into them, and into such as live about them; yet sometimes either by their own close temper, or by some subtil mist, they conceal the truth from all reports. Yea, many times the affections themselves lye dead, and buried in oblivion, when the preparations which they begar, are converted to another use. The industrie of an Historian, having to many things to wearie it, may well bee excused, when finding apparent cause enough of things done, it forbeareth to make further search; though it often fall out, where sundry occasions work to the same end, that one small matter in a weak mind is more effectually, than many that seem farre greater. So comes it many times to passe, that great fires, which consume whole houses or towns, begin with a few straws, that are wasted or not seen; when the flame is discovered, having fastened upon some wood-pile, that catcheth all about it. Questionlesse it is, that the warre commenced by Darius, and pursued by Xerxes against the Greeks, proceeded from desire of the Persians to enlarge their Empire: howsoever the enterprize of the Athenians upon Sardes, was noised abroad as the ground of that quarrell; yet Herodotus telleth us, that the wanton desire of Queen Atassa, to have the Grecian dames her bond-women, did first move Darius to prepare for this war before he had received any injury, and when he did not yet so much desire to get more, as to enjoy what was already gotten.

Herod. lib. 1.

I will not here stand to argue whether Herodotus be more justly reprehended by some, or defended by others, for alleging the vain appetite, and secret speech of the Queen in bed with her husband, as the cause of those great evils following; this I may boldly affirm, (having, I think, in every estate some sufficient witness) that matters of much consequence, founded in all seeming upon substantiall reasons, have issued indeed from such pettie trifles, as no Historian would either think upon, or could well search out.

Therefore it was a good answer that Sixtus Quintus the Pope, made to a certain Frier, coming to visit him in his Popedome, as having long before in his meaner estate, been his familiar friend. This poor Frier, being emboldened by the Pope to use his old liberty of speech, adventured to tell him, that he very much wondered how it was possible for his Holinesse, whom hee rather took for a direct honest man, than any cunning Politician, to attain unto the Papacy; in compassing of which, all the subtilty (said he) of the most crafty brains, find work enough: and therefore the more I think upon the Art of the Conclave, and your unaptnesse thereto, the more I needs must wonder. Pope Sixtus to satisfie the plain dealing Frier, dealt with him again as plainly, saying, Hadst thou lived abroad as I have done, and seen by what folly this world is governed, thou wouldest wonder at nothing.

Surely, if this be referred unto those exorbitant engines, by which the course of affaires is moved, the Pope said true. For the wisest of men are not without their vanities, which requiring and finding mutuall toleration, work more closely, and earnestly, than right reason either needs or can. But if wee lift up our thoughts to that Supreme Governour, of whose Empire all that is true, which by the Poet was said of Jupiter.

Qui

*Qui terram inersum, qui mare temperat
Fentosum, & urbes, regnaque tristia, Divosque mortalesque turmas, Imperio regit unus aquo.*

Who rules the duller earth, the wind-swoln streams,
The civill Cities and th' infernall Realms,
Who th' host of heaven, and the mortall band,
Alone doth govern by his just command.

Then shall wee find the quite contrary. In him there is no uncertainty nor change; hee foreseeeth all things, and all things dispose to his own honour; Hee neither deceiveth nor can be deceived, but continuing one and the same for ever, doth constantly govern all creatures by that Law, which he hath prescribed, and will never alter. The vanities of men beguile their vain contrivers, and the prosperity of the wicked, is the way leading to their destruction: yea, this broad and headlong passage to hell, is not so delightfull as it seems at the first entrance, but hath growing in it, besides the poysons which infect the soul, many cruell thorns deeply wounding the body; all which, if any few escape, they have onely this miserable advantage of others, that their descent was the more swift and expedite. But the service of God is the path guiding us to perfect happiness, and hath in it a true, though not compleat felicity, yeelding such abundance of joy to the conscience, as doth easily countervail all afflictions whatsoever; though indeed those brambles that sometimes tear the skin of such as walk in this blessed way, doe commonly lay hold upon them at such time as they sit down to take their ease, and make them with themselves at their journey's end, in the presence of their Lord whom they faithfully serve, in whose presence is the fulnesse of joy, and at whose right hand are pleasures for ever.

Wherefore it being the end and scope of all History, to teach by example of times past, such wisdom as may guide our desires and actions, we should not marvell though the Chronicles of the Kings of Juda and Israel, being written by men inspired with the Spirit of God, instruct us chiefly, in that which is most requisite for us to know; as the means to attain unto true felicity, both here, and hereafter, propounding examples which illustrate this infallible rule, The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom. Had the expedition of Xerxes (as it was foretold by Daniel) been written by some Prophet after the captivity: we may well believe that the counsel of God therein, and the executioners of his righteous will; should have occupied either the whole or the principall room in that narration. Yet had not the purpose of Darius, the desire of his Wife, and the business at Sardes, with other occurrents, been the lesse true, though they might have been omitted, as the lesse materiall: but these things it had been lawfull for any man to gather out of prophane Histories; or out of circumstances otherwise appearing, wherein he should not have done injury to the Sacred Writings, as long as he had forborn to derogate from the first causes, by ascribing to the second more than was due.

Such, or little different, is the business that I have now in hand: wherein I cannot believe that any man of judgement will tax me, as either fabulous or presumptuous. For hee doth not feign, that rehearseth probabilities as bare conjectures; neither doth he deprave the Text, that seeketh to illustrate and make good in humane reason, those things which authoritie alone, without further circumstance, ought to have confirmed in every mans belief. And this may suffice in defence of the liberty which I have used in conjectures, and may hereafter use when occasion shall require, as neither unlawful, nor misbecoming an Historian.

The conspiracie against Athalia.

VV Hen Athalia had now fix years and longer worn the Crown of Juda, and hand found neither any foreign enemy, nor domesticall adversarie to disturb her possession, suddenly the period of her glory, and reward of her wickednesse meeting together, took her away without any warning, by a violent and shamefull death. For the growth of the young Prince began to be such, as permitted him no longer to be concealed, and it had been very unfitting that his education should be simple, to make him seem the child of some poor man (as for his safety it was requisite,) when his capacity required to have been indured with the stomach and qualities meet for a King. All this Fehojada the Priest considered, and withall, the great increase of impiety, which taking deep root in the Court, was likely to spread it selfe over all the Country, if care were not used to weed it up very speedily. Wherefore he associated unto himself five of the Captains, in whose fidelity hee had best assurance; and having taken an oath of them, and shewed them the Kings son, hee made a Covenant with them, to advance him to the Kingdome. These drew in others of the principall men, to countenance the action, procuring at the first onely that they should repair to Jerusalem, where they were further acquainted with the whole matter. There needed not many persuasions to win them to the business: the promise of the Lord unto the house of David, was enough to assure them that the action was both lawfull, and likely to succeed as they desired.

But in compassing their intent, some difficulties appeared: For it was not to be hoped, that with open force they should bring their purpose to good issue; neither were the Captains, and other associates of Fehojada able by close working, to draw together so many trusty and serviceable hands as would suffice to manage the business. To help in this case, the Priest gave order to such of the Levites as had finished their courses in waiting on the Divine service at the Temple, and were now relieved by others that succeeded in their turns, that they should not depart untill they knew his further pleasure. So by admitting the new commers, and not discharging the old, hee had, without any noise, made up such a number, as would be able to deal with the Queens ordinary Guard, and that was enough: for if the Tyrannesse did not prevail against them at the first brunt, the favour of the People was like to shew it self on their side, who made head against her. These Levites were placed in the inner Court of the Temple, about the person of the King, who as yet was kept close; the followers of the Captains, and other adherents, where bestowed in the utter Courts: As for weapons, the Temple it self had store enough; King David had left an Armory to the place, which was now employed in defence of his issue.

All things being in a readinesse, and the day come, wherein this high design was to be put in execution; Fehojada delivered unto the Captains, Armour for them and their adherents, appointed a guard unto the Kings person, produced him openly, and gave unto him the Crown; using all ceremonies accustomed in such solemnities, with great applause of the people. Of these doings, the Queen was the last that heard any word. Which is not so strange as it may seem: for insolent natures, by dealing outrageously with such as bring them ill tidings, doe commonly lose the benefit of hearing what is to be feared, whilst yet it may be prevented, and have no information of danger, till their own eyes, amazed with the suddenness, behold it in the shape of inevitable mischief.

All Jerusalem was full of the rumour, and entertained it with very good liking. Some carried home the newes, others ran forth to see, and the common joy was so great, that without apprehension of perill, under the windowes of the Court, were the people running and praising the King. Athalia hearing and beholding the extraordinary concourse, and noise of folks in the streets, making towards the Temple, with much unusuall passion in their looks, did presently conceive, that somewhat worthy of her care was happened; though, what it might be, she did not apprehend. Howsoever it were, she meant to use her own wisdom in looking into the matter, and ordering all as the occasion might happen to require. It may bee, that she thought it some especiall solemnity used in the Divine service, which caused this much ado; and hereof the unaccustomed number of Levites, and of other devout men, about the town, might give some presumption.

Many things argue that she little thought upon her own Tragedy; although Iosephus would make it seem otherwise. For we find in the Text, She came to the people into the house of the Lord (which was neer to her Palace) and that when she looked and saw the King stand by his pillar, as the manner was with the Princes, or great men of the Land by him, and the Trumpeters proclaiming him, shee rent her clothes, and cried Treason, Treason. Hereby it appears that shee was quietly going, without any mistrust or fear, to take her place; which when she found occupied by another, then she began to afflict her self, as one cast away, and cried out in vain upon the Treason, whereby she saw that she must perish. But that she came with a guard of armed men to the Temple, (as Josephus reporteth) and that her company being beaten back, she entred alone, and commanded the people to kill the young Tyrant, I find no where in Scripture, neither doe I hold it credible. For had she truly known how things went, she would surely have gathered her friends about her, and used those forces in defence of her Crown, by which shee gat it, and hitherto had held it. Certainly, if it were granted, that shee, like to a new Semiramus, did march in the head of her troop, yet it had been meer madnesse in her, to enter the place alone, when her assistants were kept out; but if shee, perceiving that neither her authority, nor their own weapons, could prevail to let in her guard, would nevertheless take upon her to command the death of the new King, calling a child of seven years old a Conspirator, and bidding them to kill him, whom shee saw to be armed in his defence, may we not think that shee was mad in the most extreme degree? Certain it is that the counsell of God would have taken effect, in her destruction, had she used the most likely means to disappoint it: yet we need not so cut her throat with any morall impossibilities. It is enough to say, that the godly zeal of Jehojada found more easie successe, through her indiscretion, than otherwise could have been expected; so that at his appointment, shee was without more adoe, carried out of the Temple and slain, yea so, that no blood, save her own, was shed in that quarrell; her small train that she brought along with her, not daring to stand in her defence.

S. VIII.

The death of Athalia, with a comparisen of her and Jezabel.

Most like it is, that Athalia had many times, with great indignation, bewailed the rashnesse of her Nephew Jehoram the Israelite, who did foolishly cast himself into the very throat of danger, gaping upon him, onely through his eager desire of quickly knowing what the matter meant: yet shee her selfe, by the like bait, was taken in the like trap, and having lived such a life as Jezabel had done, was rewarded with a suitable death. These two Queens were in many points much alike, each of them was Daughter, Wife, and Mother to a King; each of them ruled her husband, was an Idolatresse and a Murtheresse. The onely difference appearing in their condition, is, that Jezabel is more noted as incontinent of body, Athalia as ambitious: So that each of them surviving her husband about eight years, did spend their time in satisfying her own affections; the one using tyrannie, as the exercise of her haughty mind; the other painting her face, for the ornament of her unchaste body. In the manner of their death little difference there was, or in those things which may seem in this world to pertain unto the dead when they are gone. Each of them was taken on the sudden by Conspirators, and each of them exclaiming upon the Treason, received sentence from the mouth of one that had lived under her subjection; in execution whereof, Jezabel was trampled under the feet of her enemies horses; Athalia slain at her own horse-gate; the death of Athalia having (though not much) the more leisure to vex her proud heart; that of Jezabel the more indignitie, and shame of body. Touching their buriall, Jezabel was devoured by Dogges, as the Lord had threatened by the Prophet Elias; what became of Athalia wee doe not find. Like enough it is, that she was buried, as having not persecuted and slain the Lords Prophets, but suffered the Priests to exercise their function; yet of her buriall there is no monument, for she was a Church-robber. The service of Baal erected by these two Queens, was destroyed as soon as they were gone, and their Chaplaines, the Priests of that Religion, slain. Herein also it came to passe, alike, as touching them both when they were dead; the Kings who slew them, were afterwards afflicted, both of them by the same hand of Hazael the Syrian; in which point Athalia had the greater honour, if the Syrian (who seems to have been her good friend) pretended her revenge, as any part of his quarrell to Juda. Concerning children, all belonging to Jezabel perished in few few dayes after her: whether Athalia left any behind her, it is uncertain; she had sons living after shee was Queen, of whom, or of any other, that they were slaine with her, we doe not find.

This is a matter not unworthy of consideration, in regard of much that may depend upon it. For if the children of Athalia had been in Jerusalem when their Mother fell, their death would surely have followed hers as neerely, and beene registered, as well as the death of Mattan the Priest of Baal. That Law by which God forbade that the children should die for the fathers, could not have saved these ungracious Imps, whom the clause following would have cut off, which commands, that every man should die for his own sinne. Seeing therefore that they had been professors and advancers of that vile and Idolatrous worship of Baal, yea had robbed the Temple of the Lord, and enriched the house of Baal with the spoile of it; likely it is, that they should not have escaped with life, if Jehojada the Priest could have gotten them into his hands. As there was lawfull cause enough requiring their death, so the security of the King and his friends, that is, of all the Land, craved as much; and that very earnestly. For these had been esteemed as heires of their mothers Crowne, & being reckoned as her assistants in that particular businesse of robbing the Temple, may be thought to have carried a great sway in other matters, as Princes, and fellowes with their Mother in the Kingdome. Therefore it is evident, that either they were now dead, or (perhaps following Hazael in his warres against Jebu) absent from Jerusalem; whereby Jehojada might, with the more confidence, adventure to take Armes against their Mother, that was desolate.

CHAP. XXII.

Of Joas and Amasia, with their Contemporaries; where somewhat of the building of Carthage.

S. I.

Of Joas his doings, whilest Jehojada the Priest lived.

By the death of Athalia, the whole countie of Juda was filled with great joy and quietnesse; wherein Joas, a child of seven yeeres old or there about, began his reign, which continued almost fortie yeeres. During his minority, he lived under the protection of that honourable man Jehojada the Priest, who did as faithfully govern the Kingdome, as he had before carefully preserved the Kings life, & restored him unto the Throne of his ancestors. When he came to mans estate, he took by appointment of Jehojada two wives, & begat Sonnes and Daughters, repairing the family of David which was almost worn out. The first Act that hee took in hand, when hee began to rule without a Protector, was the reparation of the Temple. It was a needfull piece of work, in regard of the decay wherein that holy place was fallen, through the wickednesse of ungodly Tyrants; and requisite it was that hee should up-hold the Temple, whom the Temple had up-held. This businesse he followed with so earnest a zeal, that not only the Levites were more slack than he, but even Jehojada was faine to be quickened by his admonition. Money was gathered for the charges of the work; partly out of the tax imposed by Moses, & partly out of the liberality of the people; who gave so freely, that the Temple, besides all reparations, was enriched with vessels of gold and silver; and with all other Utensiles. The sacrifices likewise were offered, as under godly Kings they had beene, and the service of God was magnificently celebrated.

§. II.

The Death of Jehojada, and Apostasie of Joas.

BUt this endured no longer than the life of Jehojada the Priest: who having lived an hundred and thirty yeeres, dyed before his Countrey could have spared him. He was buried among the Kings of Juda, as he well deserved, having preserved the race of them, and restored the true Religion, which the late Princes of that house, by attempting to eradicate, failed but a little of rooting up themselves, and all their issue. Yet this honourable Funerall seems to have bin given to him, at the motion of the people; it being said, They buried him in the Citie of David. As for the King himself, who did owe to him no lesse than his Crown and life, he is not likely to have been Author of it, seeing that hee was as easily comforted after his death, as if he had thereby been discharged of some heave debt.

For after the death of Jehojada, when the Princes of Juda began to flatter their King, he soon forgot, not only the benefits received by this worthy man his old Counsellour, but also the good precepts which he had received from him, yea & God himself, the Author of all goodnesse. These Princes drew him to the worship of Idols, where with Fehoram and Athalia had so infected the Countrey, in fifteen or sixteen yeeres, that thirty yeeres, or there-about, of the reigne of Joas, wherein the true Religion was exercised, were not able to cleere it from that mischief. The King himself, when once he was entred into these courses, ran on head-long, as one that thought it a token of his liberty, to despise the service of God; and a manifest prooffe of his being now King indeed, that he regarded no longer the sower admonitions of devout Priests. Hereby it appeares, that his former zeal was only counterfeited, wherein like an Actor upon the stage, he had striven to expresse much more lively affection, than they could shew, that were indeed religious.

§. III.

The causes and times of the Syrians invading Juda in the dayes of Joas.

BUt God, from whom hee was broken loose, gave him over into the hands of men, that would not easily bee shaken off. Hazael King of Aram, having taken Gath, a Towne of the Philistims, addressed himself towards Jerusalem, whether the little distance of way, and great hope of a rich booty, did invite him. He had an Army heartned by many victories, to hope for more; and for ground of the war (if his ambition cared for pretences) it was enough that the Kings of Juda had assisted the Israelites, in their enterprises upon Aram, at Ramoth Gilead. Yet I think hee did not want some further instigation. For if the Kingdome of Juda had molested the Aramites in the time of his predecessour, this was thoroughly recompensed, by forbearing to succour Israel, & leaving the ten Tribes in their extreme misery, to the fury of Hazael himself. Neither is it likely, that Hazael should have gone about to awake a sleeping Dogge, and stirre up against himself a powerfull enemy, before he had assured the conquest of Israel, that lay between Jerusalem and his own Kingdome, if some opportunity had not performed such easie and good successe, as might rather advance, than any way disturbe his future proceedings against the ten Tribes. Wherefore I hold it probable, that the sonnes of Athalia, mentioned before, were with him in this action, promising (as men expelled their Countreys usually doe) to draw many partakers of their own to his side; and not to remain, as Joas did, a neutrall in the warre betweene him and Israel, but to joine all their forces with his, as they had cause, for the rooting out of Jehu his posterity, who, like a bloudy Traitor, had utterly destroyed all the kindred of the Queenes, their mother, even the whole house of Ahab, to which hee was a subject. If this were so, Hazael had the more apparent reason to invade the Kingdome of Juda. Howsoever it were, we find it plainly, that Joas was afraid of him, and therefore took all the hallowed things, and all the gold that was found in the treasures of the house of the Lord, or in his own house, with which present hee redeemed his peace: the Syrian (questionlesse) thinking it a better bargain, to get so much readily paid into his hand for nothing, than to hazzard the assurance of this for the possibility of not much more. So Hazael departed with a rich boote of unhappy treasure, which belonging to the living God, remained a small while in the possession of this mighty, yet corruptible man, but sent him quickly to the grave. For in the thirtieth seventh yeere of Joas, which was the fifteenth of Jehoabaz, hee made this purchase; but in the same or very next yeere he died, leaving all that hee had unto his Sonne Ben-hadad, with whom these treasures prospered no otherwise, than ill-gotten goods are wont.

This enterprise of Hazael, is, by some, confounded with that warre of the Aramites upon Juda, mentioned in the second book of Chronicles. But the reasons alleged by them that hold the contrary opinion, doe forcibly prove, that it was not all one warre. For the former was compounded without blood-shed or fight; in the latter, Joas tried the fortune of a battaile, wherein being put to the worst, he lost all his Princes, and hardly escaped with life. In the one, Hazael himself was present; in the other, hee was not named: but contrariwise, the King of Aram then reigning (who may seem to have then been the Son of Hazael) is said to have been at Damascus. The first Armie came to conquer, and was so great, that it terrified the King of Juda; The second was a small company of men, which did animate Joas (in vaine, for God was against him) to deal with them, as having a very great Armie.

Now, concerning the time of this former invasion, I cannot perceive that God forsooke him, till he had first forsaken God. There are indeed some, very learned, who think that this expedition of Hazael was in the time of Jehoada the Priest, because that storie is joyned unto the restauration of the Temple. This had been probable, if the death of Jehoada had been afterwards mentioned in that place of the second book of Kings; or if the Apostasie of Joas, or any other matter implying so much, had followed in the relation. For it is not indeed to be doubted, that the Lord of all may dispose of all things, according to his own will & pleasure; neither was he more unjust in the afflictions of Jehoiada that righteous man, or the death of Josias that godly King, than in the plagues which he laid upon Pharaoh, or his judgements upon the house of Ahab. But it appeares plainly, that the rich furniture of the Temple, and the magnificent service of God therewithall, which are joyned together, were used in the house of the Lord continually, all the dayes of Jehoada; soone after whose death, if not immediately upon it, that is (as some very learnedly collect) in the sixt, or thirty seventh yeere of this Joas his reign, the King falling away from the God of his Fathers, became a foule Idolater.

And indeed we commonly observe, that the crosses which if hath pleased God sometimes to lay upon his servants without any cause notorious, in the eyes of men, have alwayes tended unto the bettering of their good. In which respect, even the sufferings of the blessed Martyrs (the death of his Saints being precious in the sight of the Lord) are to their great advantage. But with evill and rebellious men, God keepeth a more even and strict account, permitting usually their faults to get the start of their punishment; & either delaying his vengeance (as with the Amorites) till their wickednesse be full, or not working their amendment by his correction, but suffering them to run on in their wicked courses, to their greater misery. So hath he dealt with many; and so it appeares that hee dealt with Joas. For this unhappy man did not onely continue an obstinate Idolater, but grew so forgetfull of God and all goodnesse, as if hee had striven to exceed the wickednesse of all that went before him, and to leave such a villainous pattern unto others, as few or none of the most barbarous Tyrants should endure to imitate.

§. IV.

How Zacharia was murdered by Joas.

Sundry Prophets having laboured in-vaine to reclaim the people from their superstition, Zacharia the sonne of Jehoada the Priest, was stirred up at length by the Spirit of God, to admonish them of their wickednesse, and make them understand the punishment due unto it, whereof they stood in danger. This Zacharia was a man so much honoured, and sonne to a man so exceedingly beloved in his life time; and revered, that if Joas had reputed him (as Ahab did Elias) his open enemy, yet ought he in common honesty, to have cloaked his ill affection, and have used at least some pae of the respect that was due to such a person: On the other side, the singular affection which he and his father had born unto the King, and the unrecountable benefits which they had done unto him, from his first infancie, were such, as should have placed Zacharia in the most hearty and assured love of Joas, yea though hee had bin otherwise a man of very small mark, and not very good condition. The truth is, that the message of a Prophet sent from God, should be heard with reverence, how simple soever he appears that brings it. But this King Joas, having already scorned the admonitions and protestations of such Prophets as first were sent, did now deale with Zacharia, like as the wicked husbandmen, in that parable of our Saviour, dealt with the heir of the Vineyard, who said, This is the heir, come let us kill him, that the inheritance may be ours. By killing Zacharia he thought to become an absolute Commander, supposing belike that he was no free Prince, as long as one durst tell him the plain truth, how great soever that mans deservings were, that did so, yea though Gods commandement required it. So they conspired against this holy Prophet, and stoned him to death at the Kings appointment; but whether by any forme of open Law, as was practised upon Naboth; or whether surprising him by any close treachery, I doe neither read, nor can conjecture. The dignity of his person, confidred together with their treacherous conspiracie, makes it probable, that they durst not call him into publike judgement, though that the manner of his death, being such as was commonly, and by order of Law, inflicted upon malefactors, may argue the contrary. Most likely it is, that the Kings commandement, by which he suffered, took place in stead of Law: which exercise of meere power (as hath been already noted) was nothing strange amongst the Kings of Juda.

s. V.

How Joas was shamefully beaten by the Amorites, and of his death.

Chiron. 24. 24

THis odious murder, committed by an unthankfull snake upon the man in whose bosome he had been fostered, as of it self alone it sufficed to make the wretched Tyrant hatefull to men of his own time, and his memory detested in all ages; so had it the well-describ'd curse of the blessed Martyr, to accompany it unto the Throne of God, and to call for vengeance from thence; which fell down swiftly, and heavily upon the head of that ungratefull monster. It was the last yeere of his reign; the end of his time continuing then upon him, when he thought himself beginning to live how he list'd without controulment. When that yeer was expired, the Aramites came into the Country, rather as may seem to get pillage, than to performe any great action; for they came with a small company of men: but God had intended to do more by them, than they themselves did hope for.

That Joas naturally was a coward, his bloody malice against his best friend, is, in my judgement, proof sufficient: though otherwise his base composition with Hazael, when hee might have leavied (as his son after him did muster) three hundred thousand chosen men for the warre, doth well enough shew his temper. Yet now he would needs be valiant, and make his people know, how stout of disposition their King was, when he might have his own will. But his timorous heart, was not well cloaked. For to encounter with a few bands of Amorites, hee took a very great Army, so that wise men might well perceive, that he knew what he did; making shew as if he would fight for his Country, and expose himself to danger of warre, when as indeed all was meere ostentation, and no perill to be feared; hee going forth so strongly appointed, against so weak enemies. Thus might wise men think, and laugh at him in secret; considering what ado he made about that, which in all apparent reason was (as they say) a thing of nothing. But God, before whom the wisdom of this world is foolishnesse, did laugh not only at this vaine-glorious King, but at them that thought their King secure, by reason of the multitude that he drew along with him.

When the Aramites & King Joas met, whether it were by some folly of the Leaders, or by some amazement happening among the souldiers, or by whatsoever means it pleased God to work, so it was, that that great Army of Juda received a notable overthrow, and all the Princes were destroyed: the Princes of Juda, at whose perswasion the King had become a Rebel to the King of Kings: As for Joas himself (as Abulenſis and others expound expound the story) he was sorely beaten and hurt by them; being (as they think) taken and shamefully tormented, to wring out of him an excessive ranſome.

And surely, all circumstances do greatly strengthen this conjecture. For the Text (in the old translation) saith, they exercised upon Joas ignominious judgements; and that departing from him, they dismissed him in great languor. All which argues, that they had him in their hands, and handled him ill-favoredly. Now at that time Joas the son of Jehothaz reigned over Israel, and Benhadad the son of Hazael over the Syrians in Damascus; the one a valiant undertaking Prince, raised up by God to restore the State of his miserable Country; the other inferiour every way to his father, of whose purchases hee lost a great part, for want of skill to keep it. The difference in condition found between these two Princes, promising no other event than such as afterward followed, might have given to the King of Juda good cause to be bold, and pluck up his spirits; which Hazael had beaten down, if God had not been against him. But his fearfull heart being likely to quake upon any apprehension of danger, was able to put the Syrian King in hope, that by terrifying him with some shew of war at his doores, it were easie to make him crave any tolerable conditions of peace. The unexpected good successe hereof, already related, and the (perhaps as unsuspected) ill successe, which the Aramites found in their following wars against the King of Israel, sheweth plainly the weaknesse of all earthly might, resisting the power of the Almighty. For by his Ordinance, both the Kingdome of Juda, after more than forty years time of gathering strength, was unable to drive out a small company of Enemies; and the Kingdome of Israel, having so been trodden down by Hazael, that onely fifty Horsemen, ten Chariots, and ten thousand Footmen were left, prevailed against his Son, and recovered all from the victorious Aramites. But examples hereof are every-where found, and therefore I will not insist upon this; though indeed we should not, if we be Gods children, think it more tedious to hear long and frequent reports of our heavenly Fathers honour, than of the noble acts performed by our fore-fathers upon earth.

When the Aramites had what they list'd, and saw that they were not able, being so few, to take any possession of the Country, they departed out of Juda laden with spoile, which they sent to Damascus, themselves belike falling upon the ten Tribes, where it is to be thought that they sped not half so well. The King of Juda being in ill case, was killed on his bed when he came home, by the sons of an Ammonitess, and of a Moabitess, whom some (because onely their Mothers names, being strangers, are exprest) think to have been bondmen. Whether it were contempt of his fortune, or fear, left (as Tyrants use) hee should revenge disaster upon them, imputing it to their fault, or whatsoever else it were that animated them to murder their King; the Scripture tells us plainly, that, For the blood of the children of Jehoada, this befell him. And the same appears to have been used as the pretence of their conspiracy, in excuse of the fact when it was done. For Amaziah, the son and successor of Joas, durst not punish them, till his Kingdome was established: but contrariwise, his body was judged unworthy of buriall in the Sepulchres of the Kings: whereby it appears, that the death of Zacharia caused the treason, wrought against the King, to find more approbation, than was requisite, among the people, though afterwards it was recompensed by his sonne, upon the Traitors, with well-deserved death.

Of the Princes living in the time of Joas: of the time when Carthage was built: and of Dido.

THere lived with Joas, Mezades and Diognetus in Athens: Eudemus and Aristomides in Corinth: about which time Agrippa Sylvius, and after him Sylvius Alladius, were Kings of the Albans in Italy. Ocraxapes, commonly called Anacyn-daraxes, the thirty seventh King succeeded unto Ophratanes, began his reign over the Assyrians, about the eighteenth year of Joas, which lasted forty two years. In the sixteenth of Joas, Cephrenes, the fourth from Sesac, succeeded unto Cheops in the Kingdome of Egypt, and held it fifty years.

In this time of Joas, was likewise the reign of Pigmalion in Tyre, and the foundation of of Carthage by Dido, the building of which City is, by divers Authors, placed in divers ages, some reporting it to be 70. years younger than Rome, others above 400. years older, few or none of them giving any reason of their assertions, but leaving us uncertain whom to follow: Josephus, who had read the Annals of Tyre, counting one hundred forty and three years and eight moneths from the building of Salomons Temple, in the twelfth year of Hiram King of Tyre, to the founding of Carthage by Dido, in the seventh year of Pigmalion. The particulars of this account (which is not rare in Josephus) are very perplexed, and serve not very well to make clear the totall summe. But whether it were so that Josephus did omit, or else that he did mis-write some number of the years, which he reckoneth in Fractions, as they were divided among the Kings of Tyre, from Hiram to Pigmalion; we may well enough beleieve, that the Tyrian writers, out of whose books he gives us the whole summe, had good means to know the truth, and could rightly reckon the difference of time, between two works no longer following one the other than the memory of three or four generations might easily reach. This hundred forty and four years current, after the building of Salomons Temple, being the eleventh year of Joas, was a hundred forty and three years before the birth of Rome; and after the destruction of Troy, two hundred eighty and nine: a time so long after the death of Aeneas, that we might truly conclude all to be fabulous which Virgil hath written of Dido, as Ausonius noteth, who doth honour her Statua with this Epigram:

Auson. ep. 117.

Illa ego sum Dido vultu quam conspicis hospes,
A simulata modis pulchraque mirificis.
Talis eram, sed non Maro quam mihi finxit, erat mens;
Vita nec incestis lata cupidinibus:
(Namque nec Aeneas vidit me Troias unquam, Nec Lybiam advenit, clasisbus Iliacis.
Sed furias fugiens, atque arma procacis Iarbae, Servavit, fateor, morte pudicitiam;
Pectore transfixo castos quod pertulit enses)
Fon furor, aut laeso crudus amore dolor.
Sic cecidisse juvat: vixi sine vulnere fama,
Ultra virum, postis manibus oppeti.
Invida cur in me stimulasti Musa Maronem, Fingeret ut nostrae damna pudicitiae?
Vos magis Historicis lectores credite de me
Quam qui furta Deum concubitusque canunt.
Falsidici vates: semerant qui carmine verum,
Humanisque deos asimulant vitiis.

Which in effect is this.

I Am that Dido which thou here do'st see,
Cunningly fram'd in beauteous Imag'rie,
Like this I was, but had not such a soul,
As Maro feign'd, incestuous and foul.
Aeneas never with his Trojan hoast
Beheld my face, or landed on this coast.
But flying proud Iarbas villanie,
Not mov'd by furious love or jealousy,
I did with weapon chaste, to save my fame,
Make way for death untimely, ere it came.
This was my end; but first I built a Town,
Revenge'd my husbands death, liv'd with renown.
Why did'st thou stirre up Virgil, envious Muse,
Falsely my name and honour to abuse?
Readers, beleve Historians; not those Whichto the world Jooves thefts and vice expose.
Poets are lyars, and for verses sake
Will make the Gods of humane crimes partake.

From

From the time of Dido unto the first Punick warre, that Carthage grew and flourished in wealth and conquests, we find in many Histories: but in particular wee find little of the Carthaginian affaires before that war, excepting those few things that are recorded of their attempts of the Isle of Sicil. We will therefore deferre the relation of matters concerning that mighty Citie, untill such time as they shall encounter with the State of Rome, by which it was finally destroyed; and prosecute in the mean while the History that is now in hand.

10 The beginning of Amazia his reign: Of Joas King of Israel; and Eliha the Prophet.

Amazias, the son of Joash, being twenty five years old when his Father died, took possession of the Kingdom of Juda, wherein he laboured so to demean himself, as his new beginning reign might be least offensive. The Law of Moses hee professed to observe, which howsoever it had been secretly despised since the time of Jehoram, by many great persons of the land, yet had it by provision of good Princes, yea, and of bad ones (in their best times) imitating the good, but especially by the care of holy Priests, taken such deep root in the peoples hearts, that no King might hope to be very plausible, who did not conform himself unto it. And at that present time, the slaughter which the Aramites had made of all the Princes, who had withdrawn the late King from the service of God, being seconded by the death of the King himself, even whilst that execrable murder, committed by the King upon Zecharia, was yet fresh in memory, did serve as a notable example of Gods justice against Idolaters, both to animate the better sort of the people in holding the Religion of their fathers, and to discourage Amazia from following the way, which led to such an evill end. Hee therefore, having learned of his father the art of dissimulation, did not onely forbear to punish the Traitors that had slain King Joas, but gave way to the time, and suffered the dead body to be interred, as that of Jehoram formerly had been, in the City of David, yet not among the Sepulchres of the Kings of Juda. Nevertheless, after this, when (belike) the noise of the people having wearied it self into silence, it was found that the Conspirators (howsoever their deed done, was applauded as the handie-worke of God) had neither any mighty partakers in their fact, nor strong maintainers of their persons, but rested secure, as having done well, seeing it was not ill taken: the King, who perceived his government well established, called them into question, at such a time, as the heat of mens affections being well allayed, it was easie to distinguish between their treasons and Gods judgements, which, by their treasons, had taken plausible effect. So they were put to death without any tumult, and their children (as the Law did require) were suffered to live: which could not but give contentment to the people, seeing that their King did the office of a just Prince, rather than of a revenging sonne. This being done, and his own life better secured, by such exemplary justice, against the like attempts, Amazia carried himself outwardly as a Prince well affected to Religion; and so continued in rest, about twelve or thirteen years.

As Amazia gathered strength in Juda by the commodity of a long peace, so Joas the Israelite grew as fast in power, by following the war hotly against the Aramites. Hee was a valiant and fortunate Prince, yet an Idolater, as his Predecessors had been, worshipping the Calves of Jeroboam. For this sinne had God so plagued the house of Jehu, that the ten tribes wanted little of being utterly consumed, by Hazael and Benhadad, in the time of Jehu and his sonne Jehoahaz. But as Gods benefits to Jehu, sufficed not to withdraw him from this politique Idolatry; so were the miseries, rewarding that impiety, unable to reclaim Jehoahaz from the same impious course: yet the mercy of God beholding the trouble of Israel, did condescend unto the prayers of this ungodly Prince, even then when hee and his miserable subjects, were obstinate in following their own abominable wayes. Therefore in temporall matters the ten Tribes recovered apace; but the favour of God, which had been infinitely more worth, I doe not find, nor believe that they sought: that they had it not, I find in the words of the Prophet, saying plainly to Amazia, the Lord is not with Israel, neither with all the house of Ephraim.

Whether

Whether it were so, that the great Prophet Elisha, who lived in those times, did foretell the prosperity of the Israelites under the reign of Joas; or whether Jehoahaz, wearied and broken with long adversity, thought it the wisest way, to discharge himself in part of the heave cares attending those unhappy Syrian Warres, by laying the burden upon his hopefull son; we find that in the thirtieth seventh year of Joas, King of Juda, Joas the son of Jehoahaz began to reign over Israel in Samaria; which was in the 15. year of his fathers reign, and some two or three years before his death.

It appears that this young Prince, even from the beginning of his Rule, did so well husband that poor stock that he received from his Father, of ten Chariots, fifty Horsemen, and ten thousand Foot, that hee might seem likely to prove a thriver. Amongst other circumstances, the words which he spake to Elisha the Prophet, argue no lesse, 2 King. 13. 14 For Joas visiting the Prophet, who lay sick, spake unto him thus; O my father, my father, the Chariots of Israel, and the horsemen of the same: by which manner of speech hee did acknowledge, that the prayers of this holy man had stood his Kingdome in more stead, than all the Horses and Chariots could doe.

This Prophet who succeeded unto Elias, about the first year of Foram the son of Ahab King of Israel died (as some have probably collected) about the third or fourth year of this Joas, the Nephew of Jehu. To shew how the spirit of Elias was doubled, or did rest upon him, it exceedeth my faculty. This is recorded of him, that hee did not only raise a dead child unto life, as Elias had done, but when hee himselfe was dead, it pleased God that his dead bones should restore life unto a carcass, which touched them in the grave. In fine, hee bestowed as a legacie, three victories upon King Joas, who thereby did set Israel in a fair way of recovering all that the Aramites had usurped, and weakning the Kings of Damasco in such sort, that they were never after terrible to Samaria.

of Amazia his war against Edom; His Apostasie; and overthrow by Joas.

THE happy success which Joas had found in his war against the Aramites, was³⁹ such as might kindle in Amazia a desire of undertaking some expedition, wherein himselfe might purchase the like honour. His Kingdome could furnish three hundred thousand serviceable men for the Wars; and his treasures were sufficient for the payment of these, and the hire of many more. Cause of war hee had very just against the Edomites, who having rebelled in the time of his grand-father Jehoram, had about fifty years been unreclaimed, partly by reason of the troubles happening in Juda, partly through the sloth and timorousness of his father Joas. Yet, forasmuch as the men of Juda had in many years been without all exercise of Warre (excepting that unhappy fight wherein they were beaten by a few bands of the Aramites) hee held it a point of wisdom to increase his forces, with souldiers waged out of Israel, whence⁴⁰ he hired for an hundred talents of silver, an hundred thousand valiant men, as the Scripture telleth us, though Josephus diminish the number, saying that they were but twenty thousand.

This great Army, which with so much cost Amazia had hired out of Israel, hee was faine to dismisse before hee had employed it, being threatened by a Prophet with ill success, if he strengthened himselfe with the help of those men, whom God (though in mercy hee gave them victory against the cruell Aramites) did not love, because they were Idolaters. The Israelites therefore departed in great anger, taking in ill part this dismission, as an high disgrace; which to revenge, they fell upon a piece of Juda in their return, and shewed their malice in the slaughter of three thousand men, and some spoil,⁴⁰ which they carried away. But Amazia with his own forces, knowing that God would bee assistant to their journey, entred courageously into the Edomites Countrey; over whom obtaining victory, he slew ten thousand, and took other ten thousand prisoners, all which hee threw from an high rock; holding them, it seems, rather as Traytors, than as just enemies. This victory did not seem to reduce Edom under the subjection of the Crown of Juda; which might be the cause of that severity, which was used to the prisoners; the Edomites that had escaped; refusing to buy the lives of their friends and kinsmen at so dear a rate, as the losse of their own libertie. Some towns in Mount

Sic,

Sic, Amazia took; as appears by his carrying away the Idols thence; but it is like they were the places most indefensible, in that he left no garrisons there, whereby he might another year the better have pursued the conquest of the whole countrey. Howsoever it were, he got both honour by the journey, and gains enough, had he not lost himself.

Among other spoiles of the Edomites, were carried away their gods; which being vanquished and taken prisoners, did deserve well to be led in triumph. But they contrarywise, I know not by what strange witchcraft, so besotted this unworthy King Amazia, that he set them up to be his gods, and worshipped them, and burned incense unto them.

2 Chro. 25. 14

For this when he was rebuked by a Prophet sent from God, hee gave a churlish and threatening answer, asking the Prophet, Who made him a Counsellor, and bidding him hold his peace for fear of the worst. If either the costly stuff, whereof these Idols were made, or the curious workmanship and beauty, with which they were adorned by Artificers, had ravished the Kings fancy; he thinks, he should have rather returned them to matter of profit, or kept them as house-hold ornaments and things of pleasure, than thereby have suffered himself to be blinded, with such unreasonable devotion towards them. If the superstitious account wherein the Edomites had held them, were able to work much upon his imagination, much more should the bad service which they had done to their old Clients, have moved him thereupon to laugh, both at the Edomites, and them. Wherefore it seems to me, that the same affections carried him from God,⁴⁰ unto the service of Idols, which afterwards moved him to talk so roughly to the Prophet reprehending him. He had already obeyed the warning of God by a Prophet, and sent away such auxiliarie forces as he had gathered out of Israel; which done, it is sayd, that he was encouraged, and led forth his people, thinking betwixt, that God would now rather assist him by miracle, than let him faile of obtaining all his hearts desire. But with better reason he should have limited his desires by the will of God, whose pleasure it was, that Esau having broken the yoke of Jacob from his neck, according as Isaac had foretold, should no more become his servaunt. If therefore Amazia did hope to reconquer all the Countrey of Edom, he failed of his expectation; yet so, that he brought home both profit and honour, which might have well contented him.

2 Chro. 25. 11

But there is a foolish and a wretched pride; wherewith men being transported, can ill endure to ascribe unto God the honour of those actions, in which it hath pleased him to use their own industrie, courage, or force-sight. Therefore it is commonly seen, that they, who entering into battell, are carefull to pray for aide from heaven; with due acknowledgement of his power, who is the giver of victory; when the field is won, doe vaunt of their own exploits; one telling how he got such a ground of advantage; another, how he gave check to such a battalion; a third, how he seized on the enemies Cannon; every one striving to magnifie himself, whilst all forget God, as one that had not been present in the action. To ascribe to fortune the effects of another mans vertue, is, I confesse, an argument of malice. Yet this is true, that as he which findeth better success, than he did, or in reason might expect, is deeply bound to acknowledge God the Author of his happinesse; so he whose meere wisdom and labour hath brought things, to a prosperous issue, is doubly bound to shew himself thankfull, both for the victory, and for those vertues by which the victory was gotten. And indeed so far from weakness is the nature of such thanksgiving, that it may well be called the height of magnanimitie; no vertue being so truly heroicall, as that by which the spirit of man advanceth it selfe with confidence of acceptance, unto the love of God. In which sense it is a brave speech that Evander in Virgil useth to Aeneas, none but a Christian being capable of the admonition:

Aude hospes contemnere opes, & te quoque dignum Finge Deo.

With this Philosophy Amazia (as appears by his carriage) troubled not his head: he had shewed himself a better man of war than any King of Juda, since the time of Jehosaphat, and could be well contented, that his people should think him little inferiour to David; of which honour he saw no reason why the Prophets should rob him, who had made him lose an hundred talents, and done him no pleasure; he having prevailed by plain force and good conduct, without any miracle at all. That hee was distempered with such vain thoughts as these (besides the witness of his impiety following) Josephus doth testifie; saying, That he despised God, and that being puffed up with his good successe, of which nevertheless he would not acknowledge God to be the Author, he commanded Joas King of Israel to become his subject, and to let the ten Tribes acknowledge him their Sovereign, as they had done his Ancestours King David and Salomon. Some think that his quarrell to Joas was rather grounded upon the injurie done to him by the Israelites, whom hee dismissed in the journey against Mount Seir. And likely it is, that the sense of a late wrong had more power to stirre him up, than the remembrance of an old title, forgotten long since, and by himselfe neglected thirteen, or fourteen years. Nevertheless it might so be, that when he was thus provoked, hee thought it not enough to requite new wrongs, but would also call old matters into question; that to the Kings of Israel might, at the least, learn to keep their subjects from offending Juda, for fear of endangering their own Crowns. Had Amaziah desired onely recompence for the injury done to him, it is not improbable that hee should have had some reasonable answer from Joas, who was not desirous to fight with him. But the answer which Joas returned, likening himself to a Cedar, and Amaziah in respect of him to no better than a thistle, shewes that the challenge was made in insolent termes, stut perhaps with such proud comparison of Nobilitie, as might be made (according to that which Josephus hath written) between a King of antient race, and one of lesse nobilitie than vertue.

Sophocles in Ajax Lou.

It is by Sophocles reported of Ajax, that when going to the warre of Troy, his father did bid him to be valiant, and get victory by Gods assistance, he made answer, That by Gods assistance a coward could get victory, but hee would get it alone without such help: after which proud speech, though he did many valiant acts, he had small thanks, and finally, killing himselfe in a madnesse, whereinto he fell upon disgrace received, was hardly allowed the honour of buriall. That Amaziah did utter such words, I doe not find: but having once entertained the thoughts, which are parents of such words, he was rewarded with successe according. The very first counsell wherein this warre was concluded, serves to prove that he was a wise Prince indeed at Jerusalem, among his Parasites, but a fool when he had to deal with his equalls abroad. For it was not all one, to fight with the Edomites, a weak people, trusting more in the seat of their Country, than the valour of their Souldiers; and to encounter with Joas, who from so poor beginnings had raised himselfe to such strength, that hee was able to lend his friend a hundred thousand men, and had all his Nation exercised, and trained up in a long victorious warre. But as Amaziah discovered much want of judgement, in undertaking such a match; so in prosecuting the businesse, when it was set on foot, he behaved himselfe as a man of little experience, who having once onely tried his fortune, and found it to be good, thought that in Warre there was nothing else to doe, than send a defiance, fight, and winne. Joas on the contrary side, having been accustomed to deal with a stronger enemy than the King of Juda, used that celeritie, which peradventure had often stood him in good stead against the Aramite. He did not sit waiting till the enemies brake in and wasted his Country, but presented himselfe with an Armie in Juda, ready to bid battell to Amaziah, and save him the labour of a long journey. This could not but greatly discourage those of Juda, who (besides the impression of fear which an invasion beats into people, not inured in the like) having devoured in their greedy hopes, the spoyle of Israel, fully perswading themselves to get as much, and at as easie a rate, as in the journey of Edom; were so far disappointed of their expectation, that well they might suspect all new assurance of good luck, when the old had thus beguiled them. All this notwithstanding, their King that had stomach enough to challenge the patrimonie of Salomon, thought like another David to winne it by the sword. The issue of which fool-hardinesse might easily have been fore-seen in humane reason; comparing together, either the two Kings, or the quality of their Armies, or the first and ominous beginning of the Warre. But meere humane wisdom, howsoever it might foresee much, could not have prognosticated all the mischief that fell upon Amaziah. For as soon as the two Armies came in fight, God, whose help this wretched man had so despised, did (as Josephus reports it) strike such terror and amazement into the men of Juda, that without one blow given, they fled all away, leaving their King to shift for himself, which he did so ill, that his enemy had soon caught him, and made him change his glorious humour into most abject baseness. That the Armie which fled hed, sustained any other losse than of honour, I neither find in the Scriptures nor in Josephus; it being likely that the soon beginning of their flight, which made it the more shameful, made it also the more safe. But of the mischief that followed this overthrow, it was Gods will that Amaziah himselfe should sustain the whole disgrace. For Joas carried him directly to Jerusalem, where he bade him procure that the gates might be opened to let him in and his Army; threatening him otherwise with present death. So much amazed was the miserable captive, with these dreadful words, that he durst do no other than perswade the Citizens, to yeeld themselves to the mercie of the Conquerour. The Town, which afterwards being in weaker state held out two years against Nebuchadnezzar, was utterly dismayed, when the King that should have given his life to save it, used all his force of command and intreaty to betray it. So the gates of Jerusalem were opened to Joas, with which honour (greater than any King of Israel had ever obtained) he could not rest contented, but the more to despise Amaziah and his people, he caused 400 cubits of the wall to be thrown down, and entred the City in his Chariot through that breach, carrying the King before him as in triumph. This done, he sack'd the Temple, and the Kings Palace, and so taking hostages of Amaziah, he dismissed the poor creature that was glad of his life, and returned to Samaria.

A discourse of the reasons hindring Joas from uniting Juda to the Crown of Israel, when he had won Jerusalem, and held Amaziah prisoner. The end of Joas his reign.

WE may justly marvell how it came to passe, that Joas, being thus in possession of Jerusalem, having the King in his hands, his enemies forces broken, and his own entire, could be so content to depart quietly with a little spoil, when he might have seized upon the whole Kingdome. The reign of Athalia had given him cause to hope that the issue of David might be dispossessed of that crown; his own nobility, being the son and grand-child of Kings, together with the famous acts that he had done, were enough to make the people of Juda think highly of him; who might also have preferred his form of government before that of their own Kings, especially at such a time, when a long succession of wicked Princes had smothered the thanks which were due to the memory of a few good ones. The commodity that would have ensued upon the union of all the twelve Tribes under one Prince, is so apparent, that I need not to insist on it. That any message from God forbade the Israelite (as afterwards in the victorie which Pekah the son of Romelia got upon Ahaz) to turn his present advantage to the best use, we doe not read. All this makes it the more difficult to resolve the question, why a Prince so well exercised as Joas had been in recovering his own, and winning from the enemy, should forsake the possession of Jerusalem, and wilfully neglect the possibilities, or rather cast away the full assurance of so fair a conquest, as the Kingdome of Juda.

But concerning that point, which of all others had been most materiall, I mean the desire of the vanquished people to accept the Israelite for their King, it is plainly seen, that entering Jerusalem in triumphant manner, Joas was unable to concoct his own prosperitie. For, the opening of the gates had been enough to have let him not onely into the Citie, but into the Royall Throne, and the peoples hearts, whom by fair intreatie (especially having sure means of compulsion) hee might have made his own, when they saw themselves betrayed, and basely given away by him whose they had been before. The fair mark which this opportunitie presented, hee did not aim at, because his ambition was otherwise, and more meanly busied, in levelling at the glory of a triumphant entrie through a breach. Yet this error might afterwards have been corrected well enough, if entering as an enemy, and shewing what hee could doe, by spending his anger upon the Walls, he had within the Citie done offices of a friend, and laboured to shew good will to the inhabitants. But when his pride had done, his covetousnesse began, and fought to please it self with that which is commonly most ready to the spoyler, yet should be most forborn. The Treasure wherewith Sesac, Hazael, and the Philistims, men ignorant of the true God and his Religion, had quenched their greedy thirst, ought not to have tempted the appetite of Joas, who though an Idolater, yet acknowledged also and worshipped the eternall God, whose Temple was at Jerusalem. Therefore when the people saw him take his way directly to seise that holy place, and lay his ravenous hands upon the consecrated vessels, calling the familie of Obed Edom (whose children had hereditarie charge of the treasure) to a strict account, as if they had been officers of his own Exchequer; they considered him rather as an execrable Church-robber, than as a noble Prince, an Israelite, and their brother, though of another Tribe. Thus following that course, which the most vertuous King of our age (taxing it with the same phrase) hath wisely avoyded; by stealing a few Apples, he lost the inheritance of the whole Orchard. The people detested him, and after the respite of a few dayes, might, by comparing themselves one to one, perceive his Souldiers to be no better than men of their own mould, and inferiour in number to the inhabitants of so great a Citie. It is not so easie to hold by force a mightie town entered by capitulation, as to enter the gates opened by unadvised fear. For when the Citizens, not being disarmed, recover their spirits, and begin to understand their first error, they will think upon every advantage, of place, of provisions, of multitude, yea of women armed with tile-stones; and rather choose by desperate resolution, to correct the evils grown out of their former cowardise, than suffer those mischiefs to poyson the bodie, which in such half-conquests, are easily tasted in the mouth. A more lively example hereof cannot be desired, than the Citie of Florence, which through the weaknesse of Peter de Medicis, governing therein as a Prince, was reduced into such hard terms, that it opened the gates unto the French King Charles the eighth, who not plainly professing himself either friend or foe to the State, entered the Town, with his Army, in triumphant manner, himself and his horse armed, with his lance upon his thigh. Many insolencies were therein committed by the French, and much argument of quarrell ministred between them and the Townes-men: so farre forth that the Florentines, to preserve their libertie, were driven to prepare for fight. To conclude the matter, Charles propounds intollerable conditions, demanding huge summes of ready money, and the absolute Seigniorie of the State, as conquered by him, who entered the Citie in Armes. But Peter Caponi, a principall Citizen, catching these Articles from the Kings Secretarie, and tearing them before his face, bad him found his Trumpets, and they would ring their Bells: which peremptory words made the French bethink themselves, and come readily to this agreement, that for forty thousand pounds, and not half of that money to be paid in hand, Charles should not onely depart in peace, but restore whatsoever he had of their Dominion, and continue their assured friend. So dangerous a matter did it seem for that brave Armie, which in few moneths after wanne the Kingdome of Naples, to fight in the streets, against the armed multitude of that populous Citie. It is true, that Charles had other businesse (and so perhaps had Joas, as shall anon be shewed) that called him away: but it was the apprehension of imminent danger that made him come to reason. In such cases the firing of houles, usually drawes every Citizen to save his own, leaving victory to the Souldier: yet where the people are prepared and resolved, women can quench, as fast as the enemy, having other things to look unto, can set on fire. And indeed that Commander is more given to anger than regardfull of profit, who upon the uncertain hope of destroying a Town, forsakes the assurance of a good composition. Diversitie of circumstance may alter the case: it is enough to say, that it might be in Jerusalem, as we know it was in Florence.

How strongly soever Joas might hold himself within Jerusalem, he could not easily depart from thence, with his bootie safe, if the armie of Juda, which had bin more terrified than weakned in the late encounter, should re-enforce it self, and give him a check upon the way. Wherefore it was wisely done of him, to take hostages for his better security, his Armie being upon return, and better loaden than when it came forth; for which causes it was the more unapt to fight.

Besides these impediments, within the Citie and without, serving to cool the ambition of Joas, and keep it down from aspiring to the Crown of Juda, it appears that somewhat was newly fallen out, which had reference to the anger of Elisba the Prophet; who, when this Joas had smitten the groud with his arrowes thrice, told him that he should no oftner smite the Aramites. The three victories which Israel had against Aram, are by some, and with great probability, referred unto the fifth, sixth, and seventh years years of Joas: after which time, if any losses ensuing had blemished the former good success, it might the King of Israel have likened himself to a stately Cedar, and wot he could have eishered the Judeans one hundred thousand men, or meet him in battell, who was able to bring into the field three hundred thousand of his own. Seeing therefore it is made plain by the words of Elisba, that after three victories Joas should find some change of fortune, and suffer losse; we must needs conclude, That the Aramites prevailed upon him this yeare; it being the last of his Reign. That this was so, and that the Syrians, taking advantage of Joas's absence, gave such a blow to Israel, as the King at his return was not able to remedie; but rather fell himself into new misfortunes, which increased the calamitie; we may evidently perceive in that which is spoken of Jeroboam his son. For it is said, That the Lord saw the exceeding bitter afflictions of Israel, and that having not decreed to put the name of Israel from under the Heavens, he preserved them by the hand of Jeroboam, the sonne of Joas. This is enough to prove, that the victorious Reign of Joas was concluded with a sad catastrophe; the riches of the Temple hastening his miserie and death, as they had done with Sesac, Ahab, and Hazael, and as afterwards they wrought with Audoburn, Cassius, and other sacrilegious Portenaires. Thus either through indignation conceived against him, by the people of Jerusalem, and courage which they took to set upon him within the Walls; or through preparation of the Armie that lay abroad in the Countrey, to bid him battell in open field; and to recover by a new charge the honour which was lost at the former encounter; or through the miseries daily brought upon his own Countrey, by the Syrian in his absence (if not by all of these), Joas was driven to lay aside all thought of winning the kingdome of Juda, and taking hostages for his quiet passage, made all haste homewards, where he found a sad welcome, and being utterly forsaken of his wonted prosperitie, forsook also his life in few moneths after, leaving his kingdome to Jeroboam the second, his fortunate and valiant son.

The end of Amazia his Reign and life.

Any man is able to ghesse how Amazia looked, when the enemy had left him. Hee that had vaunted so much of his own great prowess and skill in Armes, threatening to work wonders, and set up a new the glorious Empire of David, was now uncased of his Lyons hide, and appeared nothing so terrible a beast as he had been painted. Much argument of scoffing at him he had ministred unto such as held him in dislike; which at this time, doubtlesse were very many: for the shame that falls upon an insolent man, seldome failes of meeting with abundance of reproach. As for Amazia (besides that the multitude are alwayes prone to lay the blame upon their Governours, even of those calamities which happen by their own default) there was no child in all Jerusalem, but knew him to be the root of all this mischief. He had not onely challenged a good man of War, being himself a Dastard; but when he was beaten and taken by him, had basely pleaded for the common enemy, to have him let into the Citie, that with his own eyes he might see what spoyle there was, and not make a bad bargain by heare-say. The father of this Amazia was a beastly man; yet when the Aramites took him and tormented him, he did not offer to buy his own life at so dear a rate, as the Citie & Temple of Jerusalem. Had he offered, should they have made his promise good? surely the haste which they had made in condescending to this hard match, was very unfortunate: for by keeping out the Israelites (which was easie enough) any little while, they should soone have bin rid of him, seeing that the Aramites would have made him run home, with greater speed than he came forth. Then also, when having trusted up his baggage, he was ready to be gone, a little courage would have served to perswade him to leave his load behind; had not their good King delivered up hostages, to secure his return, as loath to defraud him of the recompence due to his paines taken.

Such exprobrations could not but vex the heart of this unhappie King: it had been well for him, if they had made him acknowledge his fault unto God, that had punished him by all this dishonour. But we find no mention of his amendment. Rather it appears, that he continued an Idolater to the very last. For it is said of him, that after his turning away from the Lord, they wrought treason against him in Jerusalem; manifest proof that he was not reclaimed unto his lives end. And certainly, they which tell a man in his adversity of his faults passed, shall sooner be thought to upbraid him with his fortune, than to seek his reformation. Wherefore it is no marvel, that Priests and Prophets were lesse welcome to him, than ever they had been. On the other side, flatterers, and such as were desirous to put a heart into him, whereof themselves might alwaies be masters, wanted not plausible matter to revive him. For he was not the first, nor second of the Kings of Juda, that had been overcome in battell: Abiathar himselfe had abandoned the Citie, leaving it before the enemy was in fight, unto Abisai his rebellious Sonne. Many besides him had received losses, wherein the Temple bare a part. If Joas might so easily have beene kept out, why did their Ancestors let Sesai in? Aza was reputed a vertuous Prince, yet with his own hands hee emptied the Temple, and was not blamed, but held excusable by necessity of the State. Belike these traducers would commend no Actions, but of dead Princes: if so, he should rather live to punish them, than die to please them. Though wherein hee had given them any cause of displeasure? It was he indeed that commanded to let open the gates to Joas; but it was the people that did it. Good servants ought never to have obeyed their Masters Commandements to his disadvantage, when they saw him not master of his own Person. As his captivity did acquit him from blame of all things that he did or suffered in that condition; so was that misfortune it selfe, in true estimation, as highly to his honour, as deeply to his losse. For had hee beene as hasty to flye as others were, hee might have escaped as well as others did. But seeking to teach the base multitude courage by his Royall example, he was shamefully betrayed by those in whom he trusted. Unworthy creatures, that could readily obey him, when speaking another mans words, being prisoner, he commanded them to yeeld; having neglected his charge, when leading them into the field, he had them stand to it and fight like men. The best was, that they must needs acknowledge his mischance, as the occasion whereby many thousand lives were saved, the enemy having wisely preferred the surpris of a Lion that was Captaine, before the chafe and slaughter of an Army of Stags that followed him.

These or the like words comforting Amazias, were able to perswade him, that it was even so indeed. And such excuses might have served well enough to please the people, if the King had first studied how to please God. But hee that was unwilling to ascribe unto God the good successe fore-told by a Prophet, could easily find how to impute this late disaster unto fortune, and the fault of others. Now concerning fortune, it seemes that he meant to keep himself safe from her by sitting still; for in fifteene years following (so long he out-lived his honour) we find not that he stirred. As for his subjects, though nothing henceforth bee recorded of his government, yet we may see by his end, that the middle time was ill spent among them, increasing their hatred to his own ruine. He that suspecteth his own worth or other mens opinions, thinking the lesse regard is had of his person than he beleeveeth to be due to his place, will commonly spend all the force of his authoritie in purchasing the name of a severe man. For the affected sownesse of a vaine fellow, doth many times resemble the gravity of one that is wise: and the feare wherein they live, which are subject unto oppression, carries a shew of reverence to him that does the wrong; at least it serves to dazle the eyes of underlings, keeping them from prying into the weakednesse of such as have jurisdiction over them. Thus the time, wherein, by well using it, men might attain to be such as they ought, they do usually mispend, in seeking to appeare such as they are not. This is a vain & deceivable courtie, procuring, in stead of the respect that was hoped for, more indignation than was feared. Which is a thing of dangerous consequence; especially when an unable spirit, being over-pert with so high authority, is too passionate in the execution of such an office, as cannot be checked but by violence. If therefore Amazias thought by extreme rigour to hold up his reputation, what did he else than strive to make the people think he hated them, when of themselves they were apt enough to beleeve that he did not love them? the best was, that he had, by revenging his fathers death provided well enough for his own security: but who should take vengeance (or upon whom?) of such a murder, wherein every one had a part? Surely God himself, who had not given commandement or leave unto the people, to take his office out of his hand, in shedding the blood of his Anointed. Yet as Amazias careless of God, was carried headlong by his own affections; so his subjects, following the same ill example, without requiring what belonged unto their duties, rose up against him, with such headlong furie, that being unable to defend himself in Jerusalem, he was driven to forsake the Citie, and flee to Lachis, for safeguard of his life. But so extreme was the hatred conceived against him, & so generall, that neither his absence could allay the rage of it in the Capital Citie, nor his presence in the Countie abroad procure friends to defend his life. Questionlesse he chose the Town of Lachis for his refuge, as a place of all other best affected to him; yet found he there none other favour, than that the people did not kill him with their own hands; for when the Conspirators (who troubled not themselves about raising an Armie for the matter) sent pursuers after, he was abandoned to death. Lachis was the utmost Citie of his Dominion Westward, standing somewhat without the border of Juda; so that he might have made an easie escape (if he durst adventure) into the Territories of the Philistines, or the Kingdome of Israel. Therefore it may seem that he was detained there, where certain it is that he found no kind of favour: for had not the people of this Town added their own treason to the generall insurrection, the murderers could not at so good leasure as they did, have carried away his bodie to Jerusalem, where they gave him buriall with his fathers.

S. XI.

²⁰ Of the Interregnum, or vacancie, that was in the Kingdome of Juda, after the death of Amazias.

IT hath already bin shewed, that the Reignes of the Kings of Juda and Israel were sometimes to be measured by compleat years, otherwhiles, by years current: and that the time of one King is now and then confounded with the last years of his fathers Reign, or the foremost of his sons. But we are now arrived at a mere vacation, wherein the Crown of Juda lay voyd eleven whole yeares: a thing not plainly set down in Scriptures, nor yet remembered by Iosephus, and therefore hard to be beleaved, were it not proved by necessary consequence.

³⁰ Twice we find it written, that Amazias, King of Juda, lived after the death of Joas King of Israel fifteen yeares; whereupon it followes, that the death of Amazias, was about the end of fifteen yeares compleat, which Jeroboam the second (who in the fifteenth year of Amazias was made King over Israel) had reigned in Samarita. But the succession of Azarias, who is also called Azarias, unto his father in the Kingdome of Juda, was eleven years later than the sixteenth of Jeroboam: for it is exprest, that Azarias began to reign in the seven and twentieth year of Jeroboam; the sixteenth year of his life, being joyned with the first of two and fiftie that he reigned. So the Interregnum of eleven yeares cannot be divided, without some hard means used, of interpreting the Text otherwise than the letter sounds.

⁴⁰ Yet some conjectures there are made, which tend to keep all even, without acknowledging any voyd time. For it is thought that in the place last of all cited, by the seven and twentieth year of Jeroboam, we should perhaps understand the seven and twentieth year of his life; or else (because the like words are no where else interpreted in the like sense) that Azarias was eleven yeares under age, that is, five years old, when his father died, and so his sixteenth year might concur with the seven and twentieth of Jeroboam; or that the Text it selfe might have suffered some wrong, by miswriting twentie seven for seventeen yeares; and so, by making the seventeenth year of Jeroboam to be newly begun, all may be saved. These are the conjectures of that worthy man Gerard Mercator: concerning the first of which, it may suffice, that the Author himselfe doth easily let it passe, as improbable; the last is followed by none that I know, neither is it fit, that upon every doubt, we should call the text in question, which could not be falsified in all copies, if perhaps it were in one: as for the second, it may be held with some qualification, that Azarias began his Reign being five yeares old, but then must we adde those eleven yeares which passed in his minority, to the two and fiftie that followed his sixteenth year, which is all one, in a manner, with allowing an Interregnum.

But why should we be so carefull to avoyd an Interregnum in Juda, seeing that the like necessitie necessity hath inforced all good Writers to acknowledge the like vacancy, twice happening within few years; in the Kingdom of Israel: The space of time between Jeroboam's death, and the beginning of Zacharias's reign; and such another gap found between the death of Pekah, and the beginning of Hosea, have made it easily to be admitted into Samaria; which the consideration of things as they stood in Judah, when Amaziah was slain, doth make more probable to have happened there, yea, although the necessity of computation were not so apparent.

For the publick furie having so farre extended it selfe, as unto the destruction of the kings own person, was not likely to be appeased without order taken for obtaining some redress of those matters, which had caused it at the first to break forth into such extremity. We need not therefore wonder how it came to passe, that they which already had thrown themselves into such an horrible treason, should afterwards dare to withhold the Crown from a Prince of that age, which being invested in all ornaments of Regality, is neverthelesse exposed to many injuries, proceeding from head-strong, and forgetfull Subjects.

As for their conjecture, who make Azaria to have beene King, but one and fortie years after he came out of his non-age; I dare not allow it, because it agrees too hardly with the Text. The best opinion were that which gives unto Jeroboam eleven years of reign with his Father, before he began to reigne single in the fifteenth of Amaziah; did it not swallow up almost the whole reign of Joas, and extending the years of those which reigned in Israel (by making such of them compleat as were onely current) and take at the shortest the reignes of Princes ruling in other Nations. But I will not stand to dispute further of this: every man may follow his own opinion, and see mine more plainly in the Chronologicall Table, drawne for these purposes.

Of Princes Contemporarie with Amaziah, and more particularly of Sardanapalus.

THe Princes living with Amaziah, and in the eleven years that followed his death, were Joas and Jeroboam in Israel; Cephrenes and Mycerinus in Egypt; Sylvius Aladus, and Sylvius Aventinus in Alba; Agamemnon in Corinth; Diogenes Phredus, and Arisphron in Athens; in Lacedaemon Thalesus, in whose time the Spartans wan from the Achaians, Gerautha, Amycla, and some other Townes.

But more notable than all these, was Assyrian Sardanapalus, who in the one and twentieth year of Amaziah, succeeding his father Ocraxapes or Anacyndaraxes, reigned twenty yeares, and was slaine the last of the eleven voyd yeares which fore-went the reign of Azaria. In him ended (as most agree) the line of Ninus, which had held that Empire one thousand two hundred and forty years. A most luxurious and effeminate Palliard he was, passing away his time among strumpets, whom he imitated both in apparel and behaviour.

In these voluptuous courses he lived an unhappy life, knowing himselfe to be so vile, that he durst not let any man have a sight of him; yet seene he was at length, and the sight of him was so odious, that it procured his ruine. For Arbaces, who governed Media under him, finding meanes to behold the person of his King, was so incensed with that beastly spectacle, of a man disguised in womans attire, and striving to counterfeite an harlot, that he thought it a great shame to live under the command of so unworthy a creature. Purposing therefore to free himselfe and others from so base subjection, he was much encouraged by the prediction of Belesus or Belofus a Chaldean, who told him plainly, that the Kingdom of Sardanapalus should fall into his hands. Arbaces well pleased with the prophetic, did promise unto Belofus himselfe the government of Babylon; and so concluding how to handle the businesse, one of them stirred up the Medes, and allured the Persians into the quarrel, the other perswaded the Babylonians and Arabians to venture themselves in the same cause. These foure Nations armed forty thousand men against Sardanapalus, who in this danger was not wanting to himselfe, but gathering such forces as he could out of other Nations, encountered the rebels, as one that would by deeds refute the tales that they had told of him. Neither did his carriage in the beginning of that warre, answer to the manner of his retirednesse. For in three battels battels he carried away the better, driving Arbaces and his followers into such fearfull termes, that had not Belesus promised them constantly some unexpected succours, they would forthwith have broken up their Camp. About the same time; an Armie out of Bactria was coming to assist the King; but Arbaces encountering it upon the way, perswaded so strongly by promise of liberty, that those forces joyned themselves with his. The sudden departure of the enemy seeming to be a flight, caused Sardanapalus to feast his Armie, triumphing before victory. But the Rebels being strengthened with this new supply, came upon him by night, and forced his Camp, which through over-great security was unprepared for resistance.

This overthrow did so weaken the Kings heart, that leaving his wives brother Salamenasto to keep the field, he withdrew himself into the Citie of Nineve; which, till new aydes that he sent for should come, he thought easily to defend; it having been prophesied, that Nineve should never be taken, till the River were enemy to the Town. Of the greatnesse and strength of Nineve, enough hath been spoken in our discourse of Ninus. It was so well victualled, that Arbaces (having in two battels overthrown the Kings Armie, and slain Salamenastus) was faine to lye two whole years before it, in hope to winne it by famine; whereof yet hee saw no appearance. It seems that hee wanted Engines and skill to force those walls, which were an hundred foot high, and thick enough for three Chariots in front to passe upon the rampire. But that which hee could not doe in two years, the River of Tigris did in the third: for being high swolne with raines, it not onely drowned a part of the Citie through which it ranne, but threw down twenty furlongs of the wall, and made a fair breach for Arbaces to enter.

Sardanapalus, either terrified with the accomplishment of the old Oracle, or seeing no means of resistance left, shutting up himself into his Palace, with his Wives, Eunuques, and all his Treasures, did set the house on fire, wherewith he and they were together consumed. Strabo speaks of a monument of his, that was in Anchiale a Citie of Cilicia, whereon was found an inscription, shewing that he built that Citie and Tharsus upon one day: but the addition hereto, bidding men eat and drink, and make merrory, encouraged others with verses well known, to a voluptuous life, by his own example testified that his nature was more prone to sensuality, than to any vertue befecoming a Prince.

There are some that faintly report otherwise of his end; saying that Arbaces, when he first found him among his Concubines; was so enraged, that suddenly he slew him with a dagger. But the more generall consent of writers agrees with this relation of Diodorus Siculus, who citeth Ctesias a Greek Writer, that lived in the Court of Persia, where the truth might best be known.

Concerning the Princes which reigned in Assyria, from the time of Semiramis, unto Sardanapalus, though I believe that they were sometimes (yet not, as Orosius hath it, incessantly) busied in offensive, or else defensive arms; yet for the most part of them I do better trust Diodorus Siculus, who saith that their names were overpassed by Ctesias, because they did nothing worthy of memorie. Whatsoever they did, that which Theophilus Antiochennus hath said of them is very true; Silence and Oblivion hath oppressed them.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of Uzzia.

S. I.

The prosperitie of Uzzia, and of Jeroboam the second, who reigned with him in Israel. Of the Anarchie that was in the ten Tribes after the death of Jeroboam. Of Zacharia Sallum, Menahem, and Pekahia.

Uzzia, who is also called Ahaziah, the son of Jotham, was made King of Juda, when he was sixteen years old, in the seven and twentieth year of Jeroboam the son of Joas King of Israel. Hee served the God of his father David, and had therefore good successe in all his enterprises. Hee built Eloth, a Town that stood neere to the Red Sea, and restored it to Juda. He overcame the Philistims, of whose Towns he dismantled some, and built others in sundrie parts of their Territories. Also he got the masterie over some parts of Arabia, and brought the Ammonites to pay him tribute. Such were the fruits of his prosperous wars, wherein (as Josephus rehearseth his acts) he began with the Philistims, and then proceeded unto the Arabians and Ammonites. His Armie consisted of three hundred and seven thousand men of war, over which were appointed two thousand and six hundred Captains. For all this multitude the King prepared shields, and spears, and helmets, and other Arms requisite, following therein happily a course quite opposite unto that which some of his late predecessors had held, who thought it better policie to use the service of the Nobilitie, than of the multitude, carrying forth to warre the Princes, and all the Chariots.

As the victories of Uzzia were far more important, than the achievements of all that had reigned in Juda, since the time of David, so were his riches and magnificent works, equall, if not superiour to any of theirs that had been Kings between him and Salomon. For, besides that great conquests are won to repay the charges of War with triple interest, he had the skill to use, as well as the happinesse to get. Hee turned his lands to the best use, keeping Ploughmen and Dressers of Vines, in grounds convenient for such husbandrie. In other places he had Cattell feeding, whereof he might well keep great store, having won so much from the Ammonites and Arabians, that had abundance of waste ground serving for pasturage. For defence of his Cattell and Heardsmen, hee built Towers in the wilderness. He also digged many Cisterns or Ponds. Josephus calls them water-courses; but in such drie grounds, it was enough that he found water, by digging in the most likely places. If by these Towers he so commanded the water, that none could without his consent, relieve themselves therewith, questionlesse he took the only course, by which he might securely hold the Lordship over all the wilderness; it being hardly passable, by reason of the extreme drought, when the few Springs therein found, are left free to the use of Travellers.

Besides all this cost, and the building both of Eloth by the Red Sea, and of sundrie Towns among the Philistims, he repaired the wall of Jerusalem, which Joas had broken down, and fortified it with Towers, whereof some were an hundred and fiftie Cubits high.

The state of Israel did never so flourish, as at this time, since the division of the twelve Tribes into two kingdomes. For as Uzzia prevailed in the South, so (if not more) Jeroboam the son of Joas, King of the ten Tribes, enlarged his border on the North; where obtaining many victories against the Syrians, he wan the Royall Citie of Damascus, and he wan Hamath, with all the countrie thereabout from the entring of Hamath, unto the Sea of the Wilderness, that is, (as the most expound it) unto the vast desarts of Arabia, the end whereof was undiscovered. So the bounds of Israel in those parts, were in time of this Jeroboam, the same (or not much narrower) which they had bin in the reign of David.

But

But it was not for the piety of Jeroboam, that he thrived so well, for he was an Idolater: it was only the compassion which the Lord had on Israel, seeing the exceeding bitter affliction whereinto the Aramites had brought his people, which caused him to alter the succession of war, and to throw the victorious Aramites under the feet of those whom they had so cruelly oppressed. The line of Jehu to which God had promised the Kingdom of Israel unto the fourth generation, was now not far from the end; and now again it was invited unto repentance by new benefits, as it hath been at the beginning. But the sin of Jeroboam the son of Nebat was held so pretious, that neither the kingdome it self given to him by God, was able to draw Jehu from that politick Idolatry, nor the misery falling upon him and his posterity, to bring them to a better course of Religion; nor yet, at the last, this great prosperity of Jeroboam the son of Joas, to make him render the honour that was due to the onely giver of victory. Wherefore the promise of God made unto Jehu, that his sons, unto the fourth generation, should sit on the throne of Israel, was not enlarged; but being almost expired, gave warning of the approaching end, by an accident (so strange, that we who find no particulars recorded, can hardly ghesse at the occasions) foregoing the last accomplishment.

When Jeroboam the son of Joas, after a victorious reign of one and forty years, had ended his life; it seems in all reason that Zacharia his son should forthwith have been admitted to reign in his stead; the Nobility of that race having gotten such a lustre by the immediate succession of four Kings, that any Competitor, had the Crown passed by election, must needs have appeared base; and the virtue of the last King having been so great, as might well serve to lay the foundation of a new house, much more to establish the already confirmed right of a family so rooted in possession. All this notwithstanding, two or three and twenty years did passe before Zacharia the sonne of Jeroboam was, by uniform consent, received as King. The true originall causes hereof were to be found at Dan and Bethel, where the golden Calves did stand: yet second instruments of this disturbance are likely not to have been wanting, upon which the wilddome of man was ready to cast an eye. Probable it is, that the Captains of the army (who afterwards slew one another so fast, that in fourteen years there reigned five Kings) did now by head-strong violence, rend the kingdome asunder, holding each what hee could; and either despising or hating some qualities in Zacharia; untill, after many years, wearied with dissention, and the principall of them perhaps, being taken out of the way by death, for want of any other eminent man, they consented to yeeld all quietly to the son of Jeroboam. That this Anarchy lasted almost three and twenty years, we find by the difference of time between the fiftenth year of Uzzia, which was the last of Jeroboam his one and fortieth (his seven and twentieth concurring with the first of Uzzia) and the eight and thirtieth of the same Uzzia, in the last six moneths whereof Zacharia reigned in Samaria. There are some indeed that by supposing Jeroboam to have reigned with his father eleven years, do cut off the interregnum in Juda (before mentioned) and by the same reason abridge this Anarchie that was before the reign of Zacharia in Israel. Yet they leave it twelve years long: which is time sufficient to prove, that the kingdome of the ten Tribes was no lesse dis tempered than as is already noted. But I chooseth rather to follow the more common opinion, as concurring more exactly with the times of other Princes reigning abroad in the World, than this doubtfull conjecture, that gives to Jeroboam two and fifty years, by adding three quarters of his fathers reign unto his own; which was it self indeed so long, that he may well seem to have begun it very young: for I do not think that God blessed this Idolater both with a longer reign, and with a longer life than he did his servant David.

Thus much being spoken of the time wherein the Throne of Israel was voyd, before the reign of Zacharia, little may suffice to be said of his reign it selfe, which lasted but a little while. Six moneths only was he King; in which time hee declared himself a worshipper of the golden Calves; which was enough to justify the judgement of Gods, whereby he was slain. He was the last of Jehu's house, being (inclusively) the first of that line; which may have been some cause of the troubles impeaching his orderly succession: the prophetic having determined that race in the fourth generation. But (besides that Gods promise was extended unto the utmost) there was no warrant given to Sallum, or to any other, for the death of Zacharia, as had been given to Jehu for the slaughter of Jeroboam, and for the eradication of Ahabs house.

Zacharia

Zacharia having been six moneths a King, was then slain by Sallum, who reigned after him, the space of a moneth in Samarita. What this Sallum was, I doe not find, save onely that he was a Traytour, and the sonne of one Iakeb, whereby his father got no honour. It seems that he was one of those, who in time of faction, had laboured for himself, and now when all other Competitors were hitten down, thought easily to prevail against that King, in whose person the race of Jehu was, to fall. Manifest it is, that Sallum had a strong partie, for Tiphah or Thaps, and the coast thereof, even from Tirzah, where Menahem his enemy and supplanter then lay, refused to admit, as King in his stead, the man that murdered him. Yet at the end of one moneth, Sallum received the reward of his treason, and was slain by Menahem who reigned in his place.

Menahem the son of Gadi, reigned after Sallum ten years. In opposition to Sallum, his hatred was deadly, and inhumane: for he not onely destroyed Tiphah, and all that were therein, or thereabouts, but he ript up all their women with child, because they did not open their gates and let him in. Had this cruelty been used in revenge of Zacharia's death, it is like that hee would have been as earnest, in procuring unto him his Fathers Crown when it was first due. But in performing that office, there was used such long deliberation, that we may plainly discover Ambition, Dildain, and other private passions, to have been the causes of this beastly outrage.

In the time of Menahem, and (as it seems) in the beginning of his Reign, Pul, King of Assyria, came against the Land of Israel; whom this new King appealed, with other said talents of silver, levied upon all the substantiall men in his Countrey. With this money the Israelite purchased, not onely the peace of his Kingdome, but his own establishment therein: some fawning man (belike) having either injured Pul thither, or (if he came uncalled) sought to use his help, in deposing this ill-beloved King. Josaphat reports of this Menahem, that his reign was no milder than his entrance. But after ten years, his tyrannic ended with his life: and Pekahia his Sonne occupied his room.

Of this Pekahia the story is short: for he reigned onely two years, at the end whereof, hee was slain by Peka the sonne of Samaria, whose treason was rewarded with the Crown of Israel, as, in time comming, another mans Treason against himself shall be. There needs no more to be said of Menahem and his sonne, save that they were both of them Idolaters; and the son (as we find in Josaphat) like to his father in cruelty. Concerning Pul the Assyrian King, who first opened unto those Northern Nations the way into Palestina, it will shortly follow in order of the Story, to deliver our opinion whether he were that Belshazzar (called also Belshazzar, and by some Phul Belshazzar) who joyned with Arbaces the Median, against Sardanapalus, or whether he were some other man. At the present it is more fit that we relate the end of Uzzia's life, who out-lived the happinesse wherein we left him.

S. II.

The end of Uzzia his Reign and Life.

AS the zeal of Jehojada that godly Priest was the mean to preserve the lineage of David in the person of Joas, so it appears, that the care of holy men was not wanting to Uzzia, to bring him up and advance him to the Crown of Juda, when the hatred borne to his Father Amaziah had endangered his succession. For it is said of Uzzia, That he sought God in the dayes of Zacharia (which understood the visions of God, and when as he sought the Lord, God made him prosper).

But, when he was strong, his heart was lifted up to his destruction: for hee transgressed against the Lord his God, and went into the Temple of the Lord to burn incense upon the Altar of incense. Thus he thought to enlarge his own authority, by meddling in the Priests office, whose power had in every extremity been so helpfull to the Kings of Juda, that meere gratitude and civill policy, should have held back Uzzia from inroaching thereupon; yea, though the Law of God had been silent in this case, and not forbidding it. Howsoever, the King forgot his duty, the Priests remembred theirs, and God forgat not to assist them. Azaria the high Priest interrupted the Kings purpose, and gave him to understand how little to his honour it would prove, that hee took upon him the office of the sons of Aaron. There were with Azaria fourscore other Priests, valiant men, but their their valour was showed onely in assisting the high Priest, when (according to his dutie) he reprehended the Kings presumption. This was enough, the rest God himself performed. We find in Josaphat, that the King had apparelled himself in Priestly habit, and that he threatened Azarias and his Companions, to punish them with death, unless they would be quiet. Josaphat indeed enlargeth the storie, by inserting a great Earth-quake, which did tear down half an Hill, that rowled four furlongs, till it rested against another Hill; stopping up the high-ways, and spoilling the Kings Garden in the passage. With this Earth-quake, he saith, that the roof of the Temple did cleave, and that a Sun-beam did light upon the Kings face, which was presently infected with leprosie. All this to may have been true; and some there are who think that this Earth-quake is the same, which is mentioned by the Prophet Amos, wherein they do much mis-reckon the times. For the Earth-quake spoken of by Amos, was in the dayes of Ieroboam King of Israel, who dyed seven and thirtie years before Uzzia; so that Jotham the son of Uzzia, which supplid his Fathers place in government of the Land, should, by this account, have bin then unborn: for he was but five and twenty years old, when he began to reign as King. Therefore, thus far onely we have assurance; that while Uzzia was with the Priests, the leprosie rose up in his forehead, before the Priests. Hereupon he was caisted, in all haste, to depart the place, and to live in a house by himself until he dyed; the rule over the Kings house, and over all the Land, being committed to Jotham, his Son and Successeur. Jotham took not upon himself the stile of a King, till his Father was dead; whom they buried in the same field wherein his Ancestors lay interred; yet in a Monument apart from the rest, because he was a Leper.

S. III.

Of the Prophets which lived in the time of Uzzia; and of Princes then ruling in Egypt, and in some other Countries.

IN the time of Uzzia were the first of the lesser Prophets, Hosea, Josel, Amos, Obadiah and Jonas. It is not indeed set down, when Josel or Obadiah did prophesie: but if the Prophets, whose times are not expressed, ought to be ranged (according to Saint Hierome's rule) with the next before them, then must these two be judged contemporarie with Hosea and Amos, who lived under King Uzzia. To enquire which of these five was the most ancient, it may perhaps be thought, at least, a superstitious labour, yet if the age wherein Homar lived, hath so painfully been sought, without reprehension, how can he be taxed, which offers to search out the antiquitie of these holy Prophets? It seems to me, that the first of these, in order of time, was the Prophet Jonas; who foretold the great victories of Jeroboam King of Israel; and therefore is like to have prophesied in the dayes of Joas, whilst the affliction of Israel was exceeding bitter; the Text it self intimating no lesse: by which consequence he was elder than the other Prophets, whose works are now extant. But his prophecies that concerned the Kingdome of Israel are now lost. That which remaineth of him, seems, nor without reason unto some very learned, to have belonged unto the time of Sardanapalus, in whose dayes Nineve was first of all destroyed. This Prophet rather taught Christ by his sufferings, than by his writings now extant: in all the rest are found expresse promises of the Messias.

In the reign of Uzzia likewise it was, that Esay, the first of the four great Prophets, began to see his visions. This difference of great and lesser Prophets, is taken from the Volumes which they have left written (as S. Augustine gives reason of the distinction) because the greater have written larger Books. The Prophet Esay was great indeed, not only in regard of his much writing, or of his Nobilitie, (for their opinion is rejected, who think him to have been the son of Amos the Prophet) and the high account wherein he lived; but for the excellencie both of his stile and argument, wherein he so plainly foretelleth the Birth, Miracles, Passion, and whole Historie of our Saviour, with the calling of the Gentiles, that he might as well be called an Evangelist, as a Prophet; having written in such wise, That (as Hierome saith) one would think he did not foretell of things to come, but compile an Historie of matters already past.

Decchoris was King of Egypt, and the ninth-year of his reign, by our computation

(whereof in due place we will give reason) was current, when Uzzia took possession of the Kingdome of Juda.

After the death of Bocchoris, Afchis followed in the Kingdome of Egypt: unto him succeeded Amyfis; and these two occupied that Crown six years. Then Sabacus, an Ethiopian, became King of Egypt, and held it fifty years, whereof the ten first ranne along with the last of Uzzia his Reign and Life. Of these and other Egyptian Kings, more shall be spoken, when their affairs shall come to be intermedled with the businesse of Juda.

In Athens, the two last years of Ariphron his twentie, the seven and twentieth of Thespis, the twentieth of Agamastor, and the three first of Eschylus his three and twentieth, made even with the two and fiftie of Uzzia: as likewise did in Alba the last seven of Silvius Aventinus his seven and thirtie, together with the three and twentie of Silvius Proculus, and two and twentie the first of Silvius Amulius. In Media Arbaces began his new kingdome in the first of Uzzia, wherein, after eight and twentie years, his son Sosarmus succeeded him, and reigned thirty years. Of this Arbaces, and the devision of the Assyrian Empire, between him and others, when they had oppressed Sardanapalus, I hold it convenient to use more particular discourse, that we may not wander in too great uncertainty in the storie of the Assyrian kings, who have already found the way into Palestina, and are not likely to forget it.

S. I V.

Of the Assyrian Kings, descending from Phul: and whether Phul and Belosus were one person, or heads of sundrie Families, that reigned a part in Nineve and Babylon.

BY that which hath formerly been shewed of Sardanapalus his death, it is apparent, that the chiefe therein was Arbaces the Medyan; to whom the rest of the Confederates did not onely submit themselves in that Warre, but were contented afterwards to be judged by him, receiving by his authority sentence of death, or pardon of their forfeited lives. The first example of this his power, was shown upon Belus the Babylonian, by whose especiall advice and help, Arbaces himself was become so great: Yet was not this power of Arbaces exercised in so tyrannicall a manner, as might give offence in that great alteration of things, either to the Princes that had assisted him, or to the generalitie of the people. For in the condemnation of Belosus, he used the counsell of his other Captains, and then pardoned him of his own grace; allowing him to hold not only the City and Province of Babylon, but also those treasures, for embezzeling whereof his life had been endangered.

In like manner, he gave rewards to the rest of his partakers, and made them Rulers of Provinces; retaining (as it appears) onely the Sovereignty to himselfe, which to use immoderately hee did naturally abhorre. He is said, indeed, to have excited the Medes against Sardanapalus, by propounding unto them hope of transferring the Empire to their Nation. And to make good this his promise, he destroyed the Citie of Nineve, permitting the Citizens nevertheless to take and carry away every one his own goods. The other Nations that joyned with him, as the Persians and Bactrians, he drew to his side, by the allurements of liberty; which he himselfe so greatly loved, that by slackening too much the reins of his own Sovereignty, hee did more harm to the generall estate of Media, than the pleasure of the freedome, which it enjoyed, could recompence. For both the Territory of that Countrey was pared narrower by Salmanassar, (or perhaps by some of his Progenitors) whom wee find in the Scriptures to have held some Towns of the Medes; and the civill administration was so disorderly, that the people themselves were glad to see that reformation, which Deioces the first of Arbaces his Line, did make in that government, by reducing them into stricter termes of obedience.

How the force of the Assyrians grew to bee such as might in fourscore years, if not sooner, both extend it self unto the conquest of Israel, and tear away some part of Media, it is a question hardly to be answered; not only in regard of the destruction of Nineve, and subversion of the Assyrian Kingdome, whereof the Medes, under Arbaces, had the honour, who may seem at that time to have kept the Assyrians under their subjection, when the rest of the Provinces were set at liberty; but in consideration of the Kings themselves, who who reigned afterwards in Babylon and Nineve, are confounded by some, and distinguished by others; whereby their History is made uncertain.

I will first therefore deliver the opinion generally received, and the grounds whereupon it stands: then, producing the objections made against it, I will compare together the determination of that worthy man Joseph Scaliger, with those learned that subscribe thereunto, and the judgement of others that were more ancient Writers, or have followed the Antients in this doubtfull case. Neither shall it be needfull to set down a part the several authorities and arguments of sundry men, adding somewhat of weight, or of clearnesse one to another: it will be enough to relate the whole substance of each discourse: which I will do as briefly as I can, and without fear to be taxed of partialitie, as being no more addicted to the one opinion than to the other, by any fancie of mine own, but merely led by those reasons, which upon examination of each part, seemed to me most forceable, though to others they may perhaps appear weak.

That which, untill of late, hath passed as current, is this; That Belosus was the same King, who, first of the Assyrians, entred Palestina with an Armie, being called Pal, or Phul, in the Scriptures, and by Annius his authors with such as follow them, Phul Belochus. Of this man it is said, that he was a skilfull Astrologer, subtile, and ambitious; that he got Babylon by composition made with Arbaces; and that not therewith content, hee got into his hand part of Assyria: finally that he reigned eight and fortie years, and then dying, left the Kingdome to Teglat-phalassar his sonne, in whose Posteritie it continued some few descents, till the house of Merodach prevailed. The truth of this, if Annius his Metasthenes were sufficient proof, could not be gainesaid: for that Aubour (such as he is) is peremptorie herein. But, howsoever Annius his Authors deserve to be suspected, it stands with no reason, that we should conclude all to be false which they affirme. They, who maintain this Tradition, justifie it by divers good Allegations, as a matter confirmed by circumstances found in all Authors, and repugnant unto no historie at all. For it is manifest by the relation of Diodorus (which is indeed the foundation whereupon all have built) that Arbaces and Belosus were partners in the action against Sardanapalus; and that the Bactrians, who joyned with them, were thought well rewarded with libertie; as likewise other Captains were with governments: but that any third person was so eminent, as to have Assyria it self, the chiefe Countrey of the Empire bestowed upon him, it is a thing whereof not the least appearance is found in any Historie. And certainly it stood with little reason, that the Assyrians should be committed unto a peculiar King, at such time as it was not thought meete to trust them in their own walls and houses: Rather it is apparent, that the destruction of Nineve by Arbaces, and the transplantation of the Citizens, was held a needfull policy, because thereby the people of that Nation might be kept down from aspiring to recover the Sovereignty, which else they would have thought to belong, as of right, unto the Seat of the Empire.

Upon such considerations did the Romans, in ages long after following, destroy Carthage, and dissolve the Corporation, or Body politick, of the Citizens of Capua; because those two Towns were capable of the Empire: a matter esteemed over dangerous, even to Rome it selfe; that was Mistressse of them both. This being so, how can it be thought that the Assyrians in three or four years had erected their Kingdome anew, under one Pal? or what must this Pal have been (of whose deservings or intermeddling, or indeed of whose very name, we find no mention in the Warre against Sardanapalus), to whom the principall parts of the Empire fell, either by generall consent in division of the Provinces, or by his own power and purchase very soon after? Surely he was none other than Belosus, whose neere neighbourhood gave him opportunity (as he was wise enough to play his own game) both to get Assyria to himselfe, and to empeach any other man that should have attempted to seize upon it. The Province of Babylon, which Belosus held, being (as Herodotus reports) in riches and power, as good as the third part of the Persian Empire, was able to furnish him with all that was requisite for such a businesse: if that were not enough, hee had gotten into his own hands all the gold and silver that had been in the Palace of Nineve. And questionlesse, to restore such a Citie as Nineve was an terrible fit for none to take in hand, except hee had such means as Belosus had, which Pal, if he were not Belosus, is likely to have wanted.

lay beyond the Countries of Babylon and Mesopotamia, it would not have been an easie matter for him, to passe quite through another mans Kingdome with an Armie, seeking bootie a farre off in Israel: the onely action by which the name of Phul is known. But if we grant, that he, whom the Scriptures call Pul or Phul, was the same whom prophane writers have called Belofus, Beleses, and Belesis, (in like manner as Josephus acknowledgeth, that he, whom the Scriptures called never otherwise than Darius the Mede, was the sonne of Astages, and called of the Greeks by another name, that is, Cyaxares) then is this scruple utterly removed. For Babylon and Mesopotamia did border upon Syria and Palestina: so that Belofus having settled his affairs in Assyria toward the East and North, might with good leasure encroach upon the Countries that lay on the other side of his Kingdome, to the South and West. He that looks into all particulars, may find every one circumstance concurring, to prove that Phul, who invaded Israel, was none other than Belofus. For the Prince of the Arabians, who joyned with Arbaces, and brought no small part of the forces wherewith Sardanapalus was overthrown, did enter into that action, meerly for the love of Belofus. The friendship of these Arabians was a thing of main importance, to those that were to passe over Euphrates with an Armie into Syria. Wherefore Belofus, that held good correspondence with them, and whose most fruitfull Province, adjoining to their barain quarters, might yearly doe them inestimable pleasures, was not onely likely to have quiet passage through their borders, but their utmost assistance: yea, it stands with good reason, that they who loved not Israel, should for their own behoofe have given him intelligence of the destruction and civill broyles among the ten Tribes; whereby as this Pul got a thousand talents, so it seems that the Syrians and Arabians, that had felt an heavey neighbour of Serobeam, recovered their own, setting up a new King in Damasco, and clearing the coast of Arabia, (from the Sea of the Wilderness to Hamath) of the Hebrew Garrisons. Neither was it any new acquaintance, that made the Nations, divided by Euphrates, hold together in so good termes of friendship: it was antient consanguinitie, the memorie whereof was availed to the Syrians, in the time of David, when the Aramites beyond the river, came over willingly, to the succour of Hadadezer, and the Aramites about Damasco. So Belofus had good reason to look into those parts: what a King reigning, so far off as Nineve, should have to do in Syria, if the other end of his Kingdome had not reached to Euphrates, it were hard to shew.

But concerning this last argument of the businesse which might allure the Chaldeans into Palestina, it may be doubted, lest it should seem to have ill coherence with that which hath been said of the long Anarchie that was in the ten Tribes. For if the Crown of Israel were worn by no man in three and twenty years; then is it likely that Belofus was either unwilling to stir, or unable to take the advantage, when it was fairest, and first discovered. This might have compelled those, who alone were not strong enough to seek after help from some Prince that lay further off; and so the opinion of those that distinguish Phul from Belofus, would be somewhat confirmed. On the other side, if we say, that Belofus did passe the river of Euphrates, as soon as he found likelihood of making a prosperous journey: then may it seem that the inter-regnum in Israel was not so long as we have made it: for three and twenty years leasure would have afforded better opportunities, which ought not to have been lost.

For answer hereunto, we are to consider, what Orosius and Eusebius have written concerning the Chaldees: the one, that after the departure of Arbaces into Media, they layd hold on a part of the Empire: the other, that they prevailed and grew mighty, between the times of Arbaces and Darius the Medes. Now, though it be held an error of Orosius, where he supposeth that the occupying of Babylonia by the Chaldeans was in manner by a rebellion from the Medes; yet herein he and Eusebius doe concur, that the authority of Arbaces did restrain the ambition, which by his absence grew bold; and by his death, regardfull onely of it selfe. Now, though so he have conjectured that all Assyria was given to Belofus (as an overplus, besides the Provinces of Babylon which was his by plain bargain made aforehand) in regard of his high deservings; yet the opinion more commonly received, is, that hee did onely encroach upon that Province by little and little, whilst Arbaces lived; and afterwards dealing more openly, got it all himselfe. Seeing therefore, that there passed but twelve years between the death of Arbaces, and the beginning of Amenahem his Reign; manifest it is, that the conquest of Assyria, and settling of that Countrey, was worke enough to hold Belofus occupied, besides the restauration of Nineve, which alone was able to take up all the time remaining of his reign, if perhaps he lived to see it finished in his own dayes. So that this argument may rather serve to prove that Phul and Belofus were one person; forasmuch as the journey of Phul against Israel was not made untill Belofus could find leasure, and the time of advantage which Belofus did let slip, argued his businesse in some other quarter, namely, in that Province of which Phul is called King. Briefly, it may be said, that he who conquered Assyria, and performed somewhat upon a Countrey so far distant as Palestina, was likely to have been, at least, named in some History, or, if not himself, yet his Country to have been spoken of for those victories: but we neither hear of Phul, in any prophane Author; neither doth any Writer, sacred or prophane, once mention the victories or acts whatsoever of the Assyrians, done in those times; whereas of Belofus, and the power of the Chaldeans, we find good Record.

Surely, that great slaughter of so many thousand Assyrians, in the quarrell of Sardanapalus, together with other calamities of that long and unfortunate warre, which overwhelmed the whole Countrey, not ending but with the ruine and utter desolation of Nineve, must needs have so weakened the state of Assyria, that it could not in thirty years space be able to invade Palestina, which the antient Kings, reigning in Nineve, had, in all their greatnesse, forborn to attempt. Yet these afflictions, disabling that Countrey, did help to enable Belofus to subdue it; who having once extended his Dominion to the borders of Media, and being (especially if he had compounded with the Medes) by the interposition of that Countrey, secure of the Scythians, and other warlike Nations on that side, might very well turn Southward, and try his fortune in those Kingdomes, whereinto civill dissention of the inhabitants, and the bordering envie of the Arabians and Aramites about Damasco, Friends and Cousins to the Chaldeans and Mesopotamians, did invite him. For these, and the other before alleged reasons, it may be concluded, That what is said of Pul in the Scriptures, ought to be understood of Belofus; even as by the names of Nebuchadnezzar, Darius the Mede, Artaxerxes, and Ahasuerus, with the like, are thought, or known, to be meant the same whom prophane Historians, by names better known in their own Countreys, have called Nabopolassar, Cyaxares, and Artaxerxes: especially considering, that hereby we shall neither contradict any thing that hath been written of old, nor need to trouble our selves and others with framing new conjectures. This in effect is that, which they allege in maintenance of the opinion commonly received.

Now this being once granted, other things of more importance will of themselves easily follow. For it is a matter of no great consequence to know the truth of this point (considering it apart from that which depends thereon) Whether Pul were Belofus, or some other man: the whole race of these Assyrian and Babylonian Kings, wherein are found those famous Princes, Nabonassar, Mardocempadus, and Nabopolassar (famous for the Astronomical observations recorded from their times) is the main ground of this contention. If therefore Belofus or Beleses were that Phul which invaded Israel; if he and his posterity reigned both in Nineve and in Babylon; if he were father of Teglat-Phul-Aser, from whom Salmanassar, Senacherib, and Asarhaddon descended; then it is manifest, that we must seek Nabonassar the Babylonian King, among these Princes; yea, and conclude him to be none other than Salmanassar, who is known to have reigned in those years which Ptolemy the Mathematician hath assigned unto Nabonassar. As for Meroch, who supplanted Asarhaddon, manifest it is, that he and his successors were of another house. This is the scope and end of all his disputation.

But they that maintain the contrary part, will not be satisfied with such conjectures. They lay hold upon the conclusion, and by shaking that into pieces, hope to overthrow all the premisses upon which it is inferred. For (say they) if Nabonassar that reigned in Babylon, could not be Salmanassar, or any of those other Assyrian Kings, then is it manifest, that the races were distinct, and that Phul and Belofus were severall Kings. This consequence is so plain, that it needs no confirmation. To prove that Nabonassar was a distinct person from Salmanassar, are brought such arguments as would stagger the resolution of him that had sworn to hold the contrary. For first, Nabonassar was King of Babylon; and not of Assyria. This is proved by his name, which is meerly Chaldean, whereas Salmanassar, the first part of Salmanassar's name, is proper to the Assyrians.

It is likewise proved by the Astronomical observations, which proceeding from the Babylonians, not from the Assyrians, do shew that Nabonassar, from whom Ptolomy draws that Epocha, or account of times, was a Babylonian, and no Assyrian. Thirdly, and more strongly, it is confirmed by the successor of Nabonassar, which was Marodempadus, called in his own language Mero-dac-ken-pad, but more briefly in Esay his prophetic, Merodac, by the former part of his name; or Merodach Baladan, the son of Baladan. Now if Merodach the son of Baladan King of Babel were the sonne of Nabonassar, then was Nabonassar none other than Baladan King of Babel, and not Salmanassar King of Assyria.

What can be plainer? As for the cadence of these two names, Nabonassar and Salmanassar, which in Greek or Latine writing hath no difference, we are taught by Scaliger, that in the Hebrew letters there is found no affinity therein. So concerning the places of Babylonia, whereinto Salmanassar carryed captive some part of the ten Tribes: it may well be granted, that in the Province of Babylon, Salmanassar had gotten somewhat, yet will it not follow that he was King of Babylon it selfe. To conclude, Merodach began his reign over Babylon in the first year of Hezekiah, at which time Salmanassar took Samaria; therefore if Salmanassar were King of Babylon, then must we say that he and Merodach, yea, and Nabonassar, were all one man. These are the arguments of that noble and learned Writer Joseph Scaliger; who not contented to follow the common opinion founded upon likelihood of conjectures, hath drawn his proofes from matter of more necessary inference.

Touching all that was said before of Phul Belofus, for the proving that Phul and Belofus were not sundry Kings; Jofeph Scaliger pities their ignorance, that have spent their labour to so little purpose. Honest and painfull men he confesseth that they were, who by their diligence might have won the good liking of their Readers, had they not, by mentioning Annius his Authors, given such offence, that men refused thereupon to read their Books and Chronologies. A short answer.

For mine own part, howsoever I beleieve nothing that Annius his Berosus, Metasthenes, and others of that stamp affirm, in respect of their bare authority; yet am I not so squeamish, but that I can well enough digest a good Book, though I find the names of 30 one or two of these good fellows alleged in it: I have (somewhat peradventure too often) already spoken my mind of Annius his Authors: Nevertheless, I may say here again, that where other Histories are silent, or speak not enough, there may we without shame borrow of these, as much as agrees with that little which elsewhere we find, and serveth to explain or enlarge it without improbabilities.

Neither indeed are those honest and painfull men (as Scaliger termes them, meaning, if I mistake him not, good silly fellows) who set down the Assyrian Kings from Pul forwards, as Lords also of Babylon, taking Pul for Belofus, and Salmanassar for Nabonsassar, such Writers as a man should be ashamed or unwilling to read. For (to omit a multitude of others, that herein follow Annius, though disliking him in generall) Gerard Mercator is not so flight a Chronologer, that he should be laughed out of doores with the name of an honest meaning fellow.

But I will not make comparisons between Scaliger and Mercator; they were both of them men notably learned: let us examine the arguments of Scaliger, and see whether they be of such force as cannot either be refuted or avoyded. It will easily be granted, that Nabonassar was King of Babylon; that he was not King of Affyria, some men doubt whether Scaligers reasons be enough to prove. For though Nabonassar be a Chalcean name, and Salmanassar an Affyrian; yet what hinders us from believing that one man in two languages might be called by two severall names? That Astronomy flourished among the Chaldees, is not enough to prove Nabonassar either an Astrologer or a Chaldean. So it is, that Scaliger himself calls them, Prophetas nescio quos, qui Nabonassarum Astronomum fuisse in somnis viderunt; Prophets I know not who, that in their sleep have dreamt of Nabonassar, that he was an Astrologer.

Whether Nabonasar were an Astrologer or no, I cannot tell; it is hard to maintain the negative. But as his being Lord over the Chaldeans, doth not prove him to have been learned in their sciences; so doth it not prove him not to have been also King of Abyria. The Emperour Charles the fift, who was born in Gant, and Philip his Sonne, King of Spain, and Lords of the Netherlands, had men farre more learned in all Sciences.

Sciences, and particularly in the Mathematicks, among their Subjects of the Low Countries, than were any that I read of then living in Spain, if Spain at that time had any; yet I think, Posteritie will not use this as an argument, to prove that Spain was none of theirs. It may well be, that Salmanassar or Nabonassar did use the Affryan Souldiers, and Babylonian Scholars, but it seems, that he and his posteritie, by giving themselves wholly to the more warlike Nation, lost the richer, out of which they first issued, as like-wise king Philip lost partly, and partly did put to a dangerous hazzard all the Netherlands, by such a course. As for the two un-answerable arguments, (as Scaliger termes them, being me-thinks none other than answers to somewhat that is or might be alleged on the contrary side) one of them which is drawn from the unlike sound and writing of those names, Salmanassar and Nabonassar in the Hebrew, I hold a point about which no man will dispute; for it is not likeness of sound, but agreement of time, and many circumstances else, that must take away the distinction of persons: the other like-wise may be granted; which is, that Salmanassar might be Lord of some places in the Province of Babylon, yet not King of Babylon it self: this indeed might be so, and it might be otherwise. Hitherto there is nothing save conjecture. But in that which is alleged out of the Prophet Esay concerning Merodach the son of Baladan; and in that which is said of this Merodach, or Mardokenpadus, his being the Successor of Nabonassar, and his beginning to reign in the first year of Hezekia, I find matter of more difficultie, so than can be answered in haste. I will therefore deferre the handling of these objections untill I meet with their subject in his proper place; which will be when we come to the time of Hezekia, wherein Merodach lived, and was King. Yet that I may not leave too great a scruple in the mind of the Reader, thus farre will I here satisfie him; that how strong soever this argument may seem, Scaliger himselfe did live to retract it, ingenuously confessing, that in thinking Merodach to be the son of Nabonassar, he had been deceived.

Now therefore let us consider, in what fort they have fashioned their Storie, who takking Pul to be a distinct person from Belofus or Beleſtis, have in like sort, as was neceſſa-rie, distinguished their off-ſpring, making that of Pul to fail in Aſarhaddon, which left 30 all to Merodach the Babylonian. And here I muſt firſt confeſſe my want of Books, if perhaps there be many, that have gone about to reduce this narration into ſome ſuch order, as might preſent unto us the body of this Hiſtorie, in one view. Divers, indeed, there are, whom I have ſeen, that ſince Joſeph Scaliger delivered his opinion, have written in favour of ſome one or other point thereof: but Sethus Calviſius himſelf, who hath abridged Scaligers learned Work, De emendatione Temporum, hath not been careful to give us notice, how long Belofus, Baladan, Pul, or Tiglat Pulaſſar did reign, (perhaps becauſe he found it not expreſſed in Scaliger) but is content to ſet down Balhdan, for the ſame perſon with Nabonaſſar, which Scaliger himſelfe revoked. In this caſe therefore I muſt lay down the plot of theſe divided Kingdomes, in ſuch ſort as I find it contrived 40 by Auguſtinus Torniellus; who onely of all that I have ſeen, ſets down the ſucceſſion, continuance, and acts, of thoſe that reigned in Aſſyria after Sardanapalus, diſtinguiſhing them from Belofus, and his Poſteritie; of whom he hath the like remembrance. This Torniellus is a Regular Clarke of the congregation of S. Paul, whoſe Annales were printed the laſt year; he appears to me a man of a curious indutrie, ſound judgement, and free Spirit; yet many times (and I take it, wilfully) forgetfull of thanking, or mentioning thoſe Proteſſant Writers, by whoſe Books hee hath received good information, and enriched his workes by inserting ſomewhat of theirs. But in this buſineſſe hee hath openly profeſſed to follow Scaliger, whoſe help, without wrong or diſhonour to him-ſelfe, he hath both uſed and acknowledged. For mine own part, I will not ſpare to doe 50 right unto Torniellus; but confeſſe my ſelfe to have received benefit by his writing; and with that his Annales had ſooner come to light, for that as he hath much confirmed me in ſome things, ſo would he have inſtructed and imboldened me to write more fully and leſſe timorouſly in other things, which now I have not leaſure to reviſe. Particularly in that conjeſture (which I had faintly delivered, and yet feared left it had over-haſtily paſ-ſed out of my hand, and been expoſed to other mens conſtructions) of the four Kings that invaded the Valley of Siddim, and were ſlain by Abraham, I find him adventuring as I have done, to ſay, that they may probably be thought to have been ſome pettie Lords; the contrary opinion of all Writers notwithstanding. But now let us conſider

C. i. ſ. 13.

how he hath ordered these last Assyrian and Babylonian Kings. After the destruction of Sardanapalus, Arbaces, being the most mighty, fought to get all to himself, but was opposed by Belofus; in which contention, one Phul, a powerfull man in Assyria, sided with Belofus, and they two prevailed so far, that finally Arbaces was content to share the Empire with them, making such a division thereof, as was long after made of the Roman Empire between Octavian, Anthony, and Lepidus.

Another conjecture is (for Torniellus offers not this, or the rest, as matter of certainty) that Arbaces made himself Sovereign Lord of all, and placed the seat of his Empire in Media, appointing Belofus his Lieutenant in Babylonia, and Phul in Assyria. But in short space, that is, in four years, it came to passe by the just judgement of God, that Phul and Belofus rebelled against Arbaces, like as Arbaces had done against Sardanapalus; and in stead of being Vice-Royes, made themselves absolute Kings. And to this latter opinion Torniellus himself leans, holding it much the more probable, as being more agreeable to that which is found in prophane Histories. Why hee did make and publish the former supposition, resolving to hold the latter, I shall anon, without any wrong to him, make bold to ghesse. Having thus devised how Phul and Belofus might, at the first, attain to be Kings, he orders their time and their successors in this manner.

Four years after Arbaces, Phul begins to reign, and continues eight and forty years. Theglathafasar (whose name, and the names of other Princes, I write diversly, according as the Authors whom I have in hand are pleased to diversifie them) succeeding unto Phul, reigned three and twenty. Salmanassar followed him, and reigned ten. After him Senacherib reigned seven: and when he was slain, Asarhaddon his son ten years, in whom that line failed.

The same time that Phul took upon him as King of Assyria, or not long after (why not rather afore? for so it had been more likely) Belofus usurped the Kingdome of Babylon, and held it threecore and eight years; at the least threecore and eight years did passe, before Nabonassar followed him in the possession,

To Nabonassar, whom (with Scaliger) he thinks to be Baladan, are assigned fix and twenty years: then two and fifty to Merodach, or Mardocempadus: four and twenty to Ben Merodach: and lastly, one and twenty to Nabonassar the father of Nabuchodonosor, who is like to offer matter of further disputation.

Concerning the originall of these Assyrian and Babylonian Kingdomes, I may truly say, That the conjectures of other men, who give all to Belofus, and confound him with Phul, appear to me more neerly resembling the truth. Neither doe I think, that Torniellus would have conceived two different waies, by which Phul might have gotten Assyria (for how Belofus came to get Babylon, it is plain enough) if either of them alone could have contented him. He adheres to the latter of the two, as better agreeing with Diodore, and other Historians. But he perceived, that to make Phul on the sudden King of Assyria; or to give him so noble a Province, as would, of it self, invite him to accept the name and power of a King, was a thing most unlikely to have happened, unlesse his deserts (whereof we find no mention) had been proportionable to so high a reward. And for this cause (as I take it) hath he devised the means, whereby Phul might be made capable of so great a share in the Empire. If this were a true or probable supposition, then would a new doubt arise, Why this Phul being one of the three that divided all between them, was utterly forgotten by all Historians? yea, why this Division it self, and the civill Warres that caused it, were never heard of? Questionlesse, the intervening of some Treasures by Belofus, with his Judgement, Condemnation, and Pardon following, were matters of farre lesse note. Therefore I doe not see, how one of the two inconveniences can this way be avoyded; but that either we must confesse the Dominion given to Phul to have been exceeding his merits; or else his merits, and name withall, to have been strangely forgotten: either of which is enough to make us think, that rather the conjecture, inferring such a sequell, is wide of the truth. As for the rebellion of Phul, and Belofus, against Arbaces, it was almost impossible for the Assyrians to recover such strength in four years, as might serve to hold out in rebellion: for Belofus it was needlesse to rebell, considering, that Arbaces did not seek to molest him, but rather permitted (as being an over-great favourer of liberty) even the Medes that were under his own Government, to doe what they listed.

But it is now fit that wee peruse the Catalogue of these Kings, not passing through them all (for some will require a large discourse in their own times) but speaking of their order and time in generall. If it be so unlawfull to think, that some of Annius his tales (let them all be counted his tales, which are not found in other Authors aswell as in his) may be true, especially such as contradict no acknowledged truth, or apparent likelihood; why then is it said, that Phul did reign in Assyria eight and forty years? For this hath no other ground than Annius. It is true that painfull and judicious Writers have found this number of years to agree fitly with the course of things in History: yet all of them took it from Annius. Let it therefore be the punishment of Annius his forgery (as questionlesse he is often guilty of this crime) that when he tels truth, or probability, he be not beleaved for his own sake; though for our own sakes wee make use of his boldnesse, taking his words for good, whereas (nothing else being offered) we are unwilling our selves to be Authors of new, though not unprofitable conjectures. Herein we shall have this commodity, that we may without blushing alter a little, to help our own opinions, and lay the blame upon Annius, against whom we shall be sure to find friends that will take our part.

The reignes of Theglathafasar and Salmanassar did reach, by Annius his measure, to the length of five and twenty years the one; and seventeen the other; Torniellus hath cut off two from the former, and seven from the later of them, to fit (as I think) his own computation; using the liberty whereof I spake last: for that any Author, save our good Metasthenes, or those that borrowed of him, hath gone about to tell how long each of these did reign, it is more than I have yet found. To Senacherib and Asarhaddon, Torniellus gives the same length of reign, which is found in Metasthenes. I think there are not many, that will arrogate so much unto themselves, as may very well be allowed unto a man so judicious as is Torniellus: and yet I could wish that hee had forbore to condemn the followers of Annius in this businesse, wherein he himselfe hath chosen, in part, rather to become one of them, than to say, as else he must have done, almost nothing.

The like liberty we find that he hath used in measuring the reignes of the Chaldeans, so filling up all the space between the end of Sardanapalus and the beginning of Nabonassar, with the threecore and eight years of Belofus. In this respect it was, perhaps, that he thought Belofus might have begun his reign somewhat later than Phul: for threecore and eight years would seem a long time for him to hold a Kingdome, that was no young man when he took possession of it. But how is any whit of his age abated by shortning his reign, seeing his life reacheth to the end of such a time, as were alone, without adding the time wherein he was a private man, enough for a long liver? Indeed eight and forty years had been somewhat of the most, considering that he seems by the story to have been a little lesse at such time as he joyned with Arbaces; and therefore the addition of twenty years did well deserve that note (which Torniellus advisedly gives) that if his reign extended not so far, then the reign of such as came after him, occupied the middle time, unto Nabonassar.

Neither doe reprehend the boldnesse of Torniellus, in conjecturing, nor the modesty of Scaliger and Sethus Calvisius, in forbearing to set down as warrantable, such things as depend only upon likelihood. For things, whereof the perfect knowledge is taken away from us by Antiquity, must be described in History, as Geographers in their Maps describe those Countreys, whereof as yet there is made no true discovery, that is, either by leaving some part blank, or by inserting the Land of Pigmies, Rocks, of Lead-stone, with Head-lands, Bayes, great Rivers, and other particularities, agreeable to common reports, though many times controlled by following experience, and found contrary to truth. Yet indeed the ignorance growing from distance of place, allows not such liberty to a Describer, as that which ariseth from the remediless oblivion of consuming time. For it is true that the Poet saith;

— Neque feruida
Pars incula caloribus
Mundi, pec Boreae finitimum latus, Duratque, sole Neve,
Mercatorem abigunt, horrida callid
Vincunt equora Navite

Nor

Not Southern heat, nor Northern snow
That freezing to the ground doth grow,
The subject Regions can fence,
And keep the greedy Merchant thence:
The subtle Shipmen way to find,
Storme never so the Seas with Wind.

Therefore the fictions (or let them be called conjectures) painted in Maps, doe serve only to mis-lead such discoverers as rashly believe them; drawing upon the publishers, either some angry curses or well deserved scorn; but to keep their own credit, they cannot serve alwayes. To which purpose I remember a pretty jest of Don Pedro de Sarmiento, a worthy Spanish Gentleman, who had been employed by his King in planting a Colony upon the Streights of Megellan: for when I asked, him being then my Prisoner, some questions about an Island in those Streights, which, me thought, might have done either benefit or displeasure to his enterprise, he told me merrily, that it was to be called the Painters wives Island, saying, That whilst the fellow drew that Map, his wife sitting by, desired to put in one Countrey for her; that she in imagination, might have an Island of her own. But in filling up the blankes of old Histories, we need not be so scrupulous, For it is not to be feared, that time shall runne backward, and by restoring the things themselves to knowledge, make our conjectures appear ridiculous: What if some good Copy of an ancient Author, could be found, shewing (if we have it not already) the perfect truth of these uncertainties? would it bee more shame to have beleaved in the mean while, Annins or Tornielus, than to have beleaved nothing? Here I will not say, that the credit which we gave to Annins, may chance otherwhiles to be given to one of those Authors whose names he pretendeth. Let it suffice, that in regard of authority, I had rather trust Scaliger or Tornielus, than Annins; yet him than them, of his assertion be more probable and more agreeable to approved Histories than their conjecture, as in this point it seems to me; it having moreover gotten some credit, by the approbation of many, and those not meanly learned.

To end this tedious disparation; I hold it a sure course in examination of such opinions as have once gotten the credit of being generall, so to deal as Pacuvius in Caput did with the multitude, finding them desirous to put all the Senators of the Citie to death. He lockt the Senators up within the State-house, and offered the lives of the Peoples mercy; obtaining thus much, that none of them should perish, untill the Commonalty had both pronounced him worthy of death, and elected a better in his place. The condemnation was hasty, for as fast as every name was read, all the town cried, Let him die: but the execution required more leisure; for in substituting of another, some notorious vice of the person, or baseness of his condition, or insufficiency of his quality, made each new one that was offered to be rejected: so that finding the worse and lesse choise, the further and the more that they fought, it was finally agreed, that the old should be kept for lack of better.

of the Olympiads, and the time when they began.

After this division of the Assyrian Empire, follows the instauration of the Olympian games, by Iphitus, in the reign of the same King Uzziah, and in his one and fiftieth year. It is, I know, the generall opinion, that these games were established by Iphitus, in the first of Fotham: yet is not that opinion so generall, but that Authors, weighy enough, have given to them a more early beginning. The truth is, that instituting those things unto the sacred History, which are found in prophane Authors, we should not be too carefull of drawing the Hebrews, to those works of time, which had no reference to their affairs; it is enough, that setting in due order these beginnings of accounts, we joyn them to matters of Israel and Juda, where occasion requires.

These Olympian games and exercises of activity, were first instituted by Hercules, who measured the length of the race by his own foot; by which Pythagoras found out the stature and likely strength of Antenor his body. They took name, not from the Mountain Olympus, but from the Citie Olympia; otherwise Pisa, neer unto Elis; where also Jupiter: Temple in Elis, famous among the Grecians, and reputed among the wonders of the World, was known by the name of the Temple of Jupiter Olympius. These games were exercised from every fourth year compleat, in the plains of Elis, a Citie of Peloponnesus, neer the river Alpheus.

After the death of Hercules, these meetings were discontinued for many years, till Iphitus, by advice from the Oracle of Apollo, re-established them, Licurgus the Law-giver then living: from which time they were continued by the Grecians, till the reign of Theodosius the Emperour, according to Cedrenus: others think that they were dissolved under Constantine the Great.

From this institution, Varro accompted the Grecian times and their stories to be certain: but reckoned all before, either doubtfull or fabulous: and yet Pliny gives little credit to all that is written of Greece, till the reign of Cyrus, who began in the five and fiftieth Olympiad, as Eusebius out of Diodore, Castor, Polybius, and others, hath gathered, in whose time the seven wise Grecians flourished. For Salon had speech with Crasus, and Crasus was overthrown and taken by Cyrus.

Many patient and piercing brains have laboured to find out the certain beginning of these Olympiads, namely, to set them in the true year of the World, and the reign of such, and such Kings: but seeing they all differ in the first accompt, that is, of the Worlds year, they can hardly jump in particulars thereon depending.

Cyri against Julian and Dydimus begin the Olympiads the nine and fortieth of Ostias, or Asarrah.

Eusebius, who is contrary to himself in this reckoning, accounts with those that find the very first Olympiad in the beginning of the four hundredth and sixth year after Troy; yet he telleth us that it was in the fiftieth year of Uzziah, which is (as I find it) two years later.

Eratosthenes placeth the first Olympiad four hundred and seven years after Troy, reckoning the years that passed between, to whom Dionysius Halicarnassens, Diodorus Siculus, Solinus and many others adhere.

The distance between the destruction of Troy and the first Olympiad, is thus collected by Eratosthenes. From the taking of Troy to the descent of Hercules his posterity into Peloponnesus, were fourscore years; thence to the Ionian expedition, threecore years; from that expedition to the time of Lycurgus his government in Sparta, one hundred fifty nine; and thence to the first Olympiad, one hundred and eight years. In this account the first year of the first Olympiad is not included.

But vain labour it were to seek the beginning of the Olympiads by numbring the years from the taking of Troy, which is of date farre more uncertain. Let it suffice that by knowing the instauration of these games to have been in the four hundredth and eight year current after Troy, wee may reckon back to the taking of that Citie, setting that, and other accidents which have reference thereto, in their proper times. The certainty of things following the Olympiads must needs teach us how to find when they began.

To this good use wee have the ensuing years unto the death of Alexander the Great, thus divided by the same Eratosthenes. From the beginning of the Olympiads to the passage of Xerxes into Greece, two hundred fourscore and seventeen years; from thence to the beginning of the Peloponnesian Warre, eight and forty years; forwards to the victory of Lysander, seven and twenty; to the battell of Leuctra, thirty four; to the death of Philip King of Macedon, five and thirty; and finally to the death of Alexander, twelve. The whole summe ariseth to 453. years; which number he otherwise also collecteth, and it is allowed by the most.

Now for placing the institution of the Olympiads in the one and fiftieth year of Uzziah, we have arguments grounded upon that which is certain, concerning the beginning of Cyrus his reign, and the death of Alexander; as also upon the Astronomical calculation of sundry Eclipses of the Sunne, as of that which happened when Xerxes set out of Sardis with his Army to invade Greece; and of divers other.

Touching Cyrus, it is generally agreed that his reign as King before hee was Lord of the great Monarchy, began the first year of the five and fiftieth Olympiad, and that hee reigned thirty years: they who give him but twenty nine years of reign (following Hecataeus rather than Tully, Justin, Eusebius, and others) begin a year later, which comes

all to one reckoning. So is the death of Alexander set by all good Writers in the first year of the hundredth and fourteenth Olympiad. This latter note of Alexander's death serveth well to lead us back to the beginning of Cyrus; as many the like observations doe. For if we reckon upwards from the time of Alexander, wee shall find all to agree with the years of the Olympiads, wherein Cyrus began his reign, either as Kings, or (taking the word Monarch, to signifie a Lord of many Kingdomes) as a great Monarch. From the beginning of Cyrus, in the first year of the five and fiftieth Olympiad, unto the end of the Perſian Empire, which was in the third of the hundredth and twelfth Olympiad, we find two hundred and thirty years compleat: from the beginning of Cyrus his Monarchy, which lasted but seven years, we find compleat two hundred and seven years, which was the continuance of the Perſian Empire.

Now therefore seeing that the first year of Cyrus his Monarchy (which was the last of the sixtieth Olympiad, and the two hundredth and fortieth year from the institution of those games by Iphitus) followed the last of the seventy yeares of the captivity of Jude, and desolation of the Land of Israel: manifest it is, that we must reckon back those seven years, and one hundred threescore and ten years more, the last which passed under the Kings of Juda, to find the first of these Olympiads; which by this account is the one and fiftieth of Uzziah, as we have already noted.

The Eclipses whereof we made mention, serve well to the same purpose. For examples sake; that which was seen when Xerxes mustered his Army at Sardis, in the two hundredth threescore and seventh year of Nabonasser, being the last of the threescore and fourteenth Olympiad, leads us back unto the beginning of Xerxes, and from him to Cyrus, whence wee have a fair way through the threescore and ten years, unto the destruction of Jerusalem; and so upwards through the reignes of the last Kings of Juda, to the one and fiftieth year of Uzziah.

Thus much may suffice, concerning the time wherein these Olympiads began.

To tell the great solemnity of them, and with what exceeding great concourse of all Greece, they were celebrated, I hold it a superfluous labour. It is enough to say that all bodily exercises, or the most of them, were therein practised; as Running, Wrestling, Fighting, and the like. Neither did they onely contend for the Mastery in those feats, whereof there was good use, but in running of Chariots, fighting With whole-hus, and other the like ancient kindes of exercises that served onely for ostentation. Thither also repaired Orators, Poets, Musicians, and all that thought themselves excellent in any laudable quality, to make tryall of their skill. Yea, the very Cryers which proclaimed the victories, contended which of them should get the honour of having playd the best part.

The Eleans were presidents of those Games; whose justice, in pronouncing without partiality who did best, is highly commended. As for the rewards given to the Victors, they were none other than Garlands of Palme, or Olive, without any other commodity following than the reputation. Indeed there needed no more. For that was held so much, that when Diagoras had seen his three sons crowned for their severall victories in those games, one came running to him with this gratulation: Morere, Diagoras, non enim in celum ascensurus es, that is, Die, Diagoras, for thou shalt not clime up to heaven: as if there could be no greater happinesse on earth, than what already had befallen him. In the like sense Horace speaks of these Victors, calling them,

Palma Caeſtes.*

Such as like heavenly wights do come
With an Elean Garland home.

Neither was it only the voyce of the People, or songs of Poets, that so highly extolled them, which had wonne these Olympian prizes; but even grave Historians thought it a matter worthy of their noting. Such was (as Tully counts it) the vanity of the Greekes, that they esteemed it almost as great an honour to have wonne the Victory at Running or Wrestling in those games, as to have triumphed in Rome for some famous victory, or conquest of a Province.

That these Olympian games were celebrated at the full of the Moon, and upon the fifteenth day of the Moneth Hecatombaeon, which doth answer to our June; and what means they used to make the Moneth begin with the new Moone, that the fifteenth day might be the full, I have shewed in another place. Wherefore I may now return unto the Kings of Juda, & leave the merrie Greekes at their games, whom I shall meet in more serious employments, when the Perſian quarrells draw the body of this History into the coasts of Ionia and Helleſpont.

5. VI.

Of Jotham and his Contemporaries.

Jotham the sonne of Uzziah, when he was five and twenty years old, and in the second of Pekah King of Israel, was anointed King in Jerusalem, his Father yet living. Hee built an exceeding high Gate to the Temple, of threescore cubits upright, and therefore called Opbel; besides divers Cities in the Hills of Juda, and in the Forrests, Towers & Palaces: he enforced the Ammonites to pay him Tribute, to wit, of Silver an hundred talents, and of Wheat and Barly two thousand measures: hee reigned fixe and twenty years: of whom Josephus gives this testimonie: Ejusmodi vero Princeps hic fuit, ut nullum in eo virtutis genus desideres: ut qui Deum adeo pi. coluerit, hominibus suis adeo just. praefarit urbem ipsam tanta sibi cura esse passus sit, & tantopere auxerit, ut universum regnum hostibus quidem minime contemnendum, domesticis autem eius incolis atque civibus foelix, sanctum & fortunatum sua virtute effecerit; This was such a Prince, as a man could find no kind of vertue wanting in him: hee worshipped God so religiously, that by his vertue and promise he made his whole Kingdoms not contemptible to his enemies, but to his Servants, Inhabitants and Citizens, prosperous and happy.

This is all that I find of Jotham: his reigne was not long, but as happy in all things, as he himselfe was devout and vertuous.

Auchomenes about this time succeeded phelstus in Corinth: after whom, the Corinthians erected Magistrates, which governed from yeare to yeare. And yet Pausanias in his second Book, with Strabo and Plutarch, in many places, are of opinion, That Corinth was governed by Kings of the race of the Bacidae, to the time of Cypselus, who drove them out.

Tiglathphalassar, or Tiglathpelefer, the son of Phul the second of the Babylonians and Assyrians that was of this new race, about this time invaded Israel, while Pekah (who murdered his Master Pekeiah) was King thereof. In which Expedition he took most of the Cities of Nephtali and Galilee, with those of Gilead over Jordan, and carried the inhabitants captive. This Tiglath reigned five and twenty years, according to Metasthenes. But Krentzheimius findes, that with his sonne Salmanassar he reigned yet two yeares longer; which yeares I would not ascribe to the sonne, because the Aera of Nabonassar begins with his single reign, but reckon them to Tiglath Phulassar himselfe, who there-with reigned 27. yeeres.

Aeschylus, the son of Agamnestor, about the same time, the twelfth Archon in Athens, ruled 25. yeares. Alcemenes governed Sparta: after whom, the Estate changed, according to Eusebius. But therein surely Eusebius is mistaken: for Diodore, Plutarch, Pausanias, and others, witnesse the contrary. Pausanias affirmeth, That Polydorus, a Prince of eminent vertues, succeeded his father, and reigned 60. yeares, and out-lived the Messenack warre: which was ended by Theopompus, the sonne of Nicander, his royall companion.

At this time lived Nahum the Prophet, who fore-told the destruction of the Assyrian Empire, and of the citie of Nineve, which succeeded (saith Josephus) a hundred & fifteen yeeres after. The Cities of Cyrene and of Aradus were built at this time, while in Media, Sosarmus and Medius reigned, being the second and third Kings of those parts.

Of Achaz and his Contemporaries.

Achaz, or Achaz, succeeded unto Jotham in the seventeenth yeer of Pekah, the son of Remalia: the same being also the last yeere of his fathers reign, who began in the second of the same Pekah, and reigned 16. but not compleat yeeres. This

2 Chron. 28.

Abaz was an Idolater, exceeding all his predecessors. He made molten Images for Babilon, and burnt his son for sacrifice before the Idoll Moloch, or Saturne, which was presented by a man-like brazen body, bearing the head of a Calfe, set up not far from Jerusalem, in a Valley shadowed with Woods, called Gehinnom, or Tophet, from whence the word Gehenna is used for Hell. The children offered, were inclosed within the carcasse of this Idoll, and as the fire encreased, so the sacrificers, with a noyse of Cimbals and other Instruments, filled the ayre, to the end the pittifull cries of the children might not bee heard : which unnaturall, cruell, and devillish Oblation, Jeremie the Prophet vehemently reprehendeth, and of which S. Hierome upon the tenth of Matthew hath written at large. By the prohibition in Leviticus the eighteenth, it appeareth that this horrible sinne was ancient : in the twelfth of Deuteronomie, it is called an abomination which God hateth. That it was also practised elsewhere, and by many Nations remote from Judea, divers Authors witnesse ; as Virgil in the second of Aeneids—Sanguine placastis, &c. & Silius—Postere cede Deos. Saturne is said to have brought this custome into Italy, besides the casting of many soules into the River of Tyber, in stead of which, Hercules commanded, that the waxen Images of men should be thrown in and drowned. The Devill also taught the Carthaginians this kind of butcherie, in somuch, that when their Citie was besieged, and in distresse, the Priest made them believe, that because they had spared their own children, and had bought and brought up others to bee offered, that therefore Saturne had stirred up and strengthened their Enemies against them : whereupon they presently caused two hundred of the noblest youths of their Citie to be slaine, and offered to Saturn or Satan, to appease him : who besides these fornamed Nations, had instructed the Rhadians, the people of Crete, and Chios, of Messena, of Galatia, with the Massages, and others, in these his services. Further, as if he were not content to destroy the soules of many Nations in Europe, Asia, and Africa, (as Acosia writeth) the Mexicans and other people of America, were brought by the Devill under this fearefull servitude, in which he also holdeth the Floridans and Virginians at this day.

Acosia de Hist. nat. & mor. Ind.

For the wickednesse of this King Abaz, God stirred up Rezin of Damascus, and Pekah the Son of Remaliah, King of Israel against him, who invaded Judea, and besieged Jerusalem, but entred it not.

2 Chron. 28. 6.

The King of Syria, Rezin, posselt himself of Elah by the Red Sea, and cast the Jews out of it, and Pekah slaughtered in one day an hundred and twenty thousand Judeans, of the ablest of the Kingdome, at which time Masseiah, the Sonne of Achaz, was also slaine by Zichri, with Azrikam the Governour of his house, and Elcanah the second person unto the King. Besides all this, two hundred thousand prisoners of women and children, the Israelites lead away to Samaria : but by the counsell of the Prophet Odai, they were returned and delivered back againe.

2 Chron. 28.

As Israel and Aram vexed Juda on the North, so the Edomites & the Philistims, who evermore attended the ruine of Judea, entred upon them from the South, and took Beersema, Aalon, Gaderoth, Socho, Timnah, & Gemze, slew many people, & carried away many prisoners. Whereupon when Achaz saw himself environed on all sides, & that his Idols and dead gods gave him no comfort, hee sent to the Assyrian Tiglathpileser, to desire some aide from him against the Israelites and Aramites, presenting him with the silver and gold both of the Temple, and Kings house.

2 Kings 16.

Tiglathpileser wanted not a good example to follow, in making profit of the troubles that rose in Palestina. His Father having lately made himself from a Provinciaall Lieutenant, King of Babylon and Assyria, had a little before led him the way into Judea, invited by Menahem, King of Israel. Wherefore now the Son willingly harkened to Achaz, and embraced the advantage. As for Belochus himself, hee was content to assigne some other time for going through with this enterprize : because (as I have said before) he was not firmly settled at home, and the Syrian Kings lay directly in his way, who were yet strong both in men and fame. But Tiglath, having now, with the treasures of Jerusalem, prepared his Army, first invaded the Territorie of Damascus, wanne the Citie, & killed Rezin the last of the race of the Adads, who began with David, & ended with this Achaz. At Damascus, Achaz met Tiglath, and taking thence a pattern of the Altar, sent it to Uriah the Priest, commanding the like to be made at Jerusalem, whereon at his returne hee burnt Sacrifice to the gods of the Syrians. In the meane while Tiglath posselt all Basun, and and the rest beyond Jordan, which belonged to the Tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Manasse. And then passing the River, he mastered the Cities of Galilee, invaded Ephraim, and the Kingdome of Israel, and made them his Vassals. And notwithstanding that hee was invited and waged by Achaz, yet after the spoile of Israel, he posselt himself of the greater part of Juda, and, as it seemeth, enforced Achaz to pay him tribute. For in the second of Kings, the eighteenth, it is written of Ezechia, that hee revolted from Ashur, or rebelled against him, & therefore was invaded by Sennacherib. After Abaz had beheld and borne these miseries, in the end of the sixteenth yeere of his reigne he died ; but was not buried in the Sepulchres of the Kings of Juda.

10 With Abaz lived Medidus, the third Prince in Media, who governed 40. yeeres, saith Eusebius : Diodorus and Ctesias find Anticarnus in stead of this Medidus, to have been Sosarmus his successor, to whom they give 30. yeeres. Tiglath Pileser held the Kingdome of Assyria, all the reign of Abaz : yet so, that Salmanassar his Son may seeme to have reigned with him some part of the time. For wee find that Abaz did send unto the Kings of Assur to help him. The Geneva note saies, that these Kings of Assur, were Tiglath Pileser, and those Kings that were under his Dominion. But that he or his Father had hitherto made such conquests, as might give him the Lordship over other Kings, I doe neither find any History, nor circumstance that proveth. Wherefore I think that these Kings of Assur, were Tiglath, and Salmanassar his Son, who reigned with his Father, as hath been said before : though how long hee reigned with his Father, it had been hard to define.

At this time began the Ephori in Lacedamon, a hundred and thirty yeeres after Lycurgus, according to Plutarch. Eusebius makes their beginning far later, namely, in the fifteenth Olympiad. Of these Ephori, Elalus was the first, Theopompus and Polydorus being then joyned Kings. These Ephori, chosen every yeere, were controulers, as well of their Senators, as of their Kings, nothing being done without their advice and consent. For (saith Cicero) they were opposed against their Kings, as the Roman Tribunes against the Consuls. In the time of Abaz died Aeschylus, who had ruled in Athens ever since the fiftieth yeere of Uzzia. Alcamenon the thirteenth of the Medontida, or Governours of the Athenians (so called of Medon who followed Cadmus) succeeded his Father Aeschylus, and was the last of their Governours : he ruled onely two yeeres. For the Athenians changed first from Kings (after Cadmus) to Governours for life ; which ending in this Alcamenon, they erected a Magistrate, whom they termed an Archon, who was a kind of Burghomaster, or Governor of their City for ten yeeres.

This alteration Bausanias in his fourth Book begins in the first yeere of the eighth Olympiad. Eusebius & Halicarnassensis in the first of the seventh Olympiad : at which time indeed, Carops the first of these, began his ten yeeres rule.

The Kingdome of the Latines, governed about three hundred yeere by the Sylvii, of the race of Aeneas, took end in the same Abaz time : the foundation of Rome being laid by Romulus & Remus in the eighth yeere of the same King. Codoman builds it in the eleventh of Achaz. Bucholzer in the eighth, as I thinke he should ; others somewhat later, and in the reigne of Ezechias. Cicero, Entropius, Orosius, and others, square the time of the foundation to the third yeere of the sixth Olympiad. But Halicarnassensis, Solinus, Antiochensis, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Eusebius, to the first yeere of the seventh : who seeme not onely to me, but to many very learned Chronologers, to have kept herein the best accompt.

After the Aborigines, were the Pelaggi, an ancient Nation, who sometimes gave name to all Greece: but their antiquities are long since dead, for lacke of good records. Neither was their glory such in Italy, as could long sustaine the name of their own Tribe; for they were in short space accounted one people with the former inhabitants. The Sicani, Aufones, Arunci, Rutuli, and other people, did in ages following disturbe the peace of Latium, which by Saturne was brought to some civility; and he therefore canonized as a god.

This Saturne S. Augustine called Sterces or Sterculius, others terme him Stercutius, & say, that he taught the people to dung their grounds. That Latium took his name of Saturne, because he did latere, that is, lie hidden there, when he fled from Jupiter, it is questionlesse a fable. For as in Heathenish superstition, it was great vanity to think that any thing could bee hidden from God, or that there were many gods of whom one fledde from another; so in the truth of History, it is well known, that no King reigning in those parts was so mighty, that it should bee hard to find one Country or another, wherein a man might bee safe from his pursuit. And yet, as most fables and poeticall fictions were occasioned by some ancient truth, which either by ambiguity of speech, or some allusion, they did maimedly and darkely expresse (for so they fained a passage over a River in Hell, because death is a passage to another life: & because this passage is hateful, lamentable, and painfull, therefore they named the River Styx, of Hate; Cocytus of Lamentation, and Acheron, of Paine: so also because men are stonie-hearted; and because the Greek λίθινος, people, and λίθος, stones, are neere in sound, therefore they feigned in the time of Deucalion stones converted into men, as at other times men into stones:) in like manner it may be, that the originall of Saturne hiding himself, was some allusion to that old opinion of the wisest of the Heathen, that the true God was ignotus Deus, as it is noted in the Ath; whence also Esay of the true God saies, tu Deus abscondens te. For it cannot be in vaine, that the word Saturnus should also have this very signification, if it be derived (as some thinke) from the Hebrew Safar, which is to hide: Howbeit I denie not but that the originall of this word, Latium, ought rather to be sought else where.

Reyneccius doth conjecture that the Ceteans, who descended of Cethim, the Son of Javan, were the men who gave the name to Latium. For these Ceteans are remembered by Homer as aiders of the Trojans in their warre. Srabo interpreting the place of Homer, calls them subjects to the Crown of Troy. Hereupon Reyneccius gathers, that their abode was in Asia: viz. in agro Elaitico, in the Elaitian Territory, which agreeth with Srabo. Of a City which the Aeolians held in Asia, called Elea, or Elaita, Paulanus makes mention: Scylax calls it Cidamis, or (according to the Greek writing) Cidamis, which name last rehearsed hath a very neere sound to Cethim, Citim, or Cithim; the Greek Letter (D) having (as many teach) a pronunciation very like to (TH) differing only in the strength or weaknesse of utterance, which is found betweene many English words written with the same letters. Wherefore that these Ceteans, being descended of Cethim, Citim, or Kittim, the Sonne of Javan, who was Progenitor of the Greekes, might very well take a denomination from the City, and Region, which they inhabited, and from thence be called Elaites, or Elaites, it is very likely, considering that among the Arcadians, Phocians, Aetolians, and Eleans, who all were of the Aeolique Tribe, are found the names of the Mountaine Elaitis, the Haven Eleus, the people Elaitai, the City Elaitis, Elaitis, & Elaitia; of which last it were somewhat harsh in the Latine tongue to call the Inhabitants by any other name then Elaitini, from whence Latini may come. Now whereas both the Cetei and Arcadians had their originall from Cethim, it is nothing unlikely that agreeing in language and similitude of names, they might nevertheless differ in sound and pronunciation of one and the same word. So that as he is by many called Sabinus, to whom some (deriving the Sabines from him) give the name of Sabinus: in the like manner might he whom the Arcadians would call Elaitis (of which name they had a Prince that founded the City Elaitis) bee named of the Ceteans Latinus. Reyneccius, pursuing this likelihood, thinks that when Eurypilus, Lord of the Ceteans, (being the Sonne of Telephus, whom Hercules begat upon Auge, the daughter of Aleus King of Arcadia) was slaine by Achilles in the Trojan Warre: then did Telephus, brother to Eurypilus, conduct the Ceteans, who (fearing what evill might befall themselves by the Greeks, if the affairs of Troy should goe ill) passed into that part of Italy, whereas the Arcadians were planted by Oenotrius. And Reyneccius farther thinks, that Telephus being the more gracious among among the Oenotrian Arcadians, by the memory of his Grand-mother Auge, an Arcadian Lady, was well contented to take an Arcadian name, and to be called Elaitis, which in the dialect and pronunciation either of the Ceteans, or of the Oenotrians, was first Elaitis, and then Latinus. That this name of Elaitis may have bin taken or imposed by the Arcadians, it is the more easie to be thought, for that there were then two Families, the one of Aphidas, the other of Elaitis, who were Sons of Aleus King of Arcadia, which gave name to the Countrey: & betweene these two Families the succession in that Kingdome did passe, almost interchangeably, for many ages, till at the end of the Trojan warre it fell into the hand of Hippothous of the race of Elaitis, in whose Posterity it continued until the last. Again, the name of Latinus, having a derivative sound, agrees the better with the supposition of such an accident. This is the conjecture of Reyneccius, which if he made over-boldly, yet others may follow it with the lesse reproofe, considering that it is not easie to find either an apparent truth, or faire probability among these disagreeing Authors, which have written the originals of Latium.

S. V. I.

Of the ancient Kings of the Latines untill Aeneas his coming.

THE Kings which reigned in Latium before the arrivall of Aeneas, were Saturnus, Picus, Faunus, and Latinus. Of Saturne there is nothing remembre, save what is mentioned already, and many Fables of the Greekes, which whether they be applyable to this man, it is for him to judge, who shall be able to determine, whether this were the Saturne of the Greekes, called by them Σάτυρος, or some other, stiled Saturne by the Aborigines. For the age wherein he lived, may very well admit him to have bin the same: but the names of Sterces, and Stercutius (for it may bee, this name was not borrowed from the skill which hee taught the people, but rather the foile which they laid on their grounds had that appellation from him) doe rather make him seeme some other man.

Of Picus it is said, that he was a good Horse-man. The fable of his being changed into a Bird, which we call a Pie, may well seeme (as it is interpreted) to have grown from the skill which he had in sooth-saying, or divination, by the flight and chattering of Fowles. Faunus, the Son of Picus, reigned after his Father: He gave to Eander the Arcadian (who having slaine by mischance his Father Echemus King of Arcadia, fled into Italy) the waste grounds on which Rome was afterward built.

Fauna, called Favus, the sister of Faunus, who was also his wife, as all Historians agree, she was held a Prophetesse, and highly commended for her chastity, vvhich praise in her must needs have bin much blemished by her marriage, it self being meere incestuous.

It is not mentioned that Faunus had by his sister any childe, neither doe we read of any other Wife which he had, save onely that Virgil gives unto him Latinus as his Son, by a Nymph called Marica.

But who this Marica was, it is not found, save onely that her aboad was about the River Liris neere Minturnae.

Of the name Latinus, there are by Pomponius Sabinus recounted four: one, the Son of Faunus, another of Hercules, a third of Ulysses by Circe, the fourth of Telemachus. Suidas takes notice onely of the second, of whom he saith, that is hname was Telephus, and the people anciently named the Ceti, were from his surname, called Latini. This agrees in effect with the opinion of Reyneccius, the difference consisting almost in this only, that Suidas calls Telephus the son of Hercules, whereas Reyneccius makes him his Nephew, by a son of the same name. This Latinus having obtained the succession in that Kingdome after Faunus, did promise his only Daughter and Heire Lavinia, to Turnus the son of Penia, who was sister to Amata Latinus his Wife.

But when Aeneas arrived in those parts with fifteene ships, or perhaps fewer, wherein might be embarked, according to the rate which Thucydides allowes to the Vessels then used, about one thousand & two hundred men: then Latinus finding that it would stand best with his assurance, to make alliance with the Trojan, and moved with the great reputation of Aeneas, which himself had heard of, in the Waire of Troy, gave his Daughter to him, breaking off the former appointment with Turnus, who incensed here-

Exegetis often calls the Idols of the Heathen deus sterces: and hence it may be that in the Evangelist we read of Belzebub, Belzebub, which is interpreted dominus sterces: and it may bee that after that Saturnus became the name of an Idol, it pleased God that in a like sense this name Stercutius should stick unto him.

Of Amata the Wife of Latinus, it is very certaine, that were she an Italian, she could not have borne a Daughter marriageable at the arrivall of Aeneas; unless wee should wholly follow Strabo, and rather give the conduct of the Cetei into Italy, to Telephus the Father, than to his Son, who served in the last yeere of the Troian Warre. But Reynolds holds her an Asiatique, and thinks withall, that Lavinia was borne before Telephus came into Italy. That this name Amata, by which Virgil and Halicarnassus call her, was not proper, but rather a surname, it may seeme by Varro; who calleth her Palatia: which name very well might be derived from the Greek name Pallus. Amata, which signifieth beloved, or deare, was the name by which the High Priest called every Virgin to whom he took to serve as a Nunne of Vesta; wherefore it is the more easie to be thought a surname, howsoever Virgil discourse of her and Venilia her sister.

Lavinia, the daughter of Latinus, being given in marriage to Aeneas, the Kingdome of Latium, or the greatest part of that Countrey, was established in that race: wherein it continued untill it was over-grown by the might and greatnesse of the Romans.

§. IV.

Of Aeneas, and of the Kings and Governors of Alba.

AENEAS himself being of the Royall blood of Troy, had the command of the Dardanians: he was a valiant man, very rich, and highly honoured among the Troians. By his wife Cressa, the daughter of Priamus, he had a sonne called Ascanius; whose surname was Iulus, having before the ruine of Troy (as Virgil notes) bin surnamed Ithys. But when Aeneas was dead, his wife Lavinia, the daughter of Latinus, being great with childe by him, and fearing the power of this Ascanius, fled into the Woods, where she was delivered of a son, called thereupon Sylvius, and surnamed Posthumus, because he was borne after his fathers Funerall. This flight of Lavinia was so evil taken by the people, that Ascanius procured her returne, entreated her honourable, and using her as a Queene, did foster her young son, his halfe-brother Sylvius. Yet afterwards, whether to avoid all occasions of disagreement, or delighted with the situation of the place, Ascanius leaving to his mother-in-law the Citie Lavinium, which Aeneas had built and called after his new wives name, founded the Citie Alba Longa, and therein reigned. The time of his reign was, according to some, eight and twenty yeeres: Virgil gives him thirty; others five and thirty, and eight and thirty. After his decease, there arose contention betweene Sylvius, the son of Aeneas, and Iulus the sonne of Ascanius, about the Kingdome: but the people inclining to the sonne of Lavinia, Iulus was contented to hold the Priesthood, which he and his race enjoyed, leaving the Kingdome to Sylvius Posthumus, whose posterity were afterwards called Sylvii.

The

The most of these Kings lived in peace, and did little or nothing worthy of remembrance.

Latinus founded many Townes in the borders of Latium: who standing much upon the honour of their originall, grew thereby to be called Prisci Latini. Of Tiberinus some thinke that the River Tiber had name, being formerly called Albula: but Virgil gives it that denomination of another called Tibris, before the coming of Aeneas into Italy. The Mountain Aventinus had name (as many write) from Aventinus King of the Albanes, who was buried therein: but Virgil hath it otherwise. Iulus, the brother of Aventinus, is named by Eusebius as father of another Iulus, & grandfather of Iulus Proculus, who leaving Alba, dwelt with Romulus in Rome: Numitor, the elder son of Procas, was deprived of his Kingdome by his brother Amulius; by whom also his son Aegesthus was slain, and Ilia his daughter made a Nunne of Vesta, that thereby the issue of Numitor might be cut off. But she conceived two sons; either by her Uncle Amulius, as some thinke; or by Mars, as the Poets feign; or perhaps by some man of warre. Both the children, their Uncle commanded to be drowned, and the mother buried quick, according to the law; which so ordained, when the Vestall Virgins brake their chastitie. Whether it was so, that the mother was pardoned at the entreatie of Antho, the daughter of Amulius, or punished as the Law required (for Authors herein doe varie) it is agreed by all, that the two children were preserved, who afterward revenged the cruelty of their Uncle, with the slaughter of him and all his, and restored Numitor their grandfather to the Kingdome: wherein how long hee reigned, I find not, neither is it greatly materiall to know; for as much as the Estates of Alba and of Latium were presently eclipsed by the swift increase of Rome; upon which the computation of Time following (as farre as concerns the things of Italy) is dependant. After the death of Numitor, the Kingdome of Alba ceased; for Numitor left no male issue. Romulus chose rather to live in Rome; and of the Line of Sylvius none else remained. So the Albanes were governed by Magistrates; of whom onely two Dictators are mentioned, namely Caius Cilius, who in the dayes of Tullus Hostilius, King of the Romans, making Warre upon Rome, dyed in the Camp; and Metius Suffetius, the successor of Cilius, who surrendered the Estate of Alba unto the Romans, having committed the hazzard of both Signories to the successe of three men of each side, who decided the quartell by Combat: in which, the three brethren Horatii, the Champions of the Romans, prevailed against the Curatii, Champions of the Albanes. After this Combat, when Metius (following Tullus Hostilius with the Albane forces against the Veientes and Fidenates) withdrew his Companies out of the battail, hoping thereby to leave the Romans to such an overthrow, as might make them weak enough for the Albanes to deal with; Tullus, who notwithstanding this falsehood, obtained the victory, did reward Metius with a cruell death, causing him to be tyed to two Chariots, and so torne in pieces. Then was Alba destroyed, and the Citizens carried to Rome, where they were made free Denizens; the noble Families being made Patricians; among which were the Fulii: of whom C. Julius Caesar being descended, not only gloried in his ancient, royall, and forgotten pedigree, in full assembly of the Romans, then governed by a free Estate of the People; but by his rare industrie, valour, and judgement, obtained the Sovereignty of the Roman Empire (much by him enlarged) to himselfe and his posterity: whereby the name of Aeneas, and honour of the Troian and Alban Race, was so revived, that feldome, if ever, any one Family hath attained to a proportionable height of glory.

§. V.

Of the beginning of Rome, and of Romulus birth and death.

OF Rome, which devoured the Alban Kingdome, I may here best shew the beginnings, which (though somewhat uncertain) depend much upon the birth and education of Romulus, the grand-child of Numitor, the last that reigned in Alba. For how not onely the bordering people, but all Nations between Euphrates and the Ocean, were broken in pieces by the yron teeth of this fourth Beast, it is not to be described in one place, having been the worke of many Ages; whereof I now doe handle onely the first, as incident unto the discourse preceding. Q. Fabius Pictor, Por-

so the fifteenth yeere of Abaz may have been concurrent, for the most part, with the first of Ezechia.

By supposing that Hisea began his Kingdome, when the twelfth yeere of Abaz was almost compleat, some would find the meanes how to disjoine the first of Ezechia from the fifteenth of Abaz, placing him yet one year later, of which yeere, Abaz may perhaps have lived not many dayes. But seeing that the fourteenth and fifteenth yeeres of Ezechia may not be removed out of their places, it is vaine labour to alter the first yeere.

1 King 19. 35. In the fourteenth yeere of Ezechia, Senacherib, invading Juda and the Countreys adjoining, lost his Armie by a miraculous stroak from Heaven, fled home, and was slaine. The yeere following it was that God added fifteene yeeres to the life of Ezechia, when hee had already reigned fourteen of his nine and twenty: and the same yeere was that miracle scene of the Sunnes going back, of which wonder (as I heare) one Bertholomew Scultet, who is much commended for skill in Astronomie, hath by calculation found the very day, which answered unto the twenty fift of April, in the Julian year, being then Thursday. I have not scene any workes of Scultet, but surely to find a motion so irregular and miraculous, it is necessary that he produce some record of observation made at such a time. Howsoever it be, the fifteenth yeere of Ezechia agreed upon, and therefore we may not alter the first. As for that saying, which is uttall in like cases, that Ahaz slept with his Fathers, & Ezechia his Sonne reigned in his stead, it doth no more prove that Ezechia reigned not with his Father, than the like saying doth inferre the like at the death of Jehosaphat, and succession of Jehoram; whereof, as concerning the beginning of the Sonne to reign whilst his Father lived, wee have already said enough.

Of this godly King Ezechias, we find, that his very beginning testified his devotion and zeale. For whether it were so, that his unfortunate and ungracious Father (who had out-worne his reputation) gave way to his Sons proceedings, which perhaps it lay not in him to hinder, or whether (as I rather thinke) the first yeere and first moneth of his reign, wherein Ezechias opened the doores of the Temple, were to be understood as the beginning of his sole government, wee plainly find it to have been his first work, that hee opened the doores of the house of the Lord, which Ahaz had shut up, cleansed the Citie and Kingdome of the Idols, restored the Priests to their offices & estates, commanded the Sacrifices to be offered which had bin for many yeeres neglected, & brake down the brasen Serpent of Moses, because the people burnt incense before it, & hee called it Nebushtan, which signifieth a lump of brasse. He did also celebrate the Pass-over with great magnificence, inviting thereunto the Israelites of the ten Tribes. Many there were, even out of those Tribes, that came up to Jerusalem, to this feast: But the generall multitude of Israel did laugh the Messengers of Ezechia to scorn.

It was not long ere they that scorned to solemnize the memoriall of their deliverance out of the Egyptian servitude, fell into a new servitude, out of which they never were delivered. For in the fourth of Ezechia his reign, Salmanassar the Son of Tiglath the Son of Belochus, hearing that Hisea King of Israel had practised with So King of Egypt, against him, invaded Israel, besieged Samaria, and in the third year (after the inhabitants had endured all sorts of miseries) forced it, and carried thence the ten Idolatrous Tribes into Assyria and Media: among whom Tobias, and his Son of the same name, with Anna his Wife, were sent to Nineve, in whose Seates and Places the Assyrians sent strangers of other Nations, and among them many of the ancient Enemies of the Israelites, as those of Cutha, Ana, Hamah, and Sphernaim, besides Babylonians: whose Places and Nations I have formerly described in the Treatise of the Holy Land.

These later Assyrian Kings, and the Persians, which followed them, are the first of whom wee find mention made both in Prophane and Sacred bookes. These therefore serve most aptly to joine the times of the old World, (whereof none but the Prophets have written otherwise than fabulously) with the Ages following that were better known, and described in course of History. True it is, that of Cyrus and some other Persians, we find in the Bible the same names by which other Authors have recorded them: but of Ebul & Salmanassar, with other Assyrian, Chaldean Kings, diversity of names hath bred question of the persons. Therefore, whereas the Scriptures doe speak of Salmanassar King of Assyria, who reigned in the time of Abaz and Ezechia, Kings of Juda, & of Hisea King of Israel, whom hee carried into captivity: and whereas Ptolomy makes mention mention of Nabonassar, speaking precisely of the time wherein he lived, it is very pertinent to shew, that Salmanassar and Nabonassar were one, and the same man. The like reason also requirerh, that it be shewed of Nabuchadnezzar that he was the same, whom Ptolomy calleth Nabopolassar.

Of both these points Bucholernus hath well collected sufficient proofs from the exact calculations of sundry good Mathematicians. For by them it appears, that between Nabonassar and the birth of Christ, there passed seven hundred forty and six years: at which distance of time the reign of Salmanassar was. One great proofe heretofore is this, which the same Bucholernus allegeth out of Erasmus Reinholdus, in the Reutemick Tables. Mardocempadus King of Babylon (whom Ptolomy, speaking of three Eclipses of the Moon, which were in his time, doth mention) was the same whom the Scriptures call Merodach, who sent Embassadors to Ahasdratha King of Juda. So that if we reckon backward to the difference of time between Merodach and Salmanassar, wee shall find it the same which is between Mardocempadus and Nabonassar. Likewise Fancius doth shew, that whereas from the destruction of Samaria, to the destruction of Jerusalem, in the nineteenth of Nabuchadnezzar, we collect out of the Scriptures, the distance of one hundred thirty and three years, the selfe same distance of time is found in Ptolomy, between Nabonassar and Nabopolassar. For whereas Ptolomy seems to differ from this account, making Nabonassar more ancient by an hundred and forty years, than the destruction of Jerusalem, wee are to understand that he reckons Samaria in the eighth year of his reign; so that the seven foregoing years added to these one hundred thirty and three, make the accounts of the Scriptures fall even with that of Ptolomy. Ptolomies computation is, that from the first of Nabonassar, to the fifth of Nabopolassar, there passed one hundred twenty and seven years. Now if wee add to these one hundred twenty seven, the thirteen ensuing of Nabuchadnezzars years, before the City and Temple were destroyed, wee have the summe of one hundred and forty years. In so plain & easie more proofes are needlesse, though many are brought, of which this may serve for all, that Ptolomy placeth the first of Nabopolassar one hundred twenty and two years after the first of Nabonassar, which agreeth exactly with the Scriptures. To these notes are added the consent of all Mathematicians, which in account of times I hold more sure than the authority of any History; and therefore I think it folly to make doubt, whereas Historians and Mathematicall observations doe so thoroughly concur.

Yet forasmuch as that argument of the learned Scaliger doth rest unanswered, whereby hee proved Baladan the Father of Merodach, to have been this Nabonassar, I will not spare to lose a word or two in giving the Reader satisfaction herein. It is true, that the next observations of the heavenly Bodies, which Ptolomy recorded, after the time of Nabonassar, were in the reign of Mardocempadus, the second year of whose reign, is according to Ptolomy, concurrent in part with the twenty seven of Nabonassar. For the second of three ancient Eclipses which hee calculates, being in the second year of Mardocempadus, was from the beginning of Nabonassar twenty seven years, seventeen dayes, and eleven hours; the account from Nabonassar, beginning at high-noon the first day of the Egyptian Month Thot, then answering to the twenty six of February; and this Eclipse being fifty minutes before mid-night, on the eighteenth day of that Month, when the first day thereof agreed with the nineteenth of February, so that the difference of time between the two Kings Nabonassar and Mardocempadus, is noted by Ptolomy, according to the Egyptian years. But how doth this prove, that Mardocempadus or Merodach, was the Sonne of Nabonassar? A yea, how doth it prove, that he was his next Successour, or any way of his Linage? It was enough to satisfie me, in this argument, that Scaliger himselfe did afterwards believe Mardocempadus to have been rather the Nephew than the Sonne of Baladan, or Nabonassar. For if hee might be either the Nephew, or the Sonne, hee might perhaps be neither the one, nor the other. But because our Countreymen Lidys hath reprehended Scaliger for changing his opinion, and that both Tornellus, who followes Scaliger herein, and Sehus Calvisius, who hath drawn into form of Chronology, that learned work, De Emendatione Temporum, doe hold up the same assertion, confounding Baladan with Nabonassar, I have taken the pains to search, as farre as my leisure and diligence could reach, after any sentence that might prove the kindred or Succession of these two: Yet cannot I find in the Almagest (for the Scriptures are either silent in this point, or adverse to Scalliger; and other good authoritie, I know none, in this business) any sentence necessarily proving the succession of Merodach to Nabonassar, that the place now last referred: which makes no more, to shew that the one of these was father to the other, than (that I may use a like example) the as neer succession of William the Conqueror, declares him, to have bin Son, or Grand-child to Edward the Confessor. This considered, we may safely go on with our account from Nabonassar, taking him for Salmanassar, and not fearing, that the Readers will be driven from our Book, when they find something in agreeing with Ammius, forasmuch as these Kings mentioned in Scriptures, reigned in Babylon and Assyria, in those very times which by Diodorus and Ptolemy are assigned to Babylus, Nabonassar, and Mardecampadus, and the rest: no good Historie naming any others that reigned there in those ages; and all Astronomical observations, fitly concurring with the years that are attributed to these, or numbred from them.

§. II.

Of the danger and deliverance of Judæa from Senacherib.

When Salmanassar was dead; and his son Senacherib in possession of the Empire, in the fourteenth year of Ezechias, he demanded of him such Tribute as was agreed on, at such time as Tiglath, the Grand-father of Senacherib, and Father of Salmanassar, invited by Ahaz, invaded Rezin King of Damascus, and delivered him from the dangerous Warre which Israel had undertaken against him. This Tribute and acknowledgement when Ezechias denied, Senacherib, having (as it seems) a purpose to invade Egypt, sent one part of his Armie to lye before Jerusalem. Now though Ezechias (fearing this powerfull Prince) had acknowledged his fault, and purchased his peace, as he hoped, with thirty hundred talents of silver, and thirty talents of gold; wherewith he presented Senacherib, now set down before Lachis in Judæa; yet under the colour of better assurance, and to force the King of Judæa to deliver hostages, the Assyrian invironed Jerusalem with a grosse Armie, and having his sword in his hand, thought it the fittest time to write his own conditions.

Ezechias directed his three great Counsellors, to parly with Rabshaces over the Wall, and to receive his demands: who used three principall arguments to perswade the people to yeeld themselves to his Master Senacherib. For though the Chancellour, Steward, and Secretarie, sent by Ezechias, desired Rabshaces to speak unto them in the Syrian tongue, and not in the Jewish, yet he with a louder voice directed his speech to the multitude in their own language. And for the first, he made them know, That if they continued obstinate, and adhered to their King, that they would in a short time be inforced to eat their own dung, and drink their own urine: Secondly, hee altogether disabled the King of Egypt, from whom the Judaans hoped for succour; and compared him to a broken staffe, on which whosoever leaneth, pierceth his own hand: Thirdly, that the gods who should help them, Ezechias had formerly broken and defaced, meaning chiefly (as it is thought by some) the brasen Serpent, which had been preserved ever since Moses time: and withall hee bade them remember the gods of other Nations, whom, notwithstanding any power of theirs, his Master had conquered and thrown down; and for God himselfe, in whom they trusted, hee perswaded them by no means to rely upon him, for hee would deceive them. But finding the people silent (for so the King had commanded them) after a while, when he had understood that the King of Arabia was marching on with a powerfull Armie, hee himselfe left the Assyrian forces in charge to others, and sought Senacherib at Libna in Judæa, either to inform him of their resolution in Jerusalem, or to conferre with him concerning the Armie of Tarhaca the Arabian. Soon upon this there came letters from Senacherib to Ezechias, whom he partly advised, and partly threatned to submit himself, using the same blasphemous outrage against the all-powerfull God, as before. But Ezechias sending those Counsellors to the Prophet Esay, which had lately been sent to Rabshaces, received from him comfort, and assurance, that this heathen Idolater should not prevaile; against whom the King also besought aide from Almighty God, repeating the most insolent and blasphemous parts of *Senacherib*s letter, before the Altar of God in the Temple, confessing this part thereof to be true, That the King of Assur had destroyed the Nations and their Lands, and had set fire on their gods, for they were no gods, but the work of mans hands, even wood and stone, &c.

The reason that moved Senacherib to desire to possess himself in haste of Jerusalem, was, that he might therinto have retrained his Armie, which was departed as it seemeth from the siege of Pelusium in Egypt, for fear of Tarhaca: and though the Scriptures are silent of that enterprize (which in these books of the Kings, and of the Chronicles or Paralipomenon, speak but of the affairs of the Jews in effect) yet the ancient Berosus, and out of him Iosephus, and Saint Hieron, together with Herodotus, remember it as followeth. Herodotus calleth Senacherib King of Arabia and Assyria: which he might justly doe, because Tiglath his Grand-father held a great part thereof, which he wrested from Pekah King of Israel: as Gilead over Jordan, and the rest of Arabia Petrea adjoining: the same Herodotus also maketh Seton King of Egypt, to be Paleans Priest; and reporteth that the reason of *Senacherib*s return from Pelusium in Egypt, which he also besieged, was, that an innumerable multitude of Rats had in one night eaten in sunder the Bow-strings of his Archers, and spoyle the rest of their weapons in that kind, which no doubt might greatly amaze him: but the approach of Tarhaca, remembered by Iosephus and Berosus, was the more urgent. Saint Hieron upon the seven and thirtieth of Esay, out of the same Berosus, as also in part out of Herodotus, whom Iosephus citeth somewhat otherwise than his words lye, reports *Senacherib*s retreat in these words. *Pugnasse autem Senacherib Regem Assyriam contra Aegyptum, & obsidisse Pelusium, jamque extructis aggeribus urbi capiende, venisse Taracham Regem Aethiopum in auxilium, & una nocte juxta Jerusalem, centum octoginta quinque millia exercitus Assyrii pestilentia corripisse, narrat Herodotus: & plenissime Berosus: huiusmodi sedipior Historia, quorum fides de propriis libris petenda est, That Senacherib King of the Assyrians fought against the Egyptians, and besieged Pelusium, and that when his Moats were built for taking of the Citie, Tarhaca King of the Ethiopians came to help them, and that in one night, near Jerusalem, one hundred eighty five thousand of the Assyrian Armie perished by pestilence, of these things (saith Hieron) * Herodotus reports: and more at large Berosus a writer of the Chaldaean storie, whose credit is to be taken from their own books. Out of Esay it is gathered, that this destruction of the Assyrian Armie was in this manner: Thou shalt be visited of the Lord of Hosts with thunder and shakings, and a great noise, a whirlwind and a tempest, and a flame of devouring fire. But Iosephus hath it more largely out of the same Berosus, an authoritie (because so well agreeing with the Scriptures) not to be omitted, Senacheribus autem ab Aegyptiaco bello revertens, offendit ibi exercitum Jo. ant. l. 10. c. 1 quem sub Rabshaces imperio reliquerat peste divinitus immixta delectum, primâ nocte postea quam Urbem oppugnare ceperat, absumptis cum Ducibus & Tribunis centum octoginta quinque millibus Militum; qua clade territus; & de reliquis copiis sollicitus, maximis numeribus in regnum suum contendit, ad regiam qua Ninus dicitur. Ubi paulo post per insidias Seniorum & filiorum suis, Adramelech, & Sennari, vitam amisit: occisus in ipso Templo quod dicitur Arasce, quem precipuo cultu dignabatur, quibus ob patricidium a popularibus pulsus; & in Armeniam fugientibus, Asaracoldas minor filius in Regnum successit, Senacherib (saith Iosephus) returning from the Aegyptian War, found there his Armie, which he had left under the command of Rabshaces, destroyed by a pestilence sent from God, the first night that he had begun to assault the Town: one hundred fourscore and five thousand of the Souldiers being consumed with their Chieftains and Colonels. With which destruction being terrified, and withall affraid what might become of the rest of his Armie, he made great marches into his Kingdome, to his Royall Citie, which is called Ninus, where shortly after by the treason of two of the eldest of his Sons, Adramelech and Sennar or Sharezer, he lost his life in the Temple dedicated to Arasces, or Nesroth, whom he especially worshipped. These his Sons being for their parricide chased away by the people, and flying into Armenia, Asaracoldas his younger Son succeeded in the Kingdome. Who in the beginning of his reign sent new troops out of Assyria to Samaria, to fortifie the Colonie therein planted by his Grand-father Salmanassar. What this Nesroth was, it is uncertain: Hieron in his Hebrew traditions hath somewhat of him, but nothing positively. It is certain, that Venus Urania was worshipped by the Assyrians; and so was Jupiter Belus, as Dion, Eusebius, and Cyrrillus witness. Many fancies there are, what cause his Sons had to murder him; but the* most likely it is, that he had formerly dis-inherited those two, and conferred the Empire on Assarhaddon. Tobit tells us, that it was fiftie five days after Senacherib's return, ere he was murdered by his Sons, during which time he slew great numbers of the Israelites in Nineve, till the most just God turned the sword against his own breast.

Of Ezechias his sicknesse and recoverie; and of the Babylonian King that congratulated him.

After this marvellous deliverie, Ezechias sickned, and was told by Isaiah that he must dye: but after he had besought God with tears for his deliverie, Isaiah, as he was going from him, returned again, and had warrant from the Spirit of God to promise him recovery after three days, and a prolongation of life for fifteen years. But Ezechias somewhat doubtfull of this exceeding grace, prayeth for a sign to confirme him: whereupon, at the prayer of Isaiah, the shadow of the Sunne cast it self the contrary way, and went back ten degrees, upon the Dyall of Achaz. The cause that moved Ezechias to lament (saith Saint Hierome) was, because he had as yet no son; and then in despair that the Messias should come out of the house of David, or at least of his Seed. His disease seemeth to be the pestilence, by the medicine given him by the Prophet, to wit, a masse of Figs, layd to the Bitch or Sore.

This wonder when the Wife-men of Chaldea had told to Merodach, King of Babylon, the first of that house, he sent to Ezechias, to be informed of the cause: at which time Ezechias shewed him all the Treasure he had, both in the Court and in the Kingdome: for which he was reprehended by the Prophet Isaiah, who told him; The treasures are at hand, that all that is in thine house; and whatsoever thy Fathers have layd up in store to this day, shall be carried into Babel; nothing shall be left, saith the Lord. It may seeme strange, how Ezechias should have got any treasure worth the shewing: for Senacherib had robbed him of all, the year before. But the spoyle of the same Senacherib his Camp repayed all with advantage, and made Ezechias richer upon the sudden than ever he had been: which unexpected wealth was a strong temptation to boasting. After this time Ezechias had rest, and spending without noyse that addition which God had made unto his life, he dyed having reigned nine and twentie years: One only offensive War he made, which was against the Philistims, with good successe. Among his other acts (shortly remembred in Ecclesiasticus) he devised to bring water to Jerusalem.

In two respects they say that he offended God: the one, that he rejoyced too much at the destruction and lamentable end of his enemy; the other, that he so much gloried in his riches, as he could not forbear to shew them to strangers. But the reason which moved Ezechias (speaking humanely) to entertaine the Embassadors of Merodach in this friendly and familiar manner, was, because he came to visit him, and brought him a present, congratulating the recovery of his health; as also in that Merodach had weakened the house of Senacherib, his fearfull enemy. For Merodach, who was Commander and Lieutenant under Senacherib in Babylon, usurped that State himself, in the last year of that King, and held it by strong hand against his son Assarhaddon; who was not only simple, but impaired in strength, by the molestation of his brothers. This advantage Merodach espied, and remembering that their ancestor Phul Belochus had set his own Master Sardanapalus besides the cushion, thought it as lawfull for himself to take the opportunitie which this Kings weaknesse did offer, as it had been for Belochus to make use of the others wickednesse: and so, finding himself beloved of the Babylonians, and sufficiently powerfull, he did put the matter to hazard, and prevailed. The assertion of this historie is made by the same arguments that were used in maintaining the common opinion of Writers, touching Phul Belochus; which I will not here again rehearse. So of this new race, which cut a-sunder the Line of Ninus, there were only five Kings.

Phul

Phul Belochus	} reigned	} years.
Tiglath Philassar
Salmanassar
Senacherib
Assarhaddon

But forasmuch as the last year of Salmanassar was also the first of Senacherib his son, we reckon the time, wherein the house of Phul held the Assyrian Kingdome, to have been an hundred and one years, of which, the last five and twenty were spent with Ezechias, under Salmanassar, Senacherib, and Assarhaddon.

s. IIIL.

The Kings that were in Media during the reign of Ezechias: Of the difference found betweene sundrie Authors in rehearsing the Median Kings. Other contemporaries of Ezechias: Of Candaules, Gyges, and the Kings descended from Hercules.

In the time of Ezechias, Medius, and after him Cardiceas, reigned in Media. Whether it were so, that varietie of names, by which these Kings were called in severall Histories, hath caused them to seem more than indeed they were; or whether the sons reigning with the fathers, have caused not onely the names of Kings, but the length of Time wherein they governed Media, to exceed the due proportion; or whether the Copies themselves of Ctesias and Annius his Metasthenes, have been faulty, as neither of these two Authors is over-highly commended of trustinesse; so it is, that the names, number, and length of reign, are all very diversly reported of these Median Kings, that follow Arbaces: therefore it need not seem strange, that I reckon Medius and Cardiceas as contemporaries with Ezechias. For to reconcile so great a difference, as is found in those writers that varie from Eusebius, is more than I dare undertake. I will onely here set down the roll of Kings that reigned in Media, accordingly as sundry Authors have delivered it.

Annius his Metasthenes orders them and their reigns thus;

Arbaces	} reigned	} years.
Mandanes
Sofarmon
Articarmin
Arbaces
Artaus
Artines
Astybarus , with his son Apanda
Apanda alone
Darius with Cyrus

Diodorus Siculus following Ctesias (as perhaps Annius made his Metasthenes follow Diodore, with some little variation, that he might not seem a borrower) placeth them thus;

Arbaces	} reigned	} years.
Mandanes
Sofarmus
Articas
Arbaces
Arseus
Artines
Artabanus
Astybara , & Astages , &

the continuance of these two he doth mention.

Mercator hath laboured, with much diligence, to reconcile these Catalogues, and to make them also agree with Eusebius. But forasmuch as it seems to me an impossible matter, to attain unto the truth of these forgotten times, by conjectures founded upon Ctesias and Metasthenes, I will lay the burden upon Eusebius, who lived in an age better furnished than ours, with books of this argument. Let it therefore suffice, that these two Kings (whom I have reckoned as contemporaries with Ezekia) Medidus and Cardiceas, are found in Eusebius: for whether Cardiceas were Diodorus his Arbianes, I will not stay to search. The Kings of Media, according to Eusebius, reigned in this order.

Arbaces	28	} reigned	} years.
Sosarmus	30
Medidus	40
Cardiceas	15
Deiaces	54
Phraortes	24
Cyaxares	32
Astyages	38

These names, and this course of succession I retain; but adde unto these, Cyaxares, the son of Astyages, according to Xenophon; and sometimes follow Herodotus, in setting down the length of a Kings reign, otherwise than Eusebius hath it: of which variations I will render my reasons in due place.

The twenty nine years of Ezekia were concurrent, in part, with the rule of the four first that were chosen Governours of Athens for ten years, that is, of Charops, Asimedes, Eldicus, and Hippones. Touching the first of these I hear nothing, save that Rome was built in his first year; of which perhaps himself did not hear. Of the second and third I find only the names. The fourth made himself known by a strange example of justice, or rather of cruelty, that he shewed upon his own Daughter. For he finding that she had offended in unchastity, caused her to be lockt up with an Horse, giving to neither of them any food: so the Horse, constrained by hunger, devoured the unhappy Woman.

In Rome, the first King, and founder of that City Romulus, did reign both before, and somewhat after Ezekia.

In Lydia, Candaules the last King ruled in the same age.

This Region was first called Maonia. Lydus the son of Atys reigning in it, gave the name of Lydia, if we believe such authority as we find. This Kingdom was afterward, by the appointment of an Oracle, conferred upon Argon, who came of Alcaus the son of Hercules, by Fardana, a bond-woman. The race of these Heraclides continued reigning fifty five years (in which two and twenty Generations passed) the son continually succeeding the father. Candaules the son of Myrsus was the last of his race, who devoted so much upon the beauty of his own wife, that he could not be content to enjoy her, but would needs enforce one Gyges the son of Dasyllus to behold her naked body; and placed the unwilling man secretly in her chamber, where he might see her preparing to bedward. This was not so closely carried, but that the Queen perceived Gyges at his going forth, and understanding the matter, took it in such high disdain, that she forced him the next day to requite the Kings folly with treason. So Gyges being brought again into the same chamber by the Queen, slew Candaules, and was rewarded not only with his Wife, but with the Kingdom of Lydia. He reigned thirty eight years, beginning in the last of Ezekia, one year before the death of Romulus.

After Gyges, his son Ardis reigned nine and forty years; then Sadyattes twelve; Halyattes, fifty seven; and finally Crasus the son of Halyattes, fourteen years: who lost the Kingdom, and was taken by Cyrus of Persia.

And here by the way we may note, that as the Lydian Kings, whom Crasus his Progenitor disposed, are deduced from Hercules, so of the same Hercules there sprang many other Kings, which governed severall Countreys very long; as in Asia, the Myrians; in Greece, the Lacedemonians, Messenians, Rhodians, Corinthians and Argives; and from the Argives, the Macedonians, as likewise from the Corinthians, the Syraculans: besides many great and famous, though private Families.

But of the Heraclides that reigned in Lydia, I have not troubled my self to take notice of the time of their severall reigns: for little is found of them beside the bare names, and the folly of this last King Candaules.

CHAP. XXVI.

Of the Kings that reigned in Egypt, between the deliverance of Israel from thence, and the reign of Ezekiah in Juda, when Egypt and Juda made a league against the Assyrians.

S. I.

Thus many names of Egyptian Kings, found in Historie, are like to have belonged onely to Viceroyes. An example proving this out of William of Tyre his Historie of the Holy Warre.

He emulation and quarrels arising in these times, between the mightie Kingdomes of Egypt and Assyria, doe require our pains, in collecting the most memorable things in Egypt, and setting down briefly the state of that Countrey, which had continued long a flourishing Region, and was of great power, when it contended with Assyria for the masterie. Of Cham the son of Noah, who first planted that Countrey, and of Ostris, Orus, and other ancient Kings that reigned there, untill the Israelites were thence delivered, more hath been said already than I can stand to; though I hold it no shame to fail in such conjectures. That which I have delivered, in speaking mine opinion of the Egyptian Dynasties, must here again help me. For it may truly be affirmed, That the great number of Kings, which are said to have reigned in Egypt, were none other than Viceroyes or Stewards, such as Joseph was, and such as were the Soldans in later ages. Therefore I will not onely forbear to seek after those, whom Herodotus and Diodorus have reckoned up, from the mouths of Egyptian Priests, delivering them by number, without rehearsing their names; but will save the labour of marshalling them in order, whose names onely are found; the years of their reigns, and other circumstances proving them to have been Kings indeed, being not recorded.

But that I may not seem before hand to lay an imaginarie ground; whereupon after I may build what I list; it were not amisse, to give unto the Reader such satisfaction in this point, as apparent reason, and truth of Historie doth afford. First therefore, we ought not to believe those numbers of Generations, which the lying Priests have reckoned up, to magnifie their Antiquities. For we know, that from Abraham our Saviour Christ was removed onely forty two descents; which makes it evident, that in farre shorter time, namely before the Persian Empire, there could not have passed away twice as many successions in Egypt: especially considering, that many of these, whose continuance is expressed, having reigned longer than forty years. It follows that we should square the number of the Egyptian Kings in some even proportion; to those which did bear rule in other Countries. As for the rest whose names we find scattered here and there; any man that will take the pains to read the nineteenth book of the Holy War; written by William Archbishop of Tyre, may easily perswade himself, that it is not hard to find names enow; of such as might be thought to have reigned in Egypt, being none other than Regents or Viceroyes. Yet will I here insert, as briefly as I can, some things making to that purpose, for the pleasure and information of such as will not trouble themselves with turning over many Authors.

When Elahdech the Caliph ruled in Egypt, one Dargan, a powerfull and a subtle man, made himself Soldan, by force and cunning, chasing away Sanar an Arabian, who was Soldan before and after him. This Dargan ministred matter of quarrel to Amalrick king of Jerusalem; and sustained, with little losse, an invasion, which Amalrick made upon Egypt. Hereupon he grew so insolent and proud, that Sanar the former Soldan hoped to make his partie good against him; if he could get any forces wherewith to enter Egypt. Briefly, Briefly, Sanar sueth to Noradine, King of Damasco, for aid, who sends an Armie of his Turks, under the command of Syracon, against the Soldan Dargan. So Dargan and Sanar met, and fought: The victorie was Dargans; but he enjoyed it not: for in few dayes after, he was slain by treason, whereby Sanar did recover his Dignitie: which to establish, he slew all the kindred and friends of Dargan, that he could find in the great Citie of Cairo.

To all these doings, the Caliph Elhadach gave little regard: for he thought it little concerned him, which of them lived, and had the administration of the kingdome, whilst he might have the profit of it, and enjoy his pleasure. But new troubles presently arise, which (one would think) do neerer touch the Caliph himself. Syracon with his Turks, whom Sanar had gotten to come into Egypt, will not now be intreated there to leave him, and quietly go their way home. They seize upon the Town of Belbeis, which they fortifie, and there attend the arrivall of more companie from Damasco, for the conquest of all Egypt. The Soldan perceives their intent, and finds himself not strong enough to expell them, much lesse to repell the Turkish Armie that was likely to second them: He therefore sends Messengers to King Almarick of Jerusalem, whom with large promises he gets to bring him aid, and so drives out the Turks. Of all this trouble the great Caliph hears nothing, or not so much as should make him look to the playing of his own game.

A greater mischief ariseth, concerning the Caliph Elhadach particularly in his own Title. Syracon, Captain of the Turks that had been in Egypt, goes to the Caliph of Baldach (who was opposit to him of Egypt, each of them claiming as heir to Mahomet, that false Prophet, the Sovereigntie over all that were of the Saracen Law) and tells him the weaknesse of the Egyptian, with his own abilitie of doing service in those parts, offering his best means for the extirpation of the Schismaticall Caliph, and the reduction of all Egypt, with the Western parts, under the subjection of the Babylonian. This motion is readily and joyfully entertained; all the Eastern Provinces are up in Arms, and Syracon, with a mighty power, descendeth into Egypt. The noyse of this great expedition so affrighteth King Almarick, that with all his forces he hasteth into Egypt, well knowing how neerly it concerned him and his Kingdome of Jerusalem, to keep the Saracens from joyning all under one head. Sanar the Soldan perceiving the faithfull care of the Christians his friends, welcomes them, and bestirs himselfe in giving them all manner of content, as it behoved him: for by their admirable valour, he finally drave the enemies out of the Countrey. But this victory was not so soon gotten, as it is quickly told.

Strange it is (which most concerns our present purpose) that of so desperate a danger, the Caliph, as yet, seems to know nothing. May we not think him to have been King in title onely, who meddled so little in the Government? The Soldan, finding that the Christians (without whose help all was lost) could not well stay so long as his necessities required, makes large offers to King Almarick, upon condition that he should abide by it. He promiseth a great Tribute. (William of Tyre calls it a Tribute; the Saracens, perhaps, called it a Pension) which the Kings of Jerusalem should receive out of Egypt, for this behovefull assistance. But the Christians understanding that the Soldan (how much soever he took upon him) was subject to a higher Lord, would make no bargain of such importance with any other than the Caliph himself. Hereupon Hugh Earl of Cesarea, and a Knight of the Templers, are sent unto Elhadach to ratifie the covenants. Now shall we see the greatnesse of the Caliph and his estate.

Their Embassadors were conveyed by the Soldan to Cairo, where arriving at the Palace, they found it guarded by great troupes of Souldiers. The first entrance was through dark Porches, that were kept by many armed bands of *Ethiopian*s, which with all diligence did reverence to the Soldan as he passed along. Through these streights the Warders led them into goodly open Courts, of such beaurie and riches, that they could not retain the gravitie of Embassadors, but were enforced to admire the things which detained their eyes. For there they saw goodly Marble Pillars, gilded Beams, all wrought over with embossed workes, curious pavements, fish-ponds of Marble with clear waters, and many sorts of strange birds, unknown in those parts of the World, as coming perhaps from the East Indies, which then was undiscovered. The further they went, the greater was the magnificence; for the Caliph his Eunuches conveyed them into other other Courts within these, as far excelling the former, as the former did surpass ordinary houses. It were tedious perhaps to rehearse how the further they entered, the more high state they found, and cause of marvaile; suffice it, that the good Archbishop, who wrote these things, was never held a vain Author. Finally they were brought into the *Caliph*s own lodgings, which were yet more stately and better guarded; where entering the Presence, the Soldan having twice prostrated himself, did the third time cast off his Sword that he wore about his neck, and throw himself on the ground before the curtain; behind which the Caliph sat. Presently the traverse wrought with Gold and Pearls was opened; and the Caliph himself discovered, sitting with great majesty on a throne of gold, having few of his most inward servants and Eunuches about him. When the Soldan had humbly kissed his Masters feet, he briefly told the cause of his coming, the danger wherein the land stood, and the offers that he made unto King Almarick, desiring the Caliph himself to ratifie them in presence of the Embassadors. The Caliph answered, That he would thoroughly perform all which was promised. But this contented not the Embassadors: They would have him to give his hand upon the bargain; which the Egyptians that stood by thought an impudent request. Yet his greatnesse condescended at length, after much deliberation, at the earnest request of the Soldan, to reach out his hand. When the Earl of Casaria saw that the Caliph gave his hand neither willingly nor bare, he told him roundly thus much in effect: Sir, Truth seeks no holes to hide it self; Princes that will hold covenant, must deal openly, nakedly and sincerely; Give us therefore your bare hand, if you mean that we shall trust you, for we will make no bargain with your Glove. Much ado there was about this: for it seemed against the Majesty of such a Prince to yeeld so far. But when it would none otherwise be, with a smiling chear (though to the great grief of his Servants) he vouchsafed to let the Earl take him by the bare hand; and so rehearsing the covenants word by word, as the Earl spake them, he ratified all, dismissing finally the Embassadors with such rewards as testified his greatnesse.

In this Caliph and his Sultan, we may discern the Image of the ancient Pharaoh, and his Viceroy: we see a Prince of great estate, sitting in his Palace, and not vexing himself with the great preparations made against him, which terrifie his neighbour Countries: we see his Viceroy, in the mean season, using all Royall power, making War and Peace, entertaining and repelling Armies of strangers; yea, making the Land of Egypt tributary to a forraign Prince. What greater authority was given to Joseph, when Pharaoh said unto him, Thou shalt be over mine house, and at thy word shall all my people be armed, only in the Kings throne will I be above thee. Behold I have set thee over all the Land of Egypt?

I doe not commend this forme of Government; neither can I approve the conjecture of mine Author, where he thinks, that the Egyptians, ever since *Joseph*s time, have felt the burden of that servitude which he brought upon them, when he bought them and their Lands for Pharaoh. Herein I find his judgement good; that he affirms this manner of the Egyptian Kings in taking their ease, and ruling by a Viceroy, to be part of the ancient customs practised by the Pharaohs. For we find, that even the Ptolomies (excepting Ptolomeus Lagi, and his son Philadelphus, founder and establisher of that race) were given, all of them wholly, to please their own appetites, leaving the charge of the Kingdome to Women, Eunuches, and other Ministers of their desires. The pleasures which that Country afforded, were indeed sufficient to invite the Kings thereof unto a voluptuous life; and the awfull regard wherein the Egyptians held their Princes, gave them security, whereby they might the better trust their Officers with so ample commission. But of this matter, I will not stand longer to dispute. It is enough to have shewed, that the great and almost absolute power of the Viceroys governing Egypt, is set down by Moses, and that a lively example of the same is found in William of Tyre, who lived in the same age, was in few years after Chancellour of the Kingdome of Jerusalem, and had full discourse with Hugh Earl of Casaria touching all these matters. Wherefore it remains, that we be not carried away with a vain opinion, to believe that all they were Kings, whom reports of the fabulous Egyptians have honoured with that stile; but rest contented with a Catalogue of such, as we find by circumstance, likely to have reigned in that Country; after whom it follows that we should make inquiry.

of Acherres; whether he were Uchoreus that was the eighth from Osymandyas. of Osymandyas and his Tombe.

IN this businesse I hold it vain to be too curious. For who can hope to attain to the perfect knowledge of the truth, when as Diodorus varies from Herodotus, Eusebius from both of them; and late Writers that have sought to gather the truth out of these and others, find no one with whom they can agree? In this case Ammon would doe good service, if a man could trust him. But it is enough to be beholding to him, when others doe either say nothing, or that which may justly be suspected. I will therefore hold my self contented with the pleasure that he hath done me, in saying somewhat of Osiris, Isis, Orus, and those antiquities removed so far out of sight: as for the Kings following the departure of Israel out of Egypt, it shall suffice that Herodotus, Diodorus, and Eusebius have not been silent, and that Reineccius hath taken pains to range into some good order the names that are extant in these, or else found scattering in others.

From the departure of Israel out of Egypt, unto the reign of Thuturis (who is generally taken to be the same that the Greeks call Proteus) there is little or no disagreement about the Egyptian Kings. Wherefore I set down the same which are found in Eusebius, and give to every one the same length of reign.

Acherres was the first of these, who succeeded unto Chenres, that perished in the Red Sea. This King seems to Reineccius to be the same whom Diodorus calls Uchoreus, the founder of Memphis. But whereas mention is found in Diodorus of a great King, named Osymandyas, from whom Uchoreus is said to be the eighth; it will either hardly follow, that Timaeus (as Reineccius conjectures) was the great Osymandyas, or else that this Acherres was Uchoreus: for the distance between them was more than eight generations. Marciator judgeth osymandyas to have bin the husband of Ancheres, Orus the seconds daughter, thinking that Manethon (cited by Josephus) doth omit his name, and insert his wives into the Catalogue of Kings, because he was King in his wives right. As for Uchoreus, it troubles not Mercator to find him the eighth from this man: for he takes Ogdons, not to signifie in this place of Diodore (as that Greek word else doth) the eighth, but to be an Egyptian name, belonging also to Uchoreus, who might have had two names, as many of the rest had. I will not vex my brains in the unprofitable search of this, and the like inextricable doubts. All that Diodore hath found of this Osymandyas, was wrought upon his monument; the most thereof in figures, which I think the Egyptians did fabulously expound. For whereas there was portrayed a great Army, with the siege of a Town, the captivity of the people, and the triumph of the Conqueror; all this, the Egyptians said to denote the conquest of Bactria made by that King: which how likely it was, let others judge. I hold this goodly piece of work, which Diodore so particularly describes, to have been erected for a common place of buriall to the ancient Kings and Queens of Egypt, and to their Viceroyes; whilst yet they were not so ambitious, as every one to have his own particular monument, striving therein to exceed all others. This appears by the many statues therein placed, by the Wars, the judgement seat, the receiving of Tribute, the offering sacrifice to God, the account of revenues, & plenty of all cattell and food; all which were there curiously wrought, shewing the severall Offices of a Governour. On the Tomb of Osymandyas was this inscription. I am Osymandyas King of Kings; if any desire to know what I am, or where I lye, let him exceed some of my works. Let them that hope to exceed his works, labour to know what he was. But since by those words, Or where I lye, it should seem that he lay not there interred, we may lawfully suspect that it was Joseph, whose body was preserved among the Hebrews, to be buried in the land of Canaan, and this empty Monument might King Orus, who outlived him, erect in honor of his high deserts, among the royall sepulchres. To which purpose the plenty of Cattell, & all manner of viands, had good reference. The name of Osymandyas doth not hinder this conjecture; seeing Joseph had one new name given to him by Pharaoh, for expounding the dream, and might, upon further occasions, have another, to his increase of honour. As for that stile, King of Kings, it was perhaps no more than Beglerberg, as the Turkish Bassas are called, that is, Great above the Great.

Now

Now although it be so, that the reckoning falls out right, between the times of Joseph and Acherres (for Acherres was the eighth in order, that reigned after the great Orus, whose Viceroy Joseph was) yet will I hereby seek, neither to fortifie mine own conjecture, as touching Joseph, nor to infer any likelihood of Acherres his being Uchoreus. For it might well be, that Memphis was built by some such King as was Geboar, Lieutenant John Leo. Hist. Afric. l. 1. c. 18. unto the Caliph Elcain; who having to his Masters use conquered Egypt, and many other Countries, did build, not far from old Memphis, the great Citie of Cairo (corruptly so pronounced) naming it El Gahira, that is, an enforcing, or an imperious Mistressse, though he himself were a Dalmatian slave.

of Cherres, Armeus, Rameffes, and Amenophis. Of Myris, and the Lake that bears his name.

WHEN Acherres had reigned eight years, Cherres succeeded and held the kingdom fifteen years: then reigned Armeus five years, and after him Rameffes threescore and eight. Of Armeus and Rameffes is that Historie understood by Eusebius, which is common among the Greeks, under the names of Danans and Egyptus. For it is said that Danans, being expelled out of Egypt by his brother, fled into Greece, where he obtained the Kingdom of Argos: that he had fifty Daughters, whom upon seeming reconciliation, he gave in marriage to his brothers fiftie sons, but commanded every one of them to kill her husband the first night; that onely Hypermetra, one of his Daughters, did save her husband Lyneus, and suffered him to escape; finally, That for this fact, all the bloody sisters, when they dyed, were enjoyned this foolish punishment in Hell, to fill a leaking vessell with water.

The reign of Danans in Argos was indeed in this age; but that Armeus was Danans, and Rameffes, Egyptus, is more than Reineccius believes: he rather takes Armeus to have been Myris, or Meris, who caused the great lake to be made which bears his name. For my own part, as I can easily believe, that he which fled out of Egypt into Greece, was a man of such qualitie as the Soldan Sanar, of whom we spake before, so do I not find how in so short a reign, as five years, a work of that labour could be finished, which was requir'd unto the Lake of Myris, and the Monuments therein; whereof his own Sepulchre and his wives being some part, it is manifest that he was not buried in Argos. Wherefore of Myris, and of all other Kings, whose age is uncertain, and of whose reigns we have no assurance, I may truly say, that their great works are not enough to prove them of the house of Pharaoh, seeing that greater deeds or more absolute, than were those of Joseph, who bought all the people of Egypt as bondmen, and all their land for bread; of Geboar, who founded Cairo; and of Sanar, who made the Countrey Tributarie; were performed by none of them.

It shall therefore be enough to set down the length of their reigns whom we find to have followed one another in order of succession: but in rehearsing the great acts which were performed, I will not stand to examine, whether they that did them were Kings or no.

The Lake of Myris, is, by the report of Diodore and Herodotus, three thousand six hundred furlongs in compasse, and fifty fadomes deep. It served to receive the waters of Nilus, when the overflow, being too great, was harmful to the Countrey: and to supply the defect, by letting out the waters of the lake, when the river did not rise high enough. In opening the sluices of this lake, for the letting in or out of waters, were spent fiftie talents; but the lake it self defraied that cost, seeing the tribute imposed upon fish taken therein was every day one talent, which Myris gave to his Wife to buy sweet oynments and other ornaments for her body. In the midst of it was left an Island, wherein were the Sepulchres of Myris and his Wife, and over each of them a Pyramid, that was a furlong, or (according to Herodotus) fiftie paces high; having on the tops their statues, sitting in Thrones. I find not the description of this Lake in Maps, answerable to the report of Historians: yet it is very great. The years of Armeus are by Manethon divided; by inserting one Armesis (whom Eusebius omits) that should have reigned one year and odd months of the time: but I hold not this difference worthy of examination.

After

After Rameses, his son Amenophis held the Kingdom forty years. Some give him only nineteen years; and Mencator thinks him to have been the King that was drowned in the Red Sea: whereof I have already spoken in the first Book.

§. IV.

Of the Kings that reigned in the Dynastie of the Larthes.

S Etholis, or Zethus, reigned after his Father Amenophis, five years. To him are ascribed the famous acts of that ancient Sesoftris. But the state of the world was not such at these times, that so great an expedition as the old Sesoftris made, could have been either easily performed, or forgotten in the Countries through which he passed, had it now been performed, as any man will perceive, if he look upon my Chronological Table, and consider who lived with this Zethus. With this King began the Dynastie of the Larthes, which Reineccius conjectures to have had the same signification, wherein the old Kings of Hetruria were called Lartes, (the Hetrurians being issued out of Lydia, the Lydians out of Egypt) and to have signified as much as Imperator or General. The wars in which these Kings were Generals, I take to have been against the *Ethiopian*s, for sure I am, that they troubled not the Countie of Palastina, that lay next unto them on the one hand; nor is it likely that they travelled over the desert lands, to seek matter of conquest, in the poor Countie of Africa. But on the other hand, to seek matter of conquest, in the poor Countie of Africa, and these Generals (if the Larthes were such) were not many. Five only had that title, and the last of these took it, perhaps, as hereditary from the first, in such sort as the Roman Emperours were proud, for a while, to be called Antonini, till the most unfavourable conditions of Heliogabalus, made his successors forbear the name.

Here it may be objected, that the Dynasties (as appears by this particular) took name from the Kings, that the Kings also did administer the government themselves, and that therefore I am deceived in ascribing so much unto the Viceroyes. But it is to be considered, that what is said of these Larthes, depends only upon conjecture, and that the authority of the Regents, or Viceroyes, might be great enough, though some few Kings took the conduct of Armies into their own hands. For so we find in John Leo, that the Soldan of Egypt (after such time as the Soldan Saladine, murdering the Caliph, got the Sovereignty to himself) had under him a Viceroy, styled Eddagadare, who had authority to place, or displace, any Magistrates, or Officers; and that this mans Familie was almost as great as the Soldans own. Yet was there also the Amir Cabir, or Lord General of the Soldans forces, who had the charge of defending the Land, and might, as he thought good, spend of the Soldans treasure. So might the office of the Viceroyes continue, though the Kings themselves, taking the charge, or title of Generals upon them, did somewhat abridge the greatnesse of that second place. As for the names of the Dynasties, it skills not whence they were drawn; whether from their Countrey, as those of the Thebans and Diopolitans; or from some eminent men, or man, who ruled in that time; as many think, that the seventeenth Dynastie was called of the Shepherds, because Joseph governed in part thereof; or from the Kings themselves that reigned; as this was said to be of the Larthes or Generals. The next, as Manetho (but Annius his Manetha) hath it, was without any Larthes or Generals, yet was it not without Kings, forasmuch as Vaphres, and Sefac, reigned therein, if many others did not. But let us now return to the business which we left.

Rameses was King after Zethus, or Sethosis, threescore and six years. He is mistaken for that second Sesoftris, of whom I have spoken in the first book. I find nothing worth rehearse of this Rameses, or of Amenophis and Annemenes, that followed him in order, the former of which reigned forty, the latter six and twenty years. Wherefore it may very well be, that the name which Zethus had from valour, was taken by these as hereditary.

Thucoris, the last of the Larthes, reigned only seven years; yet is he thought to have bin that Proteus, of whom Herodotus hath mention, saying, That he took Helen from Paris, and after the sack of Troy, restored her to Menelaus. I need say no more in refutation of this, than that the time of Thucoris his reign lasted not so long as from the Rape of Helen to her restitution.

This

This Proteus or Cetes (as he is named by some) together with Thon, and others, mentioned by Greek Writers in this business, or in other such matters, may seem to be under-Officers: for such only are like to have had their residence about Pharos, and the sea-coast where Menelaus arrived.

Of Proteus, who detained Helen, it is said that he could foretell things to come, and that he could change himself into all shapes: whereby is signified, his crafty head, for which he is grown into a Proverb. The Poets feigned him a Sea-God, and keeper of Nephtunes Seal-fishes, for belike he was some under-Officer to the Admirall, having charge of the Fishing about the Isle of Pharos, as was said before.

Rameses the son of Proteus is reckoned the next King, by Diodore, as also by Herodotus, who calls him Ramsinitus, and tells a long tale fit to please children, of his covetousness, and how his treasure-house was robbed by a cunning thief, that at last married his Daughter. But of this a man may believe what he list. How long this King reigned I know not, nor think that either he or his father did reign at all.

§. V.

Of the Egyptian Kings, whose names are found scattering in sundry Authors, their times being not recorded. The Kings of Egypt, according to Cedrenus, of Vaphres, and Sefac.

M Any other names of Egyptian Kings are found scattered here and there, as Tompephobis, of whom Suidas delivers onely the bare name and title; Senemures, or Senepos, mentioned in Macrobius, who perhaps was the same that by Suidas is called Senyes, or Euenes, noted by occasion of a great Physician that lived under him; Bambryis, recorded by the same Suidas for his great justice; and Thulis, of whom Suidas tells great matters; as, that his Empire extended to the Ocean Sea; that he gave name to the Isle of Thule, which some take to be Iseland; and that he consulted with the Devil, or (which is all one) with Seraphis, desiring to know, who before him had been, or after him should be so mighty as himself. The answer or confession of the Devil was remarkable; which I find Englished in the translation of Plessis his work Of the trueesse of Christian Religion. The Greek Verses are somewhat otherwise, and much more imperfect in those Copies that I have of Cedrenus and Suidas, but the sense is all one; which is this:

First God, and next The Word, and then The Spirit, Which Three be One, and joyn in One all Three:
Whose force is endlesse. Get thee hence frail wight,
The man of Life unknown excelleth thee.

I should have thought that Suidas had borrowed all this of Cedrenus, had I not found somewhat more in Suidas than Cedrenus hath heretofore; as the form of invocation which Thulis used, and that clause of his giving name to the Island: though in this last point I hold Suidas to be deceived; as also Cedrenus is, or (at least) seems to me, in giving to this King such profound antiquity of reign. Indeed the very name of that book, cited often by Cedrenus, which he calls Little Genesis, is alone enough to breed suspicion of some imposture: but the frierly stuffe that he allegeth out of it, is such as would serve to discredit himself, were it not otherwise apparent that he was a man both devout, and of good judgement in matters that fell within his compass. I will here set down the list of old Egyptian Kings delivered by him, and leave the censure to others.

The first King of Egypt that he sets down, is Mizraim the son of Cham. After him he finds many of a new race, deriving their pedigree thus: Nimrod the son of Chus was also called Orion, and further took upon him the name of the Planet Saturn, had to wife Semiramis, who was of his own Linage, and by her three sons; Picus, surnamed Fupiser, Belus, and Ninus. Picus chasing his father out of Assyria into Italie, reigned in his stead thirte years, and then gave up that Kingdom to Funb his sister and wife, and to Belus his son: after which Belus, who reigned onely two years, Ninus had the Kingdom; and married his own Mother Semiramis. But Picus went into Italie to visit his old Father Saturn; Saturn forth-with reigned the Kingdom unto him. Picus Fupiser reigned in Italie threescore and two years, had threescore and ten Wives or Concubines, and about as many children: finally dyed, and lyes buried in the Isle of Crete.

The

The Principall of Jupiters sons were Faunus, Persus, and Apollo. Faunus was called by the name of the Planet Mercurie: hee reigned in Italy, after his Father, five and thirty years, and then (finding that all his brethren conspired against him) he went to Egypt, with abundance of Treasure, where, after the death of Misraim, hee got the Kingdome, and held it nine and thirty years. After Mercurie, Vulcan reigned in Egypt, four years and a half. Then Sol, the son of Vulcan, reigned twenty years and a half. There followed in order Sosis, Osiris, Orus and Thules, of whom we spake before: the length of their severall reigns is not set down. After Thules, was the great Sesoftra King twenty years. His successor was Pharaoh, called Narecho, that held the Crown fiftie years, with which there passed from him the surname of Pharaoh, to a very long posteritie.

These reports of Cedrenus I hold it enough to set down as I find them: let their credit rest upon the Author.

Others yet we find, that are said to have reigned in Egypt, without any certain note, when, or how long: about whom I will not labour, as fearing more to be reprehended of vain curiositie, in the search made after these already rehearsed, than of negligence, in omitting such as might have been added.

Vaphres, the father in law to Salomon, and Sesac, the afflicter of Rehoboam, lead us again into fair way, but not far. The name of Vaphres is not found in the Scriptures; but we are beholding to Clemens Alexandrinus and Eusebius for it. These give us not the length of his reign; but we know that he lived in the times of David and of Salomon. He came into Palestina with an Armie, took Gezar from the Canaanites, and gave it to his daughter, Salomons wife: though for her sake perhaps it was, that in time following either he, or (as I rather take it) Sesac his son did favour the enemies of Salomon, who kept to many Wives and Concubines, besides this Egyptian Princess. In the life of Rehoboam all hath been written that I find of Sesac, excepting the length of his reign, which must have been six and twenty years, if he were that Smendis with whom Eusebius begins the one and twentieth Dynastie.

Now forasmuch as it would serve to no great purpose, that we knew the length of Sesac his reign, and of theirs that followed him, unless therewithall we knew the beginning of Sesac, upon which the rest have dependance; this course I take. From the fourth year of Jebojakim king of Juda, in which Pharao Neco was slain, I reckon upwards the years of the same Neco, and of his Predecessors, unto the beginning of Sesac: by which account, the first year of Sesac is found concurrent with the twentieth of Salomons reign, and the twenty sixt of Sesac with the fifth of Rehoboam, wherein Sesac spoiled the Temple, and dyed, enjoying the fruits of his Sacrilege no longer than Fo the Israelite, and Crausus the Roman did; who after him spoiled the Temple of Jerusalem.

To fill up the time between Sesac and Neco, I have rather taken those kings that I find in the Greek Historians, than them which are in Eusebius his Catalogue. For of those that are delivered by Eusebius, we find no Name nor Act recorded elsewhere, save only of Bocchoris, who is remembered by Diodore, Plutarch, and others, much being spoken of him, that makes him appear to have been a King. Hereunto I may adde, that the succession is often interrupted in Eusebius by Ethiopians, which got the kingdome often, and held it long: whereas contrariwise it appears by the Prophet Esay, that the Counsellors of Pharaoh did vaunt of the long and flourishing continuance of that house, inasmuch that they said of Pharaoh, I am the son of the wife, I am the son of the antient King. But that which overthrows the reckoning of Eusebius, is the good agreement of it with his mistaken times of the Kings of Juda. For though it please him well to see how the reigns of Fo and Neco meet by his computation, yet this indeed mars all, the reign of Fo being misplaced. This error grows from his omitting to compare the reigns of the Kings of Juda with theirs of Israel: by which occasion Foram King of Israel, is made to reign three years after Abazja of Juda; Samarja is taken by Salmanassar before Hezechia was King: and in a word, all, or most of the Kings have their beginnings placed in some other year of their collaterals than the Scriptures have determined.

of Chemmis, Cheops, Cephrenes, and other Kings recited by Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus, which reigned between the times of Rehoboam and Ezechia.

Following therefore the Greek Historians, I place Chemmis, or (according to Diodore) Chemibis, first in the ranke of those that were Kings after Sesac. Hee reigned fiftie yeares, and built the greatest of the three Pyramides, which was accounted one of this worlds Wonders. The Pyramis hath his name from the shape, in that it resembleth a flame of fire, growing from the bottome upwards narrower and narrower to the top. This of Chemmis being foure-square, had a Base of seven acres every way, and was about six acres high. It was of a very hard and durable stone, which had lasted, when Diodore saw it, about a thousand yeares, without complaining of any injurie that it had suffered by weather in so long space. From the reign of Chemmis, unto the age of Augustus Caesar, wherein Diodore lived, are indeed a thousand yeares; which doth give the better likelihood unto this time wherein Chemmis is placed. As for this and other Pyramides, late Writers doe testifie, that they have seen them yet standing.

After Chemmis, Diodore placeth Cephrenes his brother; but doubtfully, and enclining rather to the opinion, that his son Chabrens succeeded. Herodotus hath Cheops (who might be Chabreas) and Cephrenes after him. These are said to have been brethren; but the length of their reigns may argue the latter to have been sonne to the former: for Cheops reigned fiftie yeares; Cephrenes fiftie sixe. These were, as Chemmis had been, builders of Pyramides, whereby they purchased great hatred of their people, who already had over-laboured themselves in erecting the first. These Pyramides were ordained to be Tombs for those that raised them; but the malice of the Egyptians is said to have cast out their bodies, & to have called their Monuments by the name of an Heardsman that kept his Beasts thereabouts. It may be, that the robbing them of their honour, and entitling a poore fellow to their works, was held to be the casting out of their bodies; otherwise it is hard to conceive how it might be, that they, who had not power to avoyd the like slavery laid upon them by the younger brother or sonne, should have power or leisure to take such revenge upon his Predecessor. To the like malice may be ascribed the tale devised against Cheops his Daughter; That her Father wanting money, did prostitute her, & that she getting of every man that accompanied her, one stone, did build with them a fourth Pyramis, that stood in the midst of the other three. Belike she was an insolent Lady, and made them follow their drudgery for her sake, longer a while than they thought to have done, in raising a Monument with the superfluity of her Father's provisions.

Mycerinus the son of Cephrenes reigned after his Father six yeares. He would have built as his fore-goers did, but prevented by death, finished not what he had begun. The people thought him a good King, for that he did set open the Temples, which Cheops and Cephrenes had kept shut. But an Oracle threatned him with a short life of six years only, because of this his devotion; For (said the Oracle) Egypt should have been afflicted an hundred and fiftie yeares, which thy Predecessors knew, and performed for their parts; but thou hast released it, therefore shalt thou live but six yeares. It is very strange, that the gods should be offended with a King for his piety; or that they should decree to make a Countrey impious, when the people were desirous to serve them; or that they having so decreed, it should lye in the power of a King to alter destinie, and make the ordinance of the gods to fail in taking full effect. But these were Egyptian gods. The true God was doubtlesse more offended with the institution of such Idolatry, than with the interruption. And who knowes whether Chemmis did not learn somewhat at Jerusalem in the last year of his Father Sesac, that made him perceive, and deliver to those that followed him, the vanity of his Egyptian superstition? Most sure it is, that his reign, and the reigns of Cheops and Cephrenes were more long and more happy than that of Mycerinus, who, to delude the Oracle, revelled away both dayes and nights, as if by keeping candles lighted, he had changed his nights into dayes, and so doubled the time appointed: a service more pleasing to the Devil, than the restitution of Idolatry durst then seem, when it could speed no better. I find in Reineccius fiftie years assigned to this King; which I verily beleieve to have bin some errour of the print, though I find it not corrected among other such oversights: For I know no Author that gives him so many years, and Reineccius himself takes notice of the Oracle, that threatened Mycerinus with a short life, as is before shewed.

Bocchorus is placed next unto Mycerinus, by Diodore, who speaks no more of him than this, that he was a strong man of body, & excelling his predecessors in wit. He is spoken of by divers Authors, as one that loved justice; and may be taken for that Banchis whom Strabo commends in that kind: Eusebius reckons 44. years of his reign.

After Bocchorus, one Sabacus an Ethiopian follows in the Catalogue of Diodore; but certaine ages after him. Herodotus quit omitting Bocchorus, hath Alychis, who made a law (as it was then held) against bad debtors, that their dead bodies should be in the creditors disposition, till the debt were paid. This Alychis made a Pyramid of brick, more costly and faire, in his own judgement, than any of those that the former Kings had raised. Besides this Alychis, Herodotus placeth one Anysis, a blind man, before the Ethiopian. The reignes of these two are perhaps those many ages which the Egyptians, to magnifie their antiquities, accounted between Bocchorus and him that followed them. But all this could make but fix yeares; and so long doth Functius, so long doth Reineccius hold, that these two Kings between them both did govern. If any man would lengthen this time, holding it improbable that the reignes of two Kings should have bin so soon spent; he may doe it by taking some yeares from Sethon or Psammiticus, and adding them to either of these. To adde unto these without subtracting from some other, would breed a manifest inconvenience: forasmuch as part of Sesac his reign, must have been in the fifth of Rehobam, as also the last of Pharao Neco was the fourth of Ezechia, and the first of Nebuchadnezzar. For mine own part, I like it better to allow six years only to these two Kings, than to lose the witness of Herodotus, who, concurring herein with the Scriptures, doth speak of Sennacherib's war, at which time Sethon was King of Egypt. I will not therefore adde years unto these obscure names; for by adding unto these men three years, we shall thrust the beginning of Sethon out of place, and make it later than the death of Sennacherib. In regard of this agreement of Herodotus with the Scriptures, I am the more willing to hold with him in his Egyptian Kings. Otherwise it were a matter of no great envie to leave both Alychis and Anysis out of the roll; which were easily done, by placing Sesac lower, and extending his life yet six years further, or more (if the like abridgement shall be required of Psammiticus his reign) into the years of Rehobam.

Of Sabacus the Ethiopian, who took the Kingdom from Anysis, it is agreed by the most, that he reigned fiftie years. He was a mercifull Prince, not punishing all capital offences with death, but imposing bondage and bodily labour upon malefactors; by whose toile he both got much wealth into his own hands, letting out their service to hire, and performed many works of more use than pomp, to the singular benefit of the Countrey. Zonaras calls this King Sua; the Scriptures call him So. Hosea, the last King of Israel, made a league with him against Salmanassar, little to his good: for the Egyptian was more rich than warlike, and therefore his friendship could not preserve the Israelite from destruction.

It seemes, that the encroaching power of the Assyrian grew terrible to Egypt about these times; the victories of Tiglath Phulassar and Salmanassar having eaten so farre into Syria, in the reign of this one King So or Sabacus. Yea, perhaps it was in his daies (for his reign began in the fourth of Menahem) that Phul himself did make the first entrance into Palestina. This caused So to animate the half-subdued people against their Conquerors; but the help which he and his Successor gave them was so faint, that Sennacherib's Embassador compared the Egyptian succour to a broken staff of Reed. Such indeed had Hosea found it, and such Ezechia might have found it, had he not been supported by the strong staff of him that ruleth all Nations with a rod of yron. It appeareth by the words of Rabsake, that the opinion was great in Juda, of the Egyptian forces, for Chariots and Horse-men; but this power, whatsoever it was, grew needfull, within a little while, for the defence of Egypt it selfe, which So left unto Sethon his Successor, having now fulfilled the fifty years of his reign. Herodotus and Diodorus have both one tale, from the relation of Egyptian Priests, concerning the departure of this King; saying, that he left the Countrey, and willingly retired into Ethiopia, because because it was often signified unto him in his dreams, by the god which was worshipped at Thebes, that his reign should be neither long nor prosperous, unlesse he slew all the Priests in Egypt; which rather than to do, he resigned his Kingdom. Surely, these Egyptian gods were of a strange quality, that so ill rewarded their servants, and invited Kings to doe them wrong. Well might the Egyptians (as they likewise did) worship Dogs as gods, when their chief gods had the property of Dogs, which love their Masters the better for beating them. Yet to what end the Priests should have feigned this tale, I cannot tell; and therefore I think that it might be some device of the fearfull old man, who seeing his Realm in danger of an invasion, sought an honest excuse for his departure out of it, and with-drawing himself into Ethiopia, where he had bin bred in his youth. What if I should say, that the Ethiopia into which he went, was none other than Arabia, whereof Tirbaha the King (perhaps at the instigation of this man) raised an Armie against Sennacherib, when he meant to invade Egypt within two or three years after; but I will not trouble my self with such enquire. This I hold, that So, or Sabacus was not indeed an Ethiopian (for in his time lived the Prophet Esay, who mentioneth the antiquity of Pharaohs house) but only so furnished for his education, and because issuing from thence, he got the kingdom from Anysis, who was his opposite. The quiet and mild form of his government, his holding the kingdom so long without an Army, and many other circumstances argue no lesse. But whether finally he betook to private life, or whether he fore-went his life and kingdom at once being now very old, it is time that we leave him, and speak of Sethon his next Successor, who is omitted by Diodore, but remembered by Herodotus, by a sure token of his having been King.

Of Sethon who reigned with Ezechia, and sided with him against Sennacherib.

The first year of Sethon's reign falls into the twelfth of Ezechia, which was the fift of Sennacherib. It was a troublesome age, and full of danger; the two great Kingdoms of Assyria and Egypt, being then engaged in a War, the issue whereof was to determine, whether of them should rule or serve. The Assyrian had the better men of War; the Egyptian better provision of necessities; the Assyrian more Subjects; the Egyptian more Friends; and among the new conquered half Subjects of Assyria, many that were Egyptian in heart, though Assyrian in outward show.

Of this last sort were Ezechia and his people; who knowing how much it concerned Pharao, to protect them against his own great Enemy, preserved the friendship of so near and mighty a Neighbour, before the service of a terrible, yet far removed King. But herein was great difference between Ezechia and his Subjects: For the good King fixing his especial confidence in God, held that course of policy, which he thought most likely to turn to the benefit of his Countrey; the multitude of Juda, looking into the fair hopes which this Egyptian league promised, were puffed up with vain conceits, thinking that all was safe, and that now they should not need to fear any more of those injuries which they had suffered by the Assyrians, and so became forgetfull of God, trusting themselves, but not of him. The Prophet Esay complained much of this presumption, giving the people of Juda to understand, That the Egyptians were men, and not God, and that Assur should fall by the sword, but not of man. As for the Egyptians (said the Prophet) they are vanity; and they shall help in vain, their strength is to sit still.

According to the Prophets words it came to passe. For in the treaty of Confederacy that was held at Zaan, all manner of contentment and assurance was given to the Jews by Sethon, or his Agents, who filled them with such reports of Horles and Chariots, that they did not look (as Esay saith) unto the holy One of Israel, nor seek unto the Lord: But he

After a while came Sennacherib with his Army, & awakened them out of these dreams; for Sethon their good Neighbour, as near as he was, did seem far off, being unready, when his help was most needfull. It may seem that he purposed rather to make Palestina, than Egypt, the stage whereon this great War should be acted, and was not without hope, that the Assyrians and Jews, weakening one another, should yeeld unto him a fair advantage over both. Yet he fought with money; for he sent Horses and Camels laden with treasure, to hire the Arabians, whom Esay calleth a people that cannot profit. These Arabians did not profit indeed; for (besides that it seems by the same place of Esay, that the rich treasures miscarried, and fell into the enemies hands before any help appeared from Tirhaca;) all the strong Cities of Juda were taken by Senacherib, except Libna, Lachis, and Jerusalem it self, which were in sore distresse, till the sword of God and not of Man, defeated the Affirian, who did go, for fear, to his Tower, that is, he fled to Ninive, where he was slain.

Concerning this expedition of Senacherib, Herodotus takes this notice of it: That it was purposed against Egypt, where the men of War, being offended with Sethon their King, who had taken away their allowance, refused to bear arms in defence of him and their Country; that Sethon being Vulcan's Priest bemoaned himself to his god, who by a dream promised to send him helpers; that hereupon Sethon, with such as would follow him, (which were craft-men, shop-keepers, and the like) marched towards Pelissum, and that a great multitude of field-mice entering the Camp of Senacherib by night, did to draw the bows, quivers, and straps of his mens armour, that they were fain the next day to flee away in all haste, finding themselves disarmed. In memory hereof (saith Herodotus) the Statue of this King is set up in the Temple of Vulcan, holding a Mouse in his hand, with this inscription, Let him that holds me serve God. Such was the relation of the Egyptian Priests, wherein how far they swerved from the truth, being desirous to magnifie their own King, it may easily be perceived. It seems that this Image of Sethon was fallen down, and the tale forgotten in Diodorus his time; or else perhaps, the Priests did forbear to tell it him (which caused him to omit it) for that the nation of the Fews was then well known to the world; whereof every child could have told how much falsehood had been mingled with the truth.

We find this history agreeable to the Scriptures, thus far forth: That Senacherib King of the Affirians and Arabians, (so Herodotus calleth him: the Syrians, or peradventure some borderers upon Syria, being meant by the name of Arabians) lived in this made War upon Egypt, and was miraculously driven home. As for that exploit of the Mice, and the great pleasure that Vulcan did unto his Priest, happy it was (if Sethon were a Priest) that he took his god now in so good a mood: For within three or four years before this, all the Priests in Egypt should have been slain, if a mercifull King had not spared their lives; as it were half against the gods will. Therefore this last good turn was not enough to serve as an example, that might stir up the Egyptians to piety, seeing that their devotion, which had lasted so long before, did bring all the Priests into danger of such a bad reward. Rather I think, that this Image did represent Senacherib himself, and that the Mouse in his hand, signified Hieroglyphically (as was the Egyptian manner of expressing things) the shamefull issue of his terrible expedition, or the destruction of his Armie, by means which came, no man knew from whence. For the vengeance of God, shewed upon this ungodly King, was indeed a very good motive to piety. But the Embleme, together with the Temple of Vulcan (being perhaps the chief Temple in that Town where this Image was erected) might give occasion to such a fable, the Devill helping to change the truth into a lie, that God might be robbed of his honour. Yet that we may not belie the Devill, I hold it very likely, that Sethon finding himself in danger, did call upon his gods, that is, upon Vulcan, Serapis, or any to whom he had most devotion. But so had other of his predecessors done in the like need: yet which of them had obtained succour by the like miracle? Surely the Fews (even such of them as most were given to Idolatry) would have bin ashamed of the confidence which they reposed in the Chariots of Egypt, because they were many, & in the Horse-mans, because they were very strong; had it bin told them, that Sethon, in stead of sending those Horse-men and Chariots, was beseeching Vulcan to send him and them good luck, or else (for that also were Egyptian gods) addressing his prayers to some Onyon or Cat. Howsoever it was, doubtlesse the Prophecie of Esay took effect; which saith, They shall be all ashamed of the people that cannot profit them, nor help, nor do them good; but shall be a shame and also a reproach. Such is commonly the issue of humane will-doing, when resting secure upon provision that it self hath made, it will no longer seem to stand in need of God, and bin so soon brought down by Eusebius under the name of Tarachus.

Tarachus

Tarachus the Ethiopian; and therefore the twenty years which are given to Tarachus, they allow to the reign of Sethon. These have well observed that Tarachus the Ethiopian is mentioned in the Scriptures, not as a King of Egypt, but as a friend to that Country, or at least an enemy to Sennacherib, in the War last spoken of; the Ethiopians (as they are englished) over which he reigned, being indeed Chusites or Arabians. Hereupon they suppose aright, that Eusebius hath mistaken one King for another. But whereas they think that this Tarachus or Tirhaca is placed in the room of Sethon, and therefore give to Sethon the twenty years of Tarachus, I hold them to have erred on the other hand. For this Ethiopian (as he is called) began his reign over Egypt, by Eusebius his account, after the death of Sennacherib and of Ezechia, in the first year of Manasses King of Juda. Therefore he or his years have no reference to Sethon.

Herodotus forgets to tell how long Sethon reigned; Functius peremptorily citing no author, nor alleging reason for it, sets him down thirty three years; many omit him quite; and they that name him, are not carefull to examine his continuance. In this case, I follow that rule which I propounded unto my self at the first for measuring the reigns of these Egyptian Kings. The years which passed from the fifth of Rehoboam, unto the fourth of Jebojakim, I so divide among the Egyptians, that giving to every one the proportion allowed unto him by the Author in whom he is found, the rest is to be conferred upon him whose length of reign is uncertain; that is, upon this Sethon. By this account I find the thirty three years that are set down by Functius, to agree very nearly, if not precisely, with the time of Sethon's reign; therefore I conform my own reckoning to his, though I could be content to have it one year lesse. The reason of this computation I shall render more at large, when I arrive at the time of Psammiticus, whereupon it hath much dependance, and whereinto the course of this History will shortly bring me, the Egyptian affairs growing now to be interlaced with the matters of Juda, to which it is meet that I return.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of Manasses and his Contemporaries.

S. I.

The wickednesse of Manasses. His imprisonment, repentance, and death.

MANASSE the Son of Ezechias, forgetting the piety of his Father, and the prosperity which followed him, set up, repaired, adorned, and furnished all the Altars, Temples and high Places, in which the Devill was by the Heathen worshipped. Besides, he himself esteemed the Sun, the Moon, and the Stars, with all the Host of heaven, as gods, and worshipped them: and of all his acts the most abominable was, that he burnt his sons for a Sacrifice to the Devill Molech or Melchok, in the Valley of Hinnon, or Benhinnon: wherein was kindled the fire of Sacrifice to the Devils.

He also gave himself to all kind of Witchcraft and Sorcery, accompanied and maintained those that had familiar Spirits, and all sorts of Enchanters: besides, he shed so much innocent blood, as Jerusalem was replenished therewith, from corner to corner. In all his vices and abominations, when he was reprehended by that aged and reverent Prophet Esay (who was also of the Kings race, and as the Fews affirm, the Father-in-law of Sethon King) he caused the Prophet near unto the Fountain of Silo, to be sawn in sunder with a wooden Saw, in the eightieth year of his life: a cruelty more barbarous and monstrous than hath been heard of. The Scriptures indeed are silent hereof, yet the same is confirmed by Epiphanius, Isidore, Eusebius, and others, too many to rehearse, and too good to be suspected. Therefore the Lord brought upon them the Captains of the Host of the Kings of Asshur, which took Manasse, and put him in fetters, and bound him in chains, and carried him to Babel: Where, after he had lye twenty years as a captive, and disappointed of all honour and hope, yet to his hearty repentance and continuall prayer, the God

God of infinite mercy had respect, and moved the Assyrians heart to deliver him.

It is also likely that Merodach, because he loved his father Ezechias, was the easilier perswaded to restore Manasse to his liberty and estate. After which, and when he was again established, remembering the miseries which followed his wickednesse, and Gods great mercies toward him, he changed form, detested his former foolish and devillish Idolatry, and cast down the Idols of his own erecting, prepared the Altar of God, and sacrificed thereon. He repaired a great part of Jerusalem: and dyed after the long reign of fiftie five years. Glycas and Suidas report, that Manasse was held in a cage of yron by the Assyrians: and therein fed with bread of bran and water, which men may beleeve as it shall please their fancies.

Of troubles in Egypt following the death of Sethon. The reign of Psammiticus.

THat the wickednesse of King Manasses was the cause of the evill which fell upon his Kingdome and Person, any Christian must needs beleeve: for it is affirmed in the Scriptures. Yet was the state of things in those parts of the World such, at that time, as would have invited any Prince (and did perhaps invite Merodach, who fulfilled Gods pleasure, upon respect born to his own ends, desirous to enlarge his Empire) to make attempt upon Juda. For the kingdom of Egypt, which was become the pillar whereon the state of Juda leaned, about these times was miserably distracted with civill dissention, and after two years ill amended by a division of the government between twelve Princes. After some good agreement between these, eleven of them fell out with the twelfth of their colleagues, and were all finally subdued by him, who made himself absolute King of all. This Interregnum, or meer Anarchie that was in Egypt, with the division of the Kingdome following it, is placed by Diodore, who omitteth Sethon, between the reign of Sabacus and Psammiticus: but Herodotus doth setle Aristocratie, or twelve Governours immediately before Psammiticus, who was one of them, and after Sethon.

The occasion of this dissention seems to have bin the uncertainty of title to that Kingdome (for that the crown of Egypt passed by succession of bloud, I have often shewed) which ended for a while, by the partition of all among twelve, though things werenot settled untill one had obtained the Sovereignty.

These twelve Rulers governed fifteen years in good seeming agreement, which to preserve, they made strait covenant & alliances one with another, being jealous of their estate, because an Oracle had foretold, that one of them should depose all the rest, noting him by this token, that he should make a drink-offering in Vulcans Temple, out of a Copper goblet. Whilest this unity lasted, they joyned together in raising a Monument of their Dominion, which was a Labyrinth, built near unto the Lake of Meris; a work so admirable, that (as Herodotus, who beholding it, affirms) no words could give it commendation answerable to the stateliness of the work it self. I will not here set down that unperfect description which Herodotus makes of it, but think enough to say that he prefers it far before the Pyramids, one of which (as he saith) excelled the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, or any of the fairest works in Greece: Diodorus reports this Labyrinth to have bin the work of Marus or Menides, a King, which lived five generations before Protesus; that is, before the War of Troy, and from this Labyrinth (saith he) Dadalus took the pattern of that which he made for Minos in Crete. Who this Marus, or Menides was, I cannot tell. Reineccius takes him to have bin Annemenes, which reigned immediately before Thuris. But this agrees not with Diodore: for Dadalus & Minos were both dead long before Annemenes was King. Belike Reineccius, desiring to accommodate the fabulous relations of Manethon, Charemon, & others, that are found in Josephus, touching Amenophis & his children, to the story of Amasis & Atsifanes the Ethiopian mentioned by Diodore, held it consequently, after he had conjectured Manethons Amenophis to be Diodorus his Amasis, that Sethon should be Atsifanes, and that Annemenes should be Marus. If in this case I might intrude a conjecture, the times which we now handle are those about which Reineccius hath erred in making search; Amasis was Amasis, Atsifanes was Sabacus, & Marus was one of these twelve Princes to whom Herodotus gives the the honour of building this famous Labyrinth. For Atsifanes the Ethiopian deposed Amasis, Sabacus the Ethiopian deposed Amasis; Atsifanes governed well, and was mild in punishing offenders; so likewise was Sabacus; Marus the next King after Atsifanes built this Labyrinth; and the next (saying Sethon, whom Diodore omits, as having not heard of him) that ruled after Sabacus, performed the same work, according to Herodotus, who was more likely to hear the truth, as living nearer to the Age wherein it was performed. The variety of names, and difference of times wherein Diodore beleeved the Priests, might be a part of the Egyptian vanity, which was familiar with them in multiplying their Kings, and boasting of their antiquities. Here I might adde, that the twelve great Halls, Parlours, and other circumstances remembered by Herodotus, in speaking of this building, doe help to prove that it was the work of these twelve Princes. But I hasten to their end.

At a solemn feast in Vulcans Temple, when they were to make their drink-offerings, the Priest, forgetting himselfe, brought forth no more than eleven Cuppes. Hereupon, Psammiticus, who standing last, had not a Cup, took off his brazen Helmet, and therewith supplied the want. This caused all the rest to remember the Oracle, and to suspect him as a Traytor; yet, when they found that it was not done by him upon set purpose or ill intent, they forbore to kill him, but being jealous of their estate, they banished him into the marish Countries by the Sea side. This Oracle, and the event is held by Diodore as a fable, which I beleeve to have bin none other: In the rest Herodotus and Diodore agree, saying, that Psammiticus hired Souldiers out of Caria and Ionia, by whose aid he vanquished his Companions, and made himself sole King.

The years of his reign, according to Herodotus, were fiftie four; according to Eusebius, forty four; Mercator, to reconcile these two, gives fortie four years to his single reign, and ten to his ruling jointly with the Princes before spoken of. Indeed, he that was admitted; being a man grown (for he cannot in reason be supposed to have been then a young fellow) into the number of the twelve Governours, must be thought to have lived unto extreme age, if he ruled partly with others, partly alone, three score and nine years. I therefore yeeld rather to Eusebius; but will not adventure to cut five years from the Aristocratie: though peradventure Psammiticus was not at first one of the twelve, but succeeded (either by election, or as next of bloud) into the place of some Prince that dyed, and was ten years companion in that government.

Another scruple there is, though not great, which troubles this reckoning. The years of the Egyptians, as we find them set down, are more by one, than serve to fill up the time between the fift of Rehoboam & the fourth of Jehojakim. This may not be. Wherefore either we must abate one year from Sethons reign, that was of uncertain length; or else (which I had rather doe, because Funtius may have followed better authority than I know, or than himself allegeth, in giving to Sethon a time so nearly agreeing with the truth) we must confound the last year of one reign with the first of another. Such a supposition were not insolent. For no man can suppose, that all the Kings, or any great part of them, which are set down in Chronologicall tables, reigned precisely to many years as are ascribed unto them, without any fractions: it is enough to think that the surpluse of one mans time supplied the defect of anothers. Wherefore I confound the last year of those fifteen, wherein the twelve Princes ruled, with the first of Psammiticus, who surely did not fall out with his Companions, fight with them, and make himself Lord alone all in one day.

Concerning this King, it is recorded, that he was the first in Egypt who entertained any strait amity with the Greekes; that he retained in pay his Mercenaries of Caria, Ionia, and Arabia, to whom he gave large rewards and possessions; and that he greatly offended his Egyptian Souldiers, by bestowing them in the left wing of his Armie, whilest his Mercenaries held the right wing (which was the more honourable place) in an expedition that he made into Syria. Upon this disgrace it is said, that his Souldiers, to the number of two hundred thousand, forsook their naturall Countrey of Egypt, and went into Ethiopia, to dwell there: neither could they be revoked by kind Messages, nor by the King himself; who over-took them on the way; but when he told them of their Countrey, their Wives and Children, they answered, that their weapons should get them a Countrey, and that nature had enabled them to get other Wives and Children.

It is also reported of him, That he caused two Infants to be brought up in such sort, as they might not hear any word spoken; by which means, he hoped to find out what Nation or Language was most ancient; forasmuch as it seemed likely, that nature would teach the children to speak that Language which men spake at the first. The issue hereof was, that the children cryed, Beccus, Beccus, which word being found to signifie Bread in the Phrygian tongue, served greatly to magnifie the Phrygian antiquity. Goropius Becanus makes no small matter of this, for the honour of his Low-Dutch; in which the word Becker signifies (as Baker in English) a maker of bread. He that will turne over any part of Goropius his works, may find enough of this kind, to perswade a willing man, that Adams and all the Patriarchs used none other tongue than the Low-Dutch, before the confusion of Languages at Babel; the name it self of Babel being alio Dutch, and given by occasion of this confusion; for that there they began to babble and talke one knew not what.

But I will not insist upon all that is written of Psammiticus. The most regardable of his acts was the siege of Azotus in Palastina, about which he spent nine & twenty years. Never have we heard (saith Herodotus) that any City endured to long a siege as this; yet Psammiticus carryed it at the last. This Town of Azotus had been won by Tartan a Captain of Sennacherib, and was now, as it seemeth, relieved, but in vaine, by the Babylonian, which made it hold out so well.

What reference these Egyptian matters might have to the imprisonment and enlargement of Manasses. In what part of his reign Manasses was taken prisoner.

WERE it certainly known, in what year of his reign Manasses was taken prisoner, and how long it was before he obtained liberty, I think wee should find these Egyptian troubles to have been no small occasion both of his captivity and enlargement: God so disposing of humane actions, that even they, who intended onely their own businesse, fulfilled onely his high pleasure. For either the civill Warres in Egypt that followed upon the death of Sethon, or the renting of the Kingdom, as it were, into twelve pieces, or the Warre betweene Psammiticus and his Collegues, or the expedition of Psammiticus into Syria, and the siege of Azotus, might minister unto the Babylonian, either such cause of hope to enlarge his Dominion in the South parts, or such necessity of sending an Armie into those parts, to defend his own, as would greatly tempt him to make sure worke with the King of Juda. The same occasion sufficed also, to procure the deliverie of Manasses, after he was taken. For he was taken (as Josephus hath it) by subtilty, not by open force, neither did they that apprehended him, winne his Countrey, but onely waste it. So that the Jewes, having learned wit by the ill successe of their folly, in redeeming Amaxia, were like to be more circumspect, in making their bargain upon such another accident: and the Babylonian (to whom the Egyptian matters presented more weighty arguments of hope and feare, than the little Kingdom of Juda could afford) had no reason to spend his forces in pursuing a small conquest, but as full of difficulty as a greater, whereby he should compell his mightiest enemies to come to some good agreement; when by quiting his present advantage over the Jewes, he might make his way the fairer into Egypt.

Now concerning the year of Manasses his reign, wherein he was taken prisoner, or concerning his captivity it self, how long it lasted, the Scriptures are silent, and Josephus gives no information. Yet I find cited by Torniellus three opinions; the one of Bellarmino, who thinks that Manasses was taken in the fiftieth year of his reign; the other of the Author of the greater Hebrew Chronologie, who affirms, that it was in his twenty seventh year; the third of Rabbi Kimki upon Ezechiel, who saith, that he was forty yeares an Idolater, and lived fifteen yeares after his repentance. The first of these conjectures is upheld by Torniellus, who rejects the second, as more improbable, and condemns the third as most false. Yet the reasons alleged by Torniellus in defence of the first, and refutation of the last opinion, are such, as may rather prove him to favour the Cardinall as farre as he may, (for where need requires, hee doth freely dissent from him) than to have used his accustomed diligence in examining the matter before before he gave his judgement. Two arguments he brings to maintain the opinion of Bellarmino: the one, that Ammon the son of Manasses, is said by Josephus to have followed the works of his fathers youth; the other, that had Manasses grown old in his sins, it is like that hee should have continued, as hee did, in his amendment unto the end of his life. Touching the former of these arguments, I see no reason why the sins of Manasses might not be distinguished from his repentance, in his old age, by calling them works of his youth, which appeared when he was twelve yeare old; though it were granted that he continued in them (according to that of Rabbi Kimki) untill he was but fiftieth years from death. Touching the second, howsoever it be a feardfull thing, to cast off unto the last those good motions unto repentance, which we know not whether ever God will offer unto us again; yet were it a terrible hearing, That the sins which are not forsaken before the age of two and fifty yeares, shall be punished with small impenitencie. But against these two collections of Torniellus, I will say two places of Scripture, whence it may be inferred, as not unlikely, That Manasses continued longer in his wickednesse than Bellarmino hath intimated, if not as long as Rabbi Kimki hath affirmed. In the second book of Kings, the evill which Manasses did, is remembered at large, and his repentance utterly omitted; so that his amendment may seem to have taken up no great part of his life; the storie of him being thus concluded in the one and twentieth Chapter: Concerning the rest of the Acts of Manasses, and all that he did, and his sin that he sinned, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Juda? The other place is in the four and twentieth Chapter of the same Book, where, in rehearsing the calamities with which that Nation was punished in the time of Jehojakim, the great Grand-child of this Manasses, it is said, Surely by the commandment of the Lord came this upon Juda, that he might put them out of his sight, for the sins of Manasses, according to all that hee did, and for the innocent blood that he shed (for hee filled Jerusalem with innocent blood) therefore the Lord would not pardon it. What so considers well these places, may find small cause to pronounce it most false; That the repentance and amendment of Manasses was no earlier than fifteen yeares before his death; or most probable, That when he was twenty seven yeares old, he repented; and becoming a new man, lived in the fear of God forty yeares after. I will no longer dispute about this matter, seeing that the truth cannot be discovered. It sufficeth to say, that two yeares of civill dissention in Egypt (fourteen or fifteen yeares following, wherein that Kingdom was weakened by partition of the Souveraignie: the warre of Psammiticus against his Associates: and four and twenty yeares of the nine and twenty, wherein the siege of Azotus continued, being all within the time of Manasses, did leave no one part of his reign (after the first fifteen yeares) free from the danger of being oppressed by the Babylonian, whose men of warre had continuall occasions of visiting his Countrey. All which I will adde hereto, is this, that the fiftieth of Manasses was the last year of Sethon in Egypt, and the one and thirtieth of Merodach his reign, or (accounting from the death of Asarhaddon) the twentieth: The seven and twentieth of Manasses was the tenth of the twelve Princes; and the three and fortieth of Merodach: his fortieth, was the twenty third of Psammiticus, and the fift of Nabulassar, the son of Merodach, in Babylon: but which of these was the year of his imprisonment, or whether any other, I forbear to shew mine opinion, lest I should thereby seem to draw all matters over-violently to mine own computation.

This was the first great maistrice that the Babylonians had of the kingdom of Juda. For though Achaz promised Tribute to Salmanassar, yet Ezechias never payed it. True it is, that he hoped to stay *Sennacherib*s enterprize against him, by presenting him with three hundred talents of silver, and thirty of gold, besides the plate which covered the doores and pillars of the Temple.

But Manasses being pressed with great necessitie, could refuse no tolerable conditions, that the Babylonian would impose upon him; among which it seemeth that this was one (which was indeed a point of servitude) that he might not hold peace with the Egyptians, while they were enemies to Babylon. This appears not onely by his fortifying with men of war all the strong Cities of Juda after his return (which was rather against Psammiticus, whose party he had forsaken, than against the Babylonian, with whom hee had thenceforth no more controversie) but likewise by that opposition, which Josias made afterwards to Pharao Neco, in favour of Nabulassar, which had been against all reason reason and policie, if it had not been his dutie by covenant. Of this I will speak more in convenient place.

§. IV.

Of the first and second Messenian Wars, which were in the reigns of Ezechia and Manasses, Kings of Juda.

Now concerning such actions as were performed abroad in the world, about these times of Manasses, the most remarkable were the Messenian Wars; which happened in this age, and being the greatest action performed in Greece, between the Trojan and Persian Wars, deserve not to be passed over with silence.

The first Messenian War began and ended in the daies of Ezechia; the second in the reign of Manasses: but to avoyd the trouble of interrupting our Historie, I have thought it best to rehearse them both in this place. Other introduction is needlesse, than to say, that the posteritie of Hercules, driving the issue of Pelops and the Achæans out of their seats, divided their lands between themselves, and erected the kingdomes of Lacedæmon, Argos, Messene, and Corinth; all which agreeing well together a while, did afterwards forget the bond of kindred, and fought one anothers ruine with bloody wars; whereof these Messenian were the greatest.

The pretended grounds of the Messenian war are scarce worth remembrance, they were so slight. Ambition was the true cause of it: wherewith the Lacedæmonians were so transported, that any thing served them as a colour to accomplish their greedy desires. Yet other matter was alleged; namely, that one Polycharès a Messenian had slain many Lacedæmonians, for which the Magistrates of Sparta desiring to have him yeilded into their hands, could not obtain it. The Messenians on the other side, excused Polycharès, for that he was grown frantick, through injuries received from Euphros a Lacedæmonian. This Euphros had bargained to give pasture to the Cattell of Polycharès, and was therefore to receive part of the increase: but not contented with the gain appointed, he sold the Cattell, and slaves that kept them, to Merchants; which done, he came with a fair tale to his friend, saying, that they were stolen. Whilst the lye was yet scarce out of his mouth, one of the slaves that had escaped from the Merchants came in with a true report of all. The Lacedæmonian being thus deprehended, confessed all, and promised large amends; which to receive he carried the son of Polycharès home with him; but having him at home, he villanously slew him. Wherefore the Lacedæmonians having refused, after long sute made by the wretched Father, to do him right against this Theefe and Murderer, ought not to pick matter of quarrell out of those things which he did in that madnesse, whereinto they themselvss had cast him. So said the Messenians, and further offered to put the matter to compromise, or to stand unto the judgement of the Amphictyons, who were as the generall Counsell of Greece, or to any other fair course. But the Lacedæmonians, who had a great desire to occupie the fair Countrie of Messene, that lay close by them, were not content with such allegations. They thought it enough to have some shew for their doings; which the better to colour, they reckoned up many old injuries, and so without sending any defiance, secretly took an oath to hold war with Messene till they had mastered it: which done, they seized upon Amphisa, a frontier Town of that Province, wherein they put all to the Sword without mercy, very few escaped.

Hereupon the Messenians took Arms, and were met by the Enemy. A furious battell was fought between them, which ended not untill dark night, with uncertain victory. The Messenians did strongly encamp themselves; The Lacedæmonians, unable to force their Camp, returned home. This War began in the second year of the ninth Olympiad, and ended in the first of the fourteenth Olympiad, having lasted twenty years. The two enemy Nations tried the matter, for a while, with their proper forces; the Lacedæmonians wasting the inland parts of Messene, and the Messenians, the Sea-coast of Laconia. But it was not long ere friends, on both sides, were called in to help. The Arcadians, Argives, and Sicionians, took part with Messene; the Spartans had besides many Subjects of their own, aid from Corinth, and hired Souldiers out of Crete. So the second, third, and fourth battell were fought, with as great obstinacie as the first; saving that in the fourth battell the Lacedæmonians were enforced to turn their backs; in the other fights, the victory was still uncertain, though in one of them the Messenians lost Euphaes their King, in whose stead they chose Aristodemus.

Many years were spent ere all this blood was shed; for pestilent diseases, and want of money to entertain Souldiers, caused the war to linger. And for the same reasons, did the Messenians forsake all their inland towns, excepting Ithome, which was a Mountain with a Town upon it, able to endure more than the enemies were likely to do. But, as some Authors tell us, the Lacedæmonians were so obstinate in this War, because of their vow, that having absented themselves ten years from Sparta, their wives sent them word, that their City would grow unpeopled, by reason that no children had been born them in all that time: Whereupon they sent back all their ablest young men, promiscuously to accompany the young women, who got so many of them with child, as they became a great part of their Nation, and were called Parthenians. Diodorus refers the begetting of these Parthenians to a former time. But in proceesse of this Messenian War, when the Devill in an Oracle had advised the Messenians to sacrifice a Virgin of the stock of * Egyptus, that so they might be victorious against the Lacedæmonians; the lot falling upon the Daughter of one Lyciscus, Epibolus the Priest, willing to save her, said, shee was only a fostered child, and not born of the wife of Lyciscus: which answer giving delay to the execution of the Maid, Lyciscus secretly fled away with her into Sparta. Then Aristodemus, which afterwards was King, voluntarily offered his own Daughter: but a young Nobelman, being in love with the Maid, when otherwise he could not prevail, said openly that she was no Virgin, but that he had deflowered her, and got her with child: whereupon the Father in a rage ripped up his innocent Daughters belly, to disprove the Lovers slander: at the grave of which Daughter of his, afterwards falling, by other superstitions, into despair of prevailing against the Lacedæmonians, he slew himself, to the great hurt of his Countrey, which he loved most dearly. For after his death the Messenians lost their courage, and finding themselves distressed by many wants, especially of victuals, they craved peace, which they obtained with most rigorous conditions. Half the yearly fruits of their Land they were bound to send unto Sparta; and they, with their Wives, to make solemn lamentations at the death of every Spartan King; they were also sworn to live in true subjection to the Lacedæmonians; and part of their Territorie was taken from them, which was given to the Asinai, and such as had followed the Spartans in this Warre.

This peace being made upon so uneven terms, was not like to hold long. Yet nine and thirty years it continued (the Messenians not finding how to help themselves) and then broke out into a new and more furious Warre than the former. The able young men, that were grown up in the room of those Messenians whom the former Warre had consumed, began to consider their own strength and multitude, thinking themselves equall to the Lacedæmonians, and therefore scorned to serve such Masters as had against all right, oppressed their Fathers. The chief of these was Aristomenes, a Noble Gentleman of the house of Egyptus; who perceiving the uniform desires of his Countreymen, adventured to become their Leader. He therefore founding the affections of the Argives and Arcadians, which he found thoroughly answerable to his purpose, began open warre upon the State of Lacedæmon. This was in the fourth year of the three and twentieth Olympiad; when the Lacedæmonians hasted to quench the fire before it should grow too hot, with such forces as they could raise of their own, without troubling their friends, meaning to deal with their enemies, ere any succour were lent them. So a strong battell was fought between them, and a doubtfull; save that the Messenians were pleased with the issue, forasmuch as they had thereby taught their late proud Lords, to think them their equals. Particularly, the valour of Aristomenes appeared such in this fight, that his people would have made him their King: but he, refusing the honour of that name, accepted of the burthen, and became their Generall. Within one year another battell was fought, whereunto each part came better provided: The Lacedæmonians brought with them the Corinthians, and some other friends to help: the Messenians had the Argives, Arcadians, and Sicionians. This also was a long and bloody fight; but Aristomenes did so behave himselfe, that finally he made the Enemies run for their lives. Of such importance was this victorie, that the Lacedæmonians began to bethinke themselves of making some good agreement.

were expelled by the Lacedæmonians, and then followed their ancient Country-men into Italie and Sicilie; some of them went into Africa, where they chose unto themselves a seat.

It is very strange, that during two hundred and fourscore years, this banished Nation retained their name, their ancient customs, language, hatred of Sparta, and love of their forsaken Country, with a desire to return unto it. In the third year of the hundred and second Olympiad, that great Epaminondas, having tamed the pride of the Lacedæmonians, revoked the Messenians home, who came flocking out of all quarters, where they dwelt abroad, into Peloponnesus. There did Epaminondas restore unto them their old possession, and help them in building a fair City, which by the name of the Province, was called to Messene, and was held by them ever after, in despite of the Lacedæmonians, of whom they never from thenceforth stood in fear.

S. V.

Of the Kings that were in Lydia and Media, while Manasses reigned. Whether Deioces the Mede were that Arphaxad which is mentioned in the Book of Judith. Of the history of Judith.

Ardys King of Lydia, and Phraortes of the Medes, are spoken of by Pausanias, as reigning shortly after the Messenian war. Ardys succeeding unto his father Gyges, began his reign of nine and forty years, in the second of the five and twentieth Olympiad. He followed the steps of his father, who encroaching upon the Ionians in Asia, had taken Colophon by force, and attempted Miletus and Smyrna. In like manner Ardys won Priene, and assailed Miletus; but went away without it. In his reign, the Cimmerians being expelled out of their own country by the Scythians, over-ran a great part of Asia, which was not freed from them before the time of Alyattes this mans Grand-child, by whom they were driven out. They had not only broken into Lydia, but won the City of Sardis; though the Castle or Citadell thereof was defended against them; and held still for King Ardys; whose long reign was unable, by reason of this great storm, to effect much.

Phraortes was not King until the third year of the nine and twentieth Olympiad, which was six years after the Messenian war ended; the same being the last year of Manasses his reign over Juda.

Deioces the father of this Phraortes, was King of Media, three and fiftie of these five and fiftie yeares in which Manasses reigned. This Deioces was the first that ruled the Medes in a strict form, commanding more absolutely than his Predecessours had done. For they, following the example of Arbaces, had given to the people so much licence, as caused every one to desire the wholesome severitie of a more Lordly King. Herein Deioces answered their desires to the full. For he caused them to build for him a stately Palace; he took unto him a Guard, for defence of his person; he seldom gave presence; which also when he did, it was with such austeritie, that no man durst presume to spit or cough in his sight. By these and the like ceremonies he bred in the people an awfull regard, and highly upheld the Majestie which his predecessors had almost letten fall, through neglect of due comportments. In execution of his Royall Office, he did uprightly and severely administer justice, keeping secret spies to inform him of all that was done in the Kingdome. He cared not to enlarge the bounds of his Dominion, by encroaching upon others, but studied how to govern well his own. The difference found between this King, and such as were before him, seems to have bred that opinion which Herodotus delivers, that Deioces was the first who reigned in Media.

This was he that built the great City of Ecbatane, which now is called Tauris; and therefore he should be that king Arphaxad, mentioned in the storie of Judith, as also Ben Merodach, by the same account, should be Nabuchodonosor the Assyrian, by whom Arphaxad was slain, and Holofernes sent to work wonders upon Phul and Lud, and I know not what other Countries. For I reckon the last yeare of Deioces to have been the nineteenth of Ben Merodach; though others place it otherwise, some earlier, in the time of Merodach Baladan, some later, in the reign of Nabulassar, who is also called Nabuchodonosor.

In

In fitting this book of Judith to a certain time, there hath much labour been spent with ill success. The reigns of Cambyses, Darius Hystaspes, Xerxes, and Ochus, have been sought into, but afford no great matter of likelihood; and now of late, the times foregone the destruction of Jerusalem, have been thought upon, and this age that we have in hand, chosen by Bellarmino, as agreeing best with the storie, though others herein cannot (I speak of such as faine would) agree with him. Whilst Cambyses reigned, the Temple was not re-built, which in the story of Judith is found standing and dedicated. The other two Persian Kings, Darius and Xerxes, are acknowledged to have been very favourable to the Jews; therefore neither of them could be Nabuchodonosor, whose part they refused to take, and who sent to destroy them. Yet the time of Xerxes hath some conveniences, aptly fitting this History; and above all, the opinion of a few ancient Writers (without whose judgement the authority of this Book were of no value) having placed this argument in the Persian Monarchie, inclines the matter to the reign of this vain-glorious King. As for Ochus, very few, and they faintly, entitle him to the business. Manifest it is, and granted, that in the time of this History, there must be a return from captivity lately foregone; the Temple rebuilt; Joachim High Priest; and a long peace of threescore and ten years, or thereabout, ensuing. All these were to be among the Jews. Likewise on the other side, we must find a King that reigned in Nineve, eighteen years at the least; that vanquished and slew a King of the Medes; one whom the Jews refused to assist; one that sought generally to be adored as God, and that therefore commanded all temples, of such such as were accounted gods, to be destroyed; one whole Vice-roy or Captain Generall knew not the Jewish Nation, but was faine to learn what they were of the bordering people.

Of all these circumstances, the Priesthood of Joachim, with a return from captivity, are found concurring, with either the time of Manasses before the destruction of Jerusalem, or of Xerxes afterward: the re-building of the Temple a while before, and the long peace following, agree with the reign of Xerxes; the rest of circumstances requisite, are to be found all together, neither before nor after the captivity of the Jews, and dissolution of the City. Wherefore the brief decision of this controversie is, That the book of Judith is not Canonical. Yet hath Torniellus done as much, in fitting all to the time of Xerxes, as was possible in so desperate a case. For he supposeth, that under Xerxes there were other Kings, among which Arphaxad might be one (who perhaps restored and re-edified the City of Ecbatane, that had formerly been built by Deioces) and Nabuchodonosor might be another. This granted, he adds, that from the twelfth year to the eighteenth of Nabuchodonosor, that is, five or six years, the absence and ill fortune of Xerxes in his Grecian expedition (which he supposeth to have been so long) might give occasion unto Arphaxad, of rebelling: and that Nabuchodonosor, having vanquished and slain Arphaxad, might then seek to make himself Lord of all, by the Armie which he sent forth unto Holofernes. So should the Jews have done their dutie, in adhering to Xerxes their Sovereign Lord, and resisting one that rebelled against him; as also the other circumstances rehearsed before, be well applied to the argument. For in these times, the affairs of Jurie were agreeable to the History of Judith, and such a King as this supposed Nabuchodonosor, might well enough be ignorant of the Jews; and as proud as we shall need to think him. But the silence of all Histories, takes away belief from this conjecture: and the supposition it self is very hard, that a Rebelle, whose King was abroad, with an Armie consisting of seventeen hundred thousand men, should presume so far, upon the strength of twelve hundred thousand foot, and twelve thousand Archers on horse-back, as to think that he might doe what he list, yea that there was none other God than himself. It is indeed easie to find enough that might be said against this device of Torniellus: yet if there were any necessity of holding the book of Judith to be Canonical, I would rather choose to lay aside all regard of prophane Histories, and build some defence upon this ground; than, by following the opinion of any other, to violate, as they all doe, the text it self. That Judith lived under none of the Persian Kings, Bellarmino (whose works I have not read, but find him cited by Torniellus) hath proved by many arguments. That she lived not in the Reign of Manasses, Torniellus hath proved very substantially, shewing how the Cardinall is driven, as it were to break through a wall, in saying that the text was corrupted, where it spake of the destruction of the Temple foregoing her time; that the Kings Arphaxad and Nabuchodonosor, chodonosor, found out by Tornicellus, are the children of meer fantasie, it is so plain that it needs no proof at all. Wherefore we may truly say, that they, which have contented about the time of this Historie, being well furnished of matter, wherewith to confute each other; but wanting wherewith to defend themselves (like naked men in a stone field) have chafed Holofernes out of all parts of time, and left him and his great expedition, Extra anni solisque vias, in an age that never was, and in places that were never known.

Judic. 1. 23. & 25. Surely, to find out the borders of Japheth, which were towards the South, and over against Arabia; or the Countries of Phul and Lud, that lay in Holofernes his way; I think it would as much trouble Cosmographers, as the former question hath done Chronologers. But I will not busie my self herewith; having already so far digressed, in shewing who lived not with Manasses, that I think it high time to return unto mine own work, and rehearse what others I find, to have had their part, in the long time of his Reign.

S. VI.

Of other Princes and actions that were in these times.

THE first year of Manasses was the last Romulus; after whose death, one year the Romans wanted a King. Then was Numa Pompilius a Sabyn chosen, a peaceable man, and seeming very religious in his kind. He brought the rude people, which Romulus had employed only in Wars, to some good civillie, and a more orderly fashion of life. This he effected by filling their heads with superstition; as perswading them, that he had familiaritie with a Nymph called Egeria, who taught him a many of Ceremonies which he delivered unto the Romans as things of great importance. But all these devices of Numa were, in his own judgement, no better than meer delusions, that served only as rudiments to bring the savage multitude of thieves and out-laws, gathered into one body by Romulus, to some form of milder discipline, than their boisterous and wild natures were otherwise apt to entertain. This appeared by the Books that were found in his grave, almost six hundred years after his death, wherein the Superstition taught by himself was condemned as vain. His grave was opened by chance, in digging a piece of ground that belonged to one L. Petilius a Scribe. Two Coffins or Chests of stone were in it, with an inscription in Greek and Latine letters, which said, that Numa Pompilius, the son of Pompo, King of the Romans, lay there. In the one Coffin was nothing found; his body being utterly consumed. In the other were his Books, wrapped up in two bundles of wax; of his own constitutions seven, and other seven of Philosophie. They were not only uncorrupted, but in a manner fresh and new. The Pretour of the Citie desiring to have a sight of these Books, when he perceived whereunto they tended, refused to deliver them back to the owner, and offered to take a solemn oath that they were against the Religion then in use. Hereupon the Senate, without more ado, commanded them to be openly burnt. It seems that Numa did mean to acquit himself unto wiser ages, which he thought would follow, as one that had not been so foolish as to believe the Doctrine wherein he instructed his own barbarous times. But the poyson wherewith he had infected Rome, when he sate in his Throne, had not left working, when he ministred the Antidote out of his grave. Had these Books not come to light, untill the days of Tully and Cesar, when the mist of ignorance was somewhat better discussed; likely it is that they had not only escaped the fire, but wrought some good (and peradventure generall) effect. Being as it was, they served as a confutation, without remedie, of Idolatrie that was inveterate.

Numa reigned three and fortie years in continuall peace. After him Tullus Hostilius the third King was chosen, in the six and fortieth of Manasses, and reigned two and thirtie years, busied, for the most part, in War. He quarrelled with the Albanes, who met him in the field; but in regard of the danger, which both parts had cause to fear, that might grow unto them from the Thuscans, caused them to bethink themselves of a course, whereby without effusion of so much blood, as might make them too weak for a common enemy, it might be decided, who should command, and who obey.

There

There were in each Camp three Brethren, Twins, born at one birth (Dionysius sayes that they were Cousin Germans) of equall years and strength, who were appointed to fight for their severall Countries. The end was, that the Horatii, Champions for the Romans, got the victory, though two of them first lost their lives. The three Curatii that fought for Alba (as Livie tells it) were all alive, and able to fight, yet wounded, when two of their opposites were slain; but the third Horatius, pretending fear, did run away, and thereby drew the others, who by reason of their hurts, could not follow him with equall speed, to follow him at such distance one from another, that returning upon them, he slew them, as it had been in single fight, man after man, ere they could joyn together and set upon him all at once. Dionysius reports it somewhat otherwise, telling very particularly, what wounds were given and taken, and saying, that first one of the Horatii was slain, then one of the Curatii, then a second Horatius, and lastly the two Curatii, whom the third Horatius did cunningly sever the one from the other, as is shewed before.

This is one of the most memorable things in the old Roman Historie, both in regard of the action it self, wherein Rome was laid, as it were, in a wager, against Alba; and in respect of the great increase which thereby the Roman State obtained. For the Citie of Alba did immediately become subject unto her own Colonie, and was shortly after, upon some treacherous dealing of their Governour, utterly razed, the people being removed unto Rome, where they were made Citizens. The strong Nation of the Latines, whereof Alba, as the mother Citie, had been chief, became ere long dependent upon Rome, though not subject unto it, and divers petty States adjacent, were by little and little taken in: which additions, that were small, yet many, I will forbear to rehearse (as being the works of sundry ages, and few of them remarkable considered apart by themselves) untill such time as this fourth Empire, that is now in the infancie, shall grow to be the main subject of this History.

The seventh year of Hippomenes in Athens, was current with the first of Manasses. All the three last Governours for ten years, who followed Hippomenes, were in the same Kings time. Of these I find only names, Leocrates, Abfander, and Erizius. After Erizius yearly Rulers were elected.

These Governours for ten years were also of the race of Medon and Codrus, but their time of rule was shortened, and from term of life reduced unto ten years; it being thought likely that they would govern the better, when they knew that they were afterwards to live private men under the command of others. I follow Dionysius of Halicarnassus, in applying their times unto those years of the Olympiads, wherein the Chronologicall Table, following this work, doth set them. For he not only professeth himself to have taken great care in ordering the reckoning of times; but hath noted always the years of the Greeks, how they did answer unto the things of Rome, throughout all the continuance of this Historie. Whereas therefore he placeth the building of Rome, in the first year of the seventh Olympiad, and affirmeth, that the same was the first year of Charops government of Athens; I hope I shall not need excuse, for varying from Pausanius, who sets the beginning of these Athenians somewhat sooner.

In the reign of Manasses it was, that Midas, whom the Poets feigned to have had Asses ears, held the kingdome of Phrygia. Many fables were devised of him; especially that he obtained of Bacchus, as a great gift, that all things which he should touch might immediately be changed into Gold: by which means he had like to have been starved (his meat and drink being subject to the same transformation) had not Bacchus delivered him from this miserable facultie, by causing him to wash himself in the River Pactolus, the stream whereof hath ever since, forsooth, abounded in that precious metall. Finally, it is said he dyed by drinking Bulls blood; being invaded by the Scythians.

In this age flourished that Antimachus, who (saith Plutarch in the life of Romulus) observed the Moons Eclipse at the foundation of Rome.

The Milesians, or, (as Eusebius hath it) the Athenians having obtained some power by Sea, founded Maceratris a Citie on the East of Egypt. Psammiticus herein seems to have assisted them, who used all means of drawing the Greeks into Egypt, accounting them his surest strength. For neither Miletus nor Athens were now of power sufficient to plant a Colonie in Egypt by force.

About this time Archias with his companion Miscellus, and other Corinthians, founded Syracusa in Sicilie, a Citie in after times exceeding famous.

The Citie of Nicodemia, sometime * Asacus, was enlarged and beautified in this age by Zipartes native of Thrace. Sybilla of Samus, according to Pausanias, lived much about this time.

About these times also was Croton founded upon the Bay of Tarentum by Miscellus, the companion of Archias that built Syracusa. Strabo makes it somewhat more ancient, and so doth Pausanias.

About the same time the Parthenians being of age, and banished Lacedamon were conducted by Phalantus into Italie, where it is said they founded Tarentum: but Fustine and to Pausanias find it built before, and by them conquered and amplified: and about the same time, Manasse yet living, the Citie Phaselis was founded in Pamphylia, Gela in Sicilie, Interamne in the Region of the Umbrii, now Urbini in Italie. About which time also the Chalcedon in Asia, over against Byzantium (now Constantinople) was founded by the Megarenfes, who therefore were upbraided as blind, because they choie not the other side of Bosphorus. It were a long work to rehearse all that is said to have bin done in the five and fiftie years of Manasses: that which already hath been told is enough; the rest being not greatly worth remembrance, may well be omitted, reserving only Ben Merodach, and Nabulassar, to the businesse that will shortly require more mention of them.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of the times from the death of Manasses to the destruction of Jerusalem.

S. I.

of Ammon and Josias.

Ammon the son of Manasse, a man no lesse wicked than was his Father before his conversion, restored the exercise of all sorts of Idolatry: for which God hardened the hearts of his own servants against him, who slew him after he had reigned two years. Phile, Eusebius, and Nicephorus give him ten years, following the Septuagint.

Josias succeeded unto Ammon, being but a child of 8. years old, he began to seek after the God of David his Father; and in his twelfth year he purged Juda and Jerusalem from the high places, and the groves, and the carved and molten Images: and they brake down in his sight the Altars of Baalim: He caused all the Images, as well those which were graven, as molten, to be stamp to powder, and strewed on their graves that had erected them; and this he commanded to be done throughout all his dominions. He also slew those that sacrificed to the Sun and Moon, and caused the Chariots and horses of the Sun to be burnt. Of Josias it was prophesied in the time of Fereboam the first, when he erected the Golden Calf at Bethel, that a child should be born unto the house of David, Josias by name, and upon thee (said the Prophet, speaking to the Altar) shall he sacrifice the Priests of the high places, that burn incense upon thee: a prophetic very remarkable.

In the eighteenth year of his reign, he re-built and repaired the Temple, at which so time Helkiah the Priest found the Book of Moses, called Deutonomie, or, of the Law, which he sent to the King: which when he had caused to be read before him, and considered of the severe commandments therein written, the prosperitie promised to those that observe them, and the sorrow and extirpation to the rest, he rent his garments, and commanded Helkiah, and others, to aske counsell of the Prophetesse Huldah, or, Olda, concerning the Book: who answered the messengers in these words: Thus saith the Lord, Behold, I will bring evil upon this place, and upon the inhabitants thereof, even all the causes that are written in the Book which they have read before the King of Juda, because they have forsaken foraken mee, and burnt incense to other gods. Only for the King himself, because he was a lover of God and his Lawes, it was promised that this evil should not fall on Juda and Jerusalem in his dayes, but that he himself should inherit his grave in peace.

Josias assembled the Elders, caused the Book to be read unto them, made a covenant with the Lord, and caused all that were found in Jerusalem and Benjamin to doe the like, promising thereby to observe the Lawes and Commandements in the Book contained.

The execution done by Josias upon the Altar, idols, monuments, and bones of the false Prophets at Bethel, argueth his Dominion to have extended unto those Countries, that had been part of the Kingdome of the ten Tribes. Yet I doe not think, that any victory of Josias in war got possession of these places; but rather that Ezechias, after the flight & death of Sennacherib, when Merodach opposed himself against Asarhaddon, did use the advantage which the faction in the North presented unto him, and laid hold upon so much of the Kingdome of Israel, as he was able to people. Otherwise also it is not improbable, that the Babylonian finding himself unable to deal with Psammiticus in Syria (as wanting power to raise the siege of Azotus, though the Town held out nine & twenty years) did give unto Manasses, together with his liberty, as much in Israel as himself could not easily defend. This was a good way to break the amity that the Kings of Juda had so long held with those of Egypt, by casting a bone between them, & withall by this benefit of enlarging their Territories with addition of more than they could challenge, to redeem the friendship of the Jewes, which had been lost by injuries done, in seeking to bereave them of their own. When it is said, that Manasses did after his deliverance from imprisonment, put Captaines of War in all the strong Cities of Juda; it may be that some such businesse is intimated, as the taking possession, and fortifying of places delivered into his hands. For though it be manifest that he took much paines, in making Jerusalem it self more defensible; yet I should rather beleieve, that he, having already compounded with the Babylonian, did fortifie himself against the Egyptians, whose side he had forsaken, than that he travelled in making such provisions only for his mindes sake. The earnestnesse of Josias in the King of Babel his quarrell, doth argue, that the composition which Manasses had made with that King or his Ancestor, was upon such friendly termes, as required not onely a faithfull obervation, but a thankfull requitall. For no perswasions could suffice to make Josias sit still, and hold himself quiet in good neutrality, when Pharao Necho King of Egypt passed along by him, to war upon the Countries about the River of Euphrates.

The last yeer of Josias his reign it was, when as Necho the son of Psammiticus, came with a powerfull Army towards the border of Judea, determining to passe that way, being the nearest toward Euphrates, either to strengthen the passages of that River about Carchemish, or Cereusium, for the defence of Syria (as long after this, Dioclesian is said by Ammianus Marcellinus to have done,) or perhaps to invade Syria it self. For it seemeth that the travail of Psammiticus had not been idly consumed about that one Town of Azotus, but had put the Egyptians in possession of no small part of Syria, especially in those quarters that had formerly belonged unto the Adades Kings of Damasco.

Neither was the industry of Necho lesse than his Fathers had bin, in pursuing the war against Babel. In which warre, two things may greatly have availed the Egyptians, and advanced their affaires and hopes: the extraordinary valour of the mercenary Greekes, that were far better Souldiers than Egypt of it self could afford; & the danger wherein Assyria stood, by the force of the Medes, which under the command of more absolute Princes, began to feel it self better, and to shew what it could doe. These were great helps, but of shorter endurance than was the warre; as in place more convenient shall be noted. At the present it seems, that either some preparation of the Chaldeans to reconquer, did enforce, or some disability of theirs to make resistance, did invite the King of Egypt into the Countries bordering upon Euphrates; whither Pharao Necho ascended with a mighty Army.

These two great Monarchs, having their swords drawn, and contending for the Empire of that part of the World, Josias advised with himself to which of these he might adhere, having his Territory set in the mid-way between both, so as the one could not invade the other, but that they must of necessity tread upon the very face and body of his Country. Now though it were so that Necho himselfe desired, by his Embassadors, leave leave to passe along by Judea, protesting that he directed himself against the Assyrians only, without all harmefull purpose against Josias; yet all sufficed not, but the King of Israel would needs fight with him.

2 Chron. 35.

Many examples there were, which taught, what little good the friendship of Egypt could bring to those that had affiance therein: as that of Hosea the last King of Israel, who when he fell from the dependance of the Assyrian, and wholly trusted to Sabacus or Sous King of Egypt, was utterly disappointed of his hopes, and in conclusion lost both his life and estate, which the Assyrian so rooted up and tare in pieces, as it could never after be gathered together or replanted. The calamities also that fel upon Judea in the thirteenth and fourteenth years of Ezechia, whilst that good king and his people relied upon Seton; and more lately, the imprisonment of Manasses, were documents of sufficient proof, to shew the ill assurance that was in the help of the Egyptians, who (near neighbors though they were) were alwaies unreadie, when the necessities of their friends required their assistance. The remembrance hereof might be the reason why Neco did not seek to have the Jewes renew their ancient league with him, but only craved that they would be contented to sit still, and behold the pastime between him and the Assyrians. This was an easie thing to grant; seeing that the countenance of such an Armie, as did, soon after this, out-face Nabulassar upon his own borders, left unto the Jewes, a lawfull excuse of fear, had they forborn to give it any check upon the way. Wherefore I beleave that this religious and vertuous Prince Josias, was not stirred up only by politick respects, to stop the way of Neco; but thought himself bound in faith and honor, to doe his best in defence of the Babylonian Crown; whereunto his Kingdome was obliged, either by covenant made at the enlargement of Manasses, or by the gift of such part as he held in the Kingdome of the ten Tribes. As for the Princes and people of Juda, they had now a good occasion to shew, both unto the Babylonians, of what importance their friendship was, and to the Egyptians what a valiant Nation they had abandoned, and thereby made their enemy.

Some think that this action of Josias was contrary to the advice of Jeremie the Prophet, which I doe not find in the Prophecie of Jeremie, nor can find reason to beleave. Others hold opinion that he forgot to ask the counsell of God: and this is very likely; seeing he might beleave that an enterprize grounded upon fidelitie and thankfulness due to the King of Babel, could not but be displeasing unto the Lord. But the wickedness of the people (in whom the corruptions of former times had taken such root, as all the care of Josias in reforming the Land, could not pluck up) was questionlesse far from hearkening how the matter would stand with Gods pleasure, and much farther from enquiring into his secret will, wherein it was determined that their good king, whose life stood between them and their punishment, should now be taken from among them, and that in such sort, as his death should give an entrance to the miseries ensuing. So Josias levying all the strength he could make, near unto Megiddo, in the half Tribe of Manasses, encountred Neco: and there he received the stroak of death, which lingring about him till he came to Jerusalem, brought him to the Sepulchres of his Ancestors. His losse was greatly bewailed of all the people and Princes of Juda, especially of Jeremie the Prophet, who inserted a sorrowfull remembrance thereof in his Book of Lamentations.

S. II.

Of Pharo Neco that fought with Josias: Of Jehoahaz and Jehojakim Kings of Israel.

OF these warres, and particularly of this victorie, Herodotus hath mention among the acts of Neco. He tels us of this King, that he went about to make a channell, whereby Ships might passe out of Nilus into the Red Sea. It should have reached above an hundred miles in length, and been wide enough for two Gallies to row in front. But in the midst of the work, an Oracle foretold that the Barbarians should have the benefit of it, which caused Neco to desist when half was done. There were consumed in this toyle some businesse twelve hundred thousand Egyptians; a losse great enough to make the King forsake his enterprize, without troubling the Oracle for admonition. Howsoever it were, he was not a man to be idle; therefore he built a Fleet, and levied a great Armie, wherewith he marched against the King of Babel. In this expedition, he used the service, as well of his Navie, as of his land-forces; but no particular exploits of his therein are found recorded, save only this victory against Josias, where Herodotus calls the place Magdolis, and the Jewes Syrians; which is a small error, seeing that Judea was a Province of Syria, and Magdolis or Magdala is taken to have been the same place (though diversly named) in which this battell was fought. After this, Neco took the Citie of Cadytis, which was perhaps Charchemish, by Euphrates, and made himself Lord, in a manner, of all Syria, as Josephus witnesseth.

Jos. Ant. Jud. lib. 10. cap. 7.

Particularly we find, that the Phenicians, one of the most powerfull Nations in Syria, were his Subjects, and that by his command they surrounded all Africa, setting sail from the gulfe of Arabia, and so passing along all the coast, whereon they both landed, as need required, and sowed corn for their sustenance in that long voyage, which lasted three years. This was the first Navigation about Africa, wherein that great Cape, now called of good hope, was discovered, which after was forgotten, until Vasco de Gama the Portingall found it out, following a contrary course to that which the Phenicians held; for they, beginning in the East, ran the way of the Sun, South and then Westward, after which they returned home by the pillars and streights of Hercules (as the name was then) called now the streights of Gibraltar, having Africk still on the right hand; but the Portingalls, beginning their voyage not far from the same streights, leave Africk on the Larboord, and bend their course unto the East. That report of the Phenicians, which Herodotus durst not believe, how the Sun in this journey was on their right hand, that is, on the North side of them, is a matter of necessary truth, and the observation then made hereof, makes me the better to believe, that such a voyage was indeed performed. But leaving these discourses of Neco his magnificence, let us tell what he did, in matters more importing his estate. The people of Juda, while the Egyptians were busie at Charchemish, had made Jehoahaz their King, in the room of his father Josias. The Prophet Jeremie calls this new King Shallum, by the name of his younger brother; alluding perhaps to the short reign of Shallum King of the ten Tribes: for Shallum of Israel reigned, but one moneth; Jehoahaz no more than three. He was not the eldest son of Josias:

Jer. 22. 32.

Wherefore it may seem that he was set up as the best affected unto the King of Babel; the rest of his house being more inclined to the Egyptian, as appears by the sequel. An Idolater he was, and thrived accordingly. For when Neco had dispatched his businesse in the North parts of Syria, then did he take order for the affairs of Judea. This Countie was now so far from making any resistance, that the King himself came from Riblah in the land of Hamath, where the matter went so ill on his side; that Neco did cast him into bonds, and carry him prisoner into Egypt, giving away his Kingdome to Eliakim his elder brother, to whom of right it did belong. The Citie of Riblah, in after times called Antiochia, was a place unhappy to the Kings and Princes of Juda, as may be observed in divers examples. Yet here Jehojakim, together with his new name, got his Kingdome; an ill gain, since he could no better use it. But how-ever Jehojakim thrived by the bargain, Pharao sped well, making that Kingdome Tributarie, without any stroke stricken; which three moneths before was too stout to give him peace, when he desired it. Certain it is, that in his march outward, Neco had a greater task lying upon his hands, than would permit him to wast his forces upon Judea: but now the reputation of his good successe at Megiddo, and Charchemish, together with the dissention of the Princes Josias his sons (of whom the eldest is probably thought to have stormed at the preferment of his younger brother) gave him power to do even what should please himself. Yet he did forbear to make a conquest of the Land, perhaps upon the same reason, which had made him so earnest in seeking to hold peace with it. For the Jewes had suffered much in the Egyptians quarrell, and being left by these their friends, in time of need, unto all extremities, were driven of necessity to forsake that partie, and to joyn with the enemies, to whom if they shewed themselves faithfull, who could blame them? It was therefore enough to reclaim them; seeing they were such a people as would not upon every occasion shift side, but endure more than Pharao, in the pride of his victories, thought that any henceforth should lay upon them: so good a Patron did he mean to be unto them. Nevertheless, he laid upon them a Tribute, of an hundred Talents of silver, and one Talent of gold; that so he might both reap at the present some fruit of his pains taken, and leave unto them some document in the future, of greater greater punishment than verball anger, due to them, if they should rebell. So he departed, carrying along with him into Egypt the unfortunate King Jehohaz, who died in his Captivitie.

The reign of Jehohaz was included in the end of his Fathers last year; otherwise it would hardly be found, that Jehojakim his successor did reign ten whole years; whereas the Scriptures give him eleven, that are current and incomplete. If any man will rather cast the three moneths of this short reign, into the first year of the brother, than into the fathers last, the same arguments that shall maintain his opinion, will also prove the matter to be unworthy of disputation; and so I leave it.

Jehojakim in impietie was like his brother, in faction he was altogether Egyptian, as having received his Crown at the hand of Pharao. The wickednesse of these last Kings, being expressed in Scriptures none otherwise, than by generall words, with reference to all the evill that their Fathers had done, makes it apparent, that the poyson wherewith Ahaz and Manasses had infected the Land, was not so expelled by the zealous goodnesse of Josias, but that it still cleaved unto the chief of the people, Tea, unto the Priests also, and therefore it was not strange, that the Kings had their parts therein. The Royall authoritie was much abased by the dangers wherein the Countrey stood, in this troublesome ahe: the Princes did in a manner what they listed; neither would the Kings forbear to professe, that they could deny them nothing. Yet the beginning of Jehojakim had the countenance of the Egyptian to grace it, which made him insolent and cruell, as we find by that example of his dealing with Uria the Prophet: though herein also the Princes do appear to have been instigators. This holy man denounced Gods judgments against the Citie and Temple, in like sort as other Prophets had formerly done, and did in the same age. The King with all the men of power, and all the Princes, hearing of this, determined to put him to death. Hereupon the poor man fled into Egypt: but such regard was had unto Jehojakim, that Uria was delivered unto his Embassadour, and sent back to the death; contrary to the custome used, both in those dayes, and since among all civill Nations, of giving refuge unto strangers, that are not held guilty of such inhumane crimes, as for the generall good of mankind should be exempted from all privilege.

It concerned Pharao to give all contentment possible to Jehojakim: for the Assyrian Lyon, that had not stirred in many years, began about these times to roar so loud upon the banks of Euphrates, that his voice was heard unto Nilus, threatening to make himself Lord of all the Forrest. The causes that hitherto had withdrawn the house of Merodach from opposing the Egyptian in his conquest of Syria, require our consideration in this place, before we proceed to commit them together at Carchemish, where shortly after this the glory of Egypt is to fall.

Of the Kings of Babylon and Media. How it came to passe that the Kings of Babel could not give attendance on their businesse in Syria, which caused them to lose that Province.

Merodach the son of Baladan, who taking the advantage that Senacheribs misadventure and death, together with the dissention between his children, presented, made himself King of Babylon, was eleven years troubled with a powerful Enemy, Asarhaddon the son of Senacherib, reigning over the Assyrians in Nineve; from whom whilst he could not any other way divert his cares, hee was faine to omit all businesse in Syria, and (as hath been formerly shewed) to make over unto Ezechia some part of the Kingdome of the ten Tribes. From this molestation, the death of Asarhaddon did not only set him free, but gave unto him some part of Assyria, if not (as is commonly, but lesse probably thought) the whole Kingdome. How greatly this was to the liking of the Assyrians, I will not here stand to enquire: his long reign following, and his little intermeddling in matters of Syria, make it plain, that he had work enough at home, either in defending or establishing that which he had gotten. Jesephus gives him the honour of having won Nineve it self, which we may believe; but surely he did not hold it long. For in the times soon following, that great Citie was free, and vanquished Phraortes the Median. Perhaps it yielded upon some capitulation; and and refused afterwards to continue subject, when the Kings, being of the Chaldean race, preferred Babylon before it.

Some think that this was the Assyrian King; whose Captains took Manasses prisoner, but I rather believe those that hold the contrary, for which I have given my reasons in due place. To say truth, I find little cause why Merodach should have looked into those parts, as long as the Femes were his friends, and the Egyptians, that maligned the Northern Empire, held themselves quiet at home, which was untill the time of Psammiticus, about the end of this Kings Reign, or the beginning of his son.

Ben Merodach the son and successor of this King, is not mentioned in the Scriptures, yet is he named by good consent of Authors, and that speak little of his doings. The length of his Reign is gathered by inference to have been one and twenty years; for so much remaineth of the time that passed between the beginning of his Fathers and his Nephews Reigns (which is a known summe) deducting the yeares of his Father, and of his son Nabulassar. This (as I take it) was he that had Manasses Prisoner, and released him. Hee sped ill in Syria; where Psammiticus, by the vertue of his Mercenary Greeks, did much prevail. This may have been some cause that he released Manasses, and did put into his hands some part more of the Kingdome of Samarra: which is made probable by circumstances alleged before.

Nabulassar that reigned in Babylon after his father Ben Merodach, had greater businesse in his own Kingdome, than would permit him to look abroad: inso much as it may be thought to have been a great negligence or oversight of Psammiticus and Necho, that they did not occupy some good part of his Dominions beyond Euphrates. For it was in his time, that Phraortes King of the Medes invaded Assyria, and besieged Nineve; from whence he was not repelled by any force of Nabulassar, but constrained to remove by the coming of the Scythians, who in these ages did overflow those parts of the world, laying hold upon all that they could master by strong hand. Of these Scythians, and the Lordship that they held in Asia, it is convenient that I speak in this place, shewing briefly afore-hand, how the Medes, upon whom they first fell, were busied in the same times with hopes of conquering Assyria.

Phraortes, the sonne of Deiaces, King of the Medes, having by many victories enlarged his Dominions, conceived at length a fair possibility of making himself Lord of Nineve.

That City (as Herodotus reports it) having been a Sovereign Lady, was not forsaken of all her dependants; yet remained in such case, that of her self she was well enough.

This makes it plain, that howsoever Merodach had gotten possession of this imperiall seat, and made it subject as was the rest of the Country; yet it found the means to set it self at liberty: as after this again it did, when it had been regained by Nabulassar his Grand-child.

Sharp warre, and the very novelty of sudden violence, use to dismay any State or Country, not inured to the like: but custome of danger hardeneth even those that are unwarlike. Nineve had been the Palace of many valiant Kings lately reigning therein; it had suffered, and resisted, all the fury, wherewith either Domesticall tumults between the sons of Senacherib, or foreign war of the Babylonians, could afflict it: and therefore it is the lesse wonderfull, that Phraortes did speed so ill in his journey against it. Hee and the most of his Armie perished in that expedition: whereof I find no particular circumstances (perhaps they undervalued their forces, and brought a lesse power than was needfull.) It is enough, that herein we may believe Herodotus.

Cyaxares the son of Phraortes, a braver man of war than his Father, wan as much of Asia the lesse, as lay Eastward, from the River of Halys; he fought revenge upon the Assyrians for the death of his father, and besieged Nineve it self, having a purpose to destroy it. I rather believe Eusebius, that he took the City, and fulfilled his displeasure upon it, than Herodotus, that the Scythian Army came upon him whilst he lay before it. For where equall authorities are contradictory (as Eusebius, though far later than Herodotus, yet having seen other Authors that are now lost, it is to be valued according to his great reading) there do I hold it best, to yield unto the best likelihoods.

To think that the Scythians came upon Cyaxares, whilst he lay before Nineve, were to accuse him of greater improvidence than ought to be suspected, in one commended as a good Souldier. But to suppose that he was faine to leave the Town, when a Warre so dangerous fell upon his own Country, doth well agree both with the condition of such businesse as that Scythian expedition brought into those parts, and with the State of the Chaldaean and Assyrian affairs ensuing.

The destruction of this great City is both foretold in the Book of Tobit, and there set down as happening about these times, of which book whosoever was the Author, he was ancient enough to know the story of those ages, and hath committed no such error in reckoning of times, as should cause us to distrust him in this. As for the Prophecie of Nabum, though it be not limited unto any certain term, yet it appears to have taken effect, in the finall destruction of Nineve by Nabuchodonosor, according to the common opinion. For the Prophet hath mention of a conquest of Egypt, foregoing this calamity, whereof we will speak in due place. Some that ascribe more authority than the reformed Churches yield, to the book of Tobit, are carefull, as in a matter of necessity, to affirm, that about these times, Nineve was taken; but they attribute (conjecturally) the victory over it to Ben Merodach: a needless conjecture, if the place of Eusebius be well considered. Yet I hold it probable, that Nabulassar the son of Ben Merodach did seize upon it, and place a King or Viceroy therein, about such time as the Country of Assyria was abandoned by Cyaxares, when the Scythian Warre overwhelmed Media. For then was the Conquest wrought out ready to his hand; the swelling spirits of the Assyrians were allayed, and their malice to Babylon so much asswaged, that it might be thought a great favour, if Nabulassar, appointing unto them a peculiar King, took him and them in protection: though afterwards to their confusion, this unthankfull People and their King rebelled again, as shall be shewed in the Reign of Nabuchodonosor.

s. IV.

The great expedition of the Scythians, who ruled in Asia eight and twenty years.

t. I.

The time of his expedition.

Now that I have shewed what impediment was given by the Assyrians and the Medes, to the Babylonians, who thereby were much disabled to performe any action of worth upon the Egyptians in Syria; it is time that I speak of that great Scythian expedition, which grievously afflicted not only the Babylonians, but the Medes and Lydians, with the Countries adjacent, in such wise, that part of the trouble redounded even to the Egyptians themselves. Of the Scythian people in generall, Herodotus makes very large discourse, but interlaced, as of matter ill known, with many Fables; of this expedition he tels many particulars, but ill agreeing with consent of time. Concerning his fabulous reports, it will be needlesse to recite them; for they are farre enough distant from the businesse in hand. The computation of times which by inference out of his relations, may seem very strange, needeth some answer in this place: lest otherwise I should either seem to make my self too bold with an Author, in citing him after a manner different from his own tale; or else to be too forgetfull of my self, in bringing to ast upon the Stage, those persons, which I had already buried. Eight and twenty years, hee saith, that the Scythians reigned in Asia, before Cyaxares delivered the Country from them. Yet hee reports a warre between Cyaxares and Haliattes the Lydian, as foregoing the siege of Nineve; the siege of Nineve being ere the Scythians came. And further he tels, how the Scythians, having vanquished the Medes, did passe into Syria, and were encountered in Palestina by Psammiticus King of Egypt, who by gifts and entreaty procured them to depart from him. These narrations of Herodotus may, every one of them, be true; though not in such order of time, as he hath marshalled them. For Psammiticus was dead before Cyaxares began to reign: and Cyaxares had spent half of his forty years, ere Haliattes was King of Lydia, so that hee could not, after those Lydian Warres, reign eight and twenty years together with the Scythians. It is true, that Eusebius doth also call Psammitis the sonne of Phrao Neco, by the name of Psammiticus; and this King Psammitis may, by some strained conjecture, be thought to have been he that met with the Scythians: for hee lived with with both Cyaxares and Haliattes. But Eusebius himself referres all that businesse of the Scythian irruption into Palestina, to Psammiticus the Father of Neco, whom he leaves dead before the Reign of Haliattes. Therefore I dare not rely upon Herodotus, in this matter, otherwise than to believe him, that such things were in these ages, though not in such order as he sets them down.

It remains, that I collect as well as I can, those memorials which I find of this expedition scattered in divers places: a work necessary, for that the greatnesse of this action was such, as ought not to be omitted in generall History; yet not easie, the consent of those that have written thereof, being nothing neer to uniformity.

I have noted before, that in the reign of Ardis King of Lydia, the Cimmerians overran that Kingdome, and were not expelled, untill Haliattes the Nephew of Ardis got the upper hand of them. In these times therefore of Ardis, Sadiattes, and Haliattes, are we to find the eight and twenty years, wherein the Scythians reigned over Asia. Now forasmuch as Psammiticus the Egyptian had some dealings with the Scythians, even in the height of their prosperity, wee must needs allow more than one or two of his last years unto this their Dominion. But the beginning of Haliattes his Reign in Lydia, being three and twenty years compleat after the death of Psammiticus, leaves the space very scant, either for the great victories of the Scythians, necessarily supposed before they could meet the Egyptian in Syria; or for those many losses, which they must have received ere they could be driven quite away. To increase this difficulty, the victorious Reign of Nabuchodonosor in Babylon, is of no small moment. For how may we think it possible, that hee should have adventured the strength of the Kingdome against the Egyptians and Fewes, had he stood in daily fear of losing his own, to a more mighty Nation, that lay upon his neck? To speak simply as it appears to me, the victories ascribed to Cyaxares and Haliattes over these warlike people, were not obtained against the whole body of their Army, but were the defeatures of some troopes that insisted their severall Kingdomes; other Princes, and among these Nabulassar, having the like success, when the pleasures of Asia had mollified the courages of these hardy Northern Laddes. Wherefore we may probably annex the eight and twenty years of the Scythians rule, to as many almost the last of Nabulassars Reign, in compasse whereof their power was at the greatest. This is all that I can say of the time, wherein Asia suffered the violence of their oppressors.

What Nations they were that brako into Asia; with the cause of their Journey.

Touching the expedition it self, Herodotus tells us, that the Cimmerians being driven out of their Country by the Scythians, invaded and wasted some part of Asia; and that the Scythians, not contented with having won the land of the Cimmerians, did follow them, I know not why, into far removed quarters of the world, so (as it were by chance) falling upon Media and Egypt, in this pursuit of men that were gone another way into Lydia. Hereby we may gather that the Cimmerians were an odious and base people; the Scythians, as mischievous and foolish, or else Herodotus, and some other of his Country-men, great slanderers of those, by whom their Nation had been beaten, and Ionis, more than once, grievously ransacked. The great valour of the Cimmerians or Cimbrians is so well known, and their many Conquests so well testified in Histories of divers Nations, that the malice of the Greekes is insufficient to stain them with the note of Cowards. These were the posterity of Gomer, who peopled the greatest part of our Western World; and whose re-flow did overwhelm no small portion of Greece and Asia, as well before and after, as in the age whereof we do now entreat. He that would more largely informe himself of their originall and actions, may peruse Goropius Recanus his Amazonica; of many things in which Book, that may be verified, which the learned Ortelius is said to have spoken of all Goropius his works, that it is easie to laugh at them, but hard to confute them: There we find it proved, by such arguments and authorities as are not lightly to be regarded, that the Cimmerians, Scythians and Sarmatians, were all of one Linage and Nation; howsoever distinguished in name, by reason of their divers tribes, professions, or perhaps dialect of speech. Homér indeed hath mention of the Cimmerians; whose Country whether he placeth in the West, as neer unto the Ocean and bounds of the Earth, or in the North, as being farre from the Sun, and covered with eternall darknesse; certain it is that he would have them neer neighbours to Hell; for hee had the same quarrell to them which Herodotus had, and therefore belike would have made them seeme a kind of Goblins. It was the manner of this great Poet (as Herodotus writing his life affirms) to insert into his works the names of such as lived in his own time, making such mention of them, as the good or ill done by them to himselfe deserved. And for this reason it is proved by Eusebius, that the Cimmerians were so disgraced by him, because they had wasted his Country. Perhaps that invasion of Phrygia by the Amazons, whereof Homer puts a remembrance into Priamus his discourse with Helen, was the very same, which Eusebius noteth to have happened somewhat before the age of Homer, at what time the Cimmerians with the Amazons, together invaded Asia.

This is certain, that both the Amazons and the Cimmerii (who in after-times were called Cimbri) did often break into Greece and Asia, which though it be not in expresse termes written, that they did with joynt-forces, yet seeing they invaded the self-same places, it may well be gathered, that they were companions. One journey of the Amazons into Greece, mentioned also by Eusebius, was by the streights of the Cimmerians, as we find in Diodore, who further telleth us, that the Scythians therein gave them assistance. The same Authour, before his entry into those discourses, of the Amazons, which himselfe acknowledgeth to be fabulous, doth report them to have been wives of the Scythians, and no lesse Warre-like than their Husbands; alleging the example of that Queen who is said to have slain the great Persian Cyrus. That it was the manner of the Cimbri to carry their wives along with them to the warres; and how desperate the courage was of those Women; the terrible descent of them into Italy, when Marinus the Roman overthrew them, gives prooffe sufficient. I will not here enter into a discourse of the Amazons; another place will give me better leisure to speak of them; but seeing that they are noted by divers Historians to have belonged unto the Cimmerians, to the Scythians, and to the Sarmatians, we may therefore the better approve Coropius his conclusion, That these three Nations were one, at least that they were neer allies.

Now as concerning the expulsion of the Cimmerians by the Scythians, it appears to have been none other than the sending a Colony of them forth into Asia, with an Army of Scythians to help them, in purchasing a new seat, and establishing the Plantation.

The Sarmatians also were companions in this journey. For the City of Novograd in Russia (which Country is the same that was called Sarmatia) stood in their way homewards, as shall anon bee further shewed. So that all the North was up in Armes: and therefore it is no marvell though many Countries felt the weight of this great inundation. Such another voyage was that, which the same people made five hundred years and more after this, when they were encountered by the Romans. For they issued from the parts about the Lake Maotis; they were then likewise assisted (saith Plutarch in the most likely report of them) by the Scythians their neighbours; they had in their Army above three hundred thousand fighting men, besides a huge multitude of women and children; they wandered over many Countries, beating all down before them; and finally, thinking to have settled themselves in Italy, they divided their Company, for the more easie passage thither, and were consumed in three terrible battells by the Roman Consuls. Meere necessity enforced these poor Nations to trouble the World, in following such hard adventures. For their Country being more fruitfull of men than of sustenance, and shut up on the North side with intollerable cold, which denied issue that way to their over-swelling multitudes; they were compelled to discharge upon the South, and by right or wrong to drive others out of possession, as having title to all that they had power to get, because they wanted all, that weaker, but more civil, people had. Their sturdy bodies, patient of hunger, cold, and all hardnesse, gave them great advantage over such as were accustomed unto a more delicate life, and could not be without a thousand superfluities. Wherefore most commonly they prevailed very farre; their next neighbours giving them free passage, that they might the sooner be rid of them; others giving them, besides passage, victuals and guides to conduct them to more wealthy places; others hiring them to depart with great presents; so as the farther they went on, the more pleasant Lands they found, and the more effeminate people.

III. of the Cimmerians warre in Lydia.

The first Company of these, consisting for the most part of Cimmerians, held the way of the Euxine Seas, which they had still on the right hand, leaving on the other side, & behind them, the great Mountains of Gauscam. These having passed through the Land of Colchis, that is now called Mengrelli, entered the Country of Lydia, & being arrived in Raphlagonia, fortified the Præmontory, whereon Synope, a famous Haven Town of the Greeks, was after built. Here it seemes that they bestowed the weakest and most unserviceable of their traine, together with the heaviest part of their carriages, under some good guard: as drawing near to those Regions, in conquest whereof they were to trie the utmost hazzard. For in like sort afterwards did the Cimbri (of whom I spak even now) dispose of their impediments, leaving them in a place of strength, where Antwerp now stands, when they drew neare unto Gaul, upon which they determined to adventure themselves in the purchase. From Sinop, the way unto Phrygia, Lydia, and Ionis, was faire and open to the Cimmerians, without any ladg of Mountains, or any deep Rivers at all to stay their march: for Iris and Halys the) had already passed.

What battels were fought between these invaders and the Lydians, & with what variable success the one or other part wanne and lost, I find not written, nor am able to conjecture. This I find that in the time of Ardis, the Cimmerians got possession of Sardis the capitall City of Lydia; only the Castle holding out against them. Further I observe, that whereas Herodotus tells of the acts performed by Gyges and Ardis Kings of Lydia, before this invasion, and by Halysattes and Crausus in the times following, all that Ardis did against the Cimmerians, and all save burning the Milesians Corn fields, that was done in twelve years by Sadyattes his Son (who perhaps had his hands so full of this business, that he could turn them to nothing else). Is quite omitted: whereby it may seeme, that neither of the two did any thing worthy of remembrance in those wars, but were glad enough that they did lose all.

Certainly the miseries of war are never so bitter and many, as when a whole Nation, or great part of it, forsaking their own seats, labour to root out the established possesse of another Land, making room for themselves, their wives, and children. They that fight for the mastery, are pained with tribute, or with some other services and acknowledgements, which had they been yielded at the first, all had been quiet, and no blood shed. But in these migrations, the assailants bring so little with them, that they need all which the defendants have; their Lands and Castell, their houses and their goods, even to the cradles of the sucking infants. The mercilesse termes of this controversie, arme both sides with desperate resolution: seeing the one part must either winne, or perish by famine; the other defend their goods, or lose their lives without redemption. Most of the Countries in Europe have felt examples thereof; and the mighty Empire of Rome was overthrow by such invasions. But our Isle of Britaine can best witness the diversity of Conquests, having by the happy victory of the Romans, gotten the knowledge of all Civill Arts, in exchange of liberty, that was but slenderly instructed therein before; whereas the issue of the Saxon and Danish Wars, was as were the causes, quite contrary. For these did not seek after the Dominion only, but the entire possession of the Country, which the Saxons obtained, but with horrible cruelty, eradicating all of the British Race, & defacing all memoriall of the ancient inhabitants through the greater part of the Land. But the Danes (who are also of the Cimmerian blood) found such end of their enterprize, as it may seeme, that the Cimmerians in Lydia, & Scythians in the higher Asia, did arrive unto. So that by considering the proesse of the one, we shall the better conceive the fortune of the other. Many battels the Danes wonne, yet none of such importance, as sufficed to make them absolute Conquerours: Many the Saxons won upon the Danes, yet not so great, as could drive them quite away, and back from hence, after they had gotten firme footing. But in course of time, the long continuance even of utter enmity, had bred such acquaintance between them, as bowing the natures of both these people, made the one more pliant unto the other. So their disagreeable qualities, both ill and good, being reduced in one mild temper, no small number of the Danes became peaceable cohabitants with the Saxons in England, where great slaughter had made large room; others returning home, found their own Country wide enough to receive them, as having disburthened it self of many thousands, that were sent to seek their graves abroad. And such (as I think) was the end of the Cimmerian warre in Lydia; whereunto though some victory of Halyattes may have hastened the conclusion, yet the wearisome length of time seems to have done most, in compelling them to desire of rest. I know not why I should care to adde hereunto my further conjecture, which is, that the matter was so compounded between the Cimmerians & Halyattes, that the River of Halys should divide their Territories. For Halys was henceforth the border of the Lydians, and on the Eastern side of the River was the Country of the Amazons, that is indeed, of the Cimmerians, and other Scythian people; whose wives and daughters these warlike women are supposed to have been.

And hereunto the quarrell ensuing between Halyattes and Cyaxares the Mede, hath very good reference. For Halyattes (as is said) fought in defence of certain Scythians, upon whom the Median sought revenge. And it stands with reason, that the Lydians and Cimmerians, being much weakened with mutuall slaughters, should have joyned in a league of mutuall defence for their common safety: though otherwise it had been dangerous to Halyattes, if hee had permitted the Median to extend his kingdom so farre Westward, whatsover the pretences might be, of taking revenge upon such as had spoiled each of their Countries. As for that occasion of the Warre between these two Kings, which Herodotus relates, I find it of little waight, and lesse probability. Hee tells of Scythians, that being chased out of their Country by faction, came unto Cyaxares, who comitted unto them certaine Boyes, to be instructed in the Scythian tongue, and feat of Archery. Now it so fell out (saith he) that these Scythians using much to hunt, & commonly bringing home somewhat with them, did neverthelesse other-whiles misse of their game, and came home as they went. Hereupon the King being froward & cholericke, bitterly reviled them; & they, as impatient as he, killed one of the Boyes that was under their charge, whom, dressing like Venison, they presented unto him; which done, they fledde unto Halyattes. This Herodotus delivers, as the ground of a war that lasted six yeeres between the Medes and Lydians; the one King demanding these Fugitives to be delivered into his hand; the other refusing to betray such men as were become his suppliants. To this I will say no more, than that I see no cause that might induce the Scythians to betake themselves to either of these Kings, unto whom their Nation had wrought so much displeasure. Particularly, they had reason to distrust Cyaxares, for the treachery that he shewed in the massacring of their Country-men that were in his Kingdome, of whom it is now meet that we should speak.

IV.

The Warre of the Scythians in the higher Asia.

As the Cimmerians held their course westerly, along the shores of the Euxine sea, so the Scythians and Sarmatians took the other way, and having the Caspian sea on their left hand, passed between it and Caucasus, through Albania, Colchene, and other obscure Nations, where now are the Countries of Servan and Georgia, and so they entered into Media. The Medes encountred them in Armes, but were beaten, and thereupon glad to come to any agreement with them. This was in the time of Phraortes, whilst Psammiticus reigned in Egypt. If it were in the sixt yeere of Nabulassars Reign over Babylon (supposing him to have reigned five and thirty; otherwise we must allow to Ben Merodach what we take from him) then doe the eight and twenty yeeres of their Dominion end, one year before the great Nabuchodonosor was King; so giving him good leave to provide securely for the invasion of Syria; which expedition hee began while his Father yet lived, as Josephus out of Berosus relates the History.

Now the Medes, desirous to save themselves as well as they might, from this terrible nation, which when they had no lust to a second triall of the sword, refused not to under-goe the burthen of a Tribute, but thought nothing dishonourable, that yvould serve to remove these troublesome guests into some other lodging. On the other part, the Scythians finding still the Countries pleasanter & better, the further that they marched into the South, did suffer themselves to be perswaded, that a little more travail yvould adde a great deal more to their content. For they relied so much upon their own valour, that they feared no resistance; & being the bravest men, they thought it reason that they should dwell in the best Region. That Phraortes perswaded them into Egypt, I doe not think: Babylon was near enough; whether if he could send these Locusts to graze, then should not his unfriendly Neighbours have cause to laugh at his misfortune. What shift Nabulassar made with them, or that at all he had any dealings with them, I do not read. But it is well known that his Dominions lay in the middest between Media & Egypt; as also, that they made all those parts of Asia Tributary; wherefore we may very well believe, that they watered their horses in his Rivers, and that he also was content to give them provender.

Psammiticus hearing of their progresse (like the jealous Husband of a fair Wife) took care that they might not look upon Egypt; lest the sight thereof should more easily detain them there, than any force or perswasion that hee could use would send them going. Therefore hee met them in Syria, presuming more on the great gifts which he meant to bestow upon them, than on his Army that should keep them back. Egypt was rich; and half the riches had not been ill spent in saving all. Yet Psammiticus took the most likely course, whereby to make his part good against them, by strong hand, in case they had been so obstinate as to refuse all indifferent composition. For he lay close upon the edge of the Wildernesse in Gaza (as I take it) the Southermost border of Palestina; whence he never advanced to meet with the Scythians, but gave them leave to feel as much of the scalding Sunne-beames, ill agreeing with their temper, as all the length of Syria could bear upon them. When they were come as farre as Ascalon, the next City to Gaza, then did he assay them with goodly words, accompanied with gifts, which were likely to work so much the better, by how much the worse they were pleased with the heat of a Climate so farre different from their own. Psammiticus had at his back a vast wildernesse, over the scorching sands whereof, the Scythians more patient of cold and wet, than of the contrary distempers, could ill have endured to pursue him through unknown wayes, had they fought with him and prevailed, especially the Kingdome of Egypt being ready to entertaine him with relief, and them with new trouble at the end of their weary journey. Wherefore they were content to be intreated, & taking in good part his courteous offers, returned back to visit their acquaintance in the high Countries. The Egyptian King (besides that hee preserved his own Estate from a dangerous adventure, by hying this great Army to depart from him) found all his Coast well repayed in the proceffe of his wars in Syria, where the Nations beyond Euphrates had no power to molest him; being more than ever troubled themselves with the return of their oppressors. For the Scythians, resolving now to seek no further, began to demand more than the Tribute formerly imposed. And not contented to fleece the Naturals vvith grievous exactions, they presumed to live at discretion upon the Country, taking vvhat they listed from the Owners; and many times (as it were to save the labour of taking often) taking all at once. This Tyrannous Dominion they long used over the higher Asia, that is, over the Country lying between the Caspian and Red Seas; and between India and Asia the lesse. Happy it was for the poor people, that in so large a space of ground there was room enough for these new comers; otherwise the calamity that fell, as it were by chance, upon thole private men, to whose wealth any Scythian did bear a fancy, would have lighted in generall upon all at one clap, leaving few alive, and none able to relieve their fellows. Yet it seemes that the heaviest burthen lay upon Media; for it was a fruitfull Country, not farre from their own home, and lay under a Climate well agreeing with the constitution of their bodies; there also it was that they had the fatall blow, by which their insolent Rule was taken from them.

Cyaxares King of the Medes, who in this extremity was no better than a Rent-garrier for the Scythians, perceiving that his Land lay unmanured and waste, through the negligence of his people, that were out of heart by daily oppressions, and that the matter could not be remedied by open force, resolved to prove what might be done by stratagem.

stratagem. The manging of the businesse is thus delivered in brief; That he, and his Medes, feasted the better part of the Scythians, made them drunk, and slew them; recovering hereby the possession of all that they had lost.

Such another slaughter was committed upon the Danes in England; but it was revenged by their Countymen, with greater cruelty than ever they had practised before. That the Scythians which escaped this bloody feast, made any stirre in Media, I do not find; neither do I read that either in reveng hereof, or upon other pretence, the Medes were troubled by invasion from Scythia in time following.

Herod. lib. 4.

This is the more strang, for that the Army returning home out of Medi, was very strong, & encountered with opposition (as Herodotus reports it) no lesse than it had found abroad. Wherefore it may be, that the device of Cyaxares to free his Countrey, took good effect, with lesse blood-shed than hath been supposed. For if he surpris'd all the chief of them, it was no hard matter to make a good composition. Many of them doubtlesse in eight and twenty years had so well fetled themselves, that they were desirous of rest, and might be permitted, without any danger, to remaine in the Country; many (of whom I shall speak anon) having done what they could in the businesse, for which they came forth, were willing to return home with what they had gotten; such as were not pleased with either of these two courses, might goe joyn with the Cimmerians in Lydia, or seeke their fortunes in other Provinces among their own Companions. Whereas all the Families of the North are said to have bin with Nabuchadnezzar, it may be understood, that a great part of the Scythians, upon hope of gain, or desire to keepe what they had already gained, were content to become subject unto Nabulassar: mens love of their wealth being most effectuall, in taming the more unquiet love of inordinate liberty. This is certaine, that Nabuchadnezzar, as ever after, so in his first beginning of warre, did beat the Egyptians, who in ages forgoing had been accustomed to deal with the Babylonians after another fashion: & this new successe of that King may be imputed, in regard of human meanes, to such addition as this of new forces.

Jerem. 35. 9.

Of the Scythian Army returning out of Media, divers Authors report a Story, which confirmes me in the opinion, that this Company went forth to assist their kinned and friends, in acquiring a new seat, and establishing their plantation. For these had left their wives behind them; a good argument to prove that they meant to come again. The Scythian women, to comfort themselves in their husbands absence, became bed-fellows to their slaves. These got a lusty brood of youths, that were loth to be troubled with Fathers-in-Law, & therefore prepared to fight with them at their return. If they were onely the children of slaves, which compounded an Army (as Herodotus would have it, who tels us, that the Scythians were wont to pull out all their bond-mens eyes) it must needs be that they were very boyes, or else that the Women did very little while continue chaste. Wherefore I rather beleieve that tale as it is told by the Russes themselves, who agreeing in the rest with the consent of Histories, make that report of their Ancestors returning homewards, which I will set down, as I find it in Master Docteur Fletcher his exact discourse of the Russe Common-wealth. They understood by the way, that their Cherlockes, or Bond-slaves, whom they left at home, had in their absence possessed their towns, lands, houses, Wives, and all; At which news being somewhat amazed, and yet disdaining the Villany of their servants, they made the more speed home: and so not farre from Novograd met them in warlike manner marching against them. Whereupon advising what was best to be done, they agreed also to set upon them with no other shew of weapon but with their horse-whips (which, as their manner is, every man rideth withall) to put them in remembrance of their servile condition, thereby to terrifie them, and abate their courage. And so marching on, & lashing all together with their whips in their hands, they gave the onset: which seemed so terrible in the eyes of their Villaines, & shooke such a sense into them of the smart of the whip, which they had felt before, that they fled altogether like Sheep before the Drivers. In memory of this victory, the Novogradians ever since have stamped their Coin (which they call a Dingoe Novogradskoy, currant through all Russia) with the figure of a Horseman shaking a whip aloft in his hand. It may seeme, that all the women of that Country have feared the worse ever since, in regard of the universall fault: For such a Pudkey or whip, as terried those slaves, curiously wrought by her self, is the first present that the Moscovian wife, even in time of vvoicing, sends to him that shall be her husband, in token of subjection; being well assured to feel it often on her own loines. But this was a Document unto the Scythians, or rather Sarmatians (for Novograd stands in the Country that was called Sarmatia) to beware of absenting themselves any more so long from their wives; which after this, I find not that they did.

Thus much I thought good to set down of the Scythian expedition; not only because it is the most memorable act performed abroad by that Nation, famous in Histories, and terrible to many Countries; but for that it appears to have been a great cause of the Egyptians prevailing hitherto in Syria, and about Judaea, which continues yet a while the center of our discourse.

S. V.

Of Princes living in divers Countries, in these ages.

Having thus far digressed from the matters of Juda, to avoide all further occasion of doing the like, I will here insert a note of such Kings, and men of mark, as were between the death of Manasses, and the ruine of Jerusalem. Of the Egyptians, Babylonians, Medes, and Lydians, I have spoken as much as I thought needfull. In Rome, Tullus Hostilius held the Kingdome, untill the one and twentieth year of Jehus; at which time Ancus Martius succeeding, reigned four and twenty years. After him L. Tarquinius Priscus, a new-come stranger, but very rich, prevailed so far, by his graciousnesse among the people, that he got the Kingdom to himselfe, disappointing the sonnes of Ancus, over whom he was Tutor. He began in the fourth year of Zedekia, and reigned eight and thirty years. In this time it was, namely, in the second year of the thirtieth Olympiad, that the Lacedemonians bethinking them how to beavenged of the Arcadians, who gave succour to the Messenians against them in the former war, entered their Territory, took the City of Phigalia or Phialia, from whence their Garrisons were soon after beaten out. Cypselus expelling the race of the Bacidae, made himself Lord of Corinth about these times, and governed it in peace thirty years, leaving for successeur his sonne Periander, one of the seven Sages, but a cruell Tyrant: who among other vile acts, slew his own wife, and afterwards, as in her honour, stripped all the Corinthian women stark naked, burning their apparell, as an acceptable offering to her Ghost. Hereby we may perceiue, that the wisdom of the Greeks was not excellent in those dayes, when such a one as this could bee admired as excelling all the Country.

In these times also were Zaleucus and Draco, famous Lawgivers, the one among the Lucians in Italy, the other in the City of Athens. The Lawes of Draco were so rigorous, that he was said to have written them with blood: for he rewarded every small offence with death. Wherefore his Constitutions were soon abrogated, and power given to Solon by the Athenians, to make new in their stead. But the Lawes of Zaleucus were very mild. He forbade any Gentlewoman to walk abroad with more than one Bond-woman attending on her, unlesse it were when she was drunk; or to goe forth of the Town by night, unlesse it were to some sweet-hearts bed; or to dresse her self up in immodest bravery, unlesse it were to inveigle a lover. By which pleasant Ordinances he effected his desire; for none would seem, in breaking the Statutes, to be in such case as challenged the dispensation. It is noted in this man as a singular example of justice, that when his own son had committed adultery, and was therefore to lose both his eyes, hee did not cause him to be pardoned, but gave one eye of his own to save the young man (who also lost one) from utter blindness.

I shall not henceforth need so farre to wander, as hitherto I often have done, in pursuing of actions collateral to the History, for inserting them in their order of time. The Chaldeans will soon fall under the Persians; ere long, encounter with the Greeks; the Greeks, with the Romans; the Romans, with many Nations. Concerning all these, as they shall successively present themselves, in their flourishing estate, it will be enough to recapitulate the most memorable accidents, that befell them in their Minority. But in the long space of more than thirteen hundred years, which passed between the calling of Abraham, and the destruction of Jerusalem, wee find little matter, wherein the History of Israel had any dealing with other Nations, than the very neere borders. Yet read wee of many Kingdomes, that in these many ages were created; and thrown down; as likewise, many memorable acts were performed in Greece and elsewhere, though not following one another at any neer distance; all which must have been quite omitted, or else reserved unto a very unreasonable rehearfall, had they not been disposed in this method, whereof he that will not allow the conveniency, may pardon the necessity.

S. VI.

The oppression of Judea, and destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans.

NOW to return to the Jewish Story, from whence we have so far digressed. In the third year of Jehojakim, Nabuchodonosor the second, his Father yet living, entered Judea with a great Army, who besieging and forcing Jerusalem, made Jehojakim his Vassall in despite of Necho, that had established him King, and took with him for pledges Daniel; being as yet a child, with Ananias, Misael, and Azarias. Also he took a part of the Church treasures; but stayed not to search them thoroughly; for Necho hasted to the succour of Jehojakim, hoping to find Nabuchodonosor in Judea: wherein this great Babylonian had no disposition to hazard himself: and his Army, it being a Country of an evil affection towards him, as also far off from any succour or sure place of retreat. If he had, as may be supposed, any great strength of Scythian horsemen in his Army, it was the more wisely done of him, to fall back out of the rough, & mountainous, and over-hot Country, into places that were more even and temperate. But besides all these reasons, the death of his father happening at the same time, gave him just occasion to return home, and take possession of his own Kingdom, before he proceeded further in the second care, of adding more unto it. This he did at reasonable good leisure: for the Egyptian was not ready to follow him so far, and to bid him battle, untill the new year came in; which was the fourth of Jehojakim, the first of Nabuchodonosor, and the last of Necho. In this year the Babylonian lying upon the Bank Euphrates (his own Territory bounding it on the North-side) attended the arrivall of Necho. There, after a resolved contention for victory, Necho was slain, and his Army remaining forced to save it self, which full ill it did, by a violent retreat. This victory Nabuchodonosor so well pursued, as he recovered all Syria, and whatsoever the Egyptians held out of their proper Territory towards the North. The Egyptians being in this conflict beaten, & altogether for the present discouraged, Jehojakim held himself quiet, as being friend in heart unto the Egyptian, yet having made his peace with the Chaldean the year before; who contented with such profit as hee could then readily make, had forbore to lay any Tribute upon Juda. But this cool reservedness of Jehojakim, was, on both sides, taken in ill part. The Egyptian King Psammetichus, who succeeded unto Necho, began to think upon restoring Jehoaiah, taken prisoner by his Father, and setting him up as a Domestickall Enemy, against his ungratefull brother. Against all such accidents, the Judean had prepared the usuall remedy practised by his forefathers: for he had made his own son Jechonia King with him long before, in the second year of his own Reign, when the Boy was but eight years old. As for this rumour of Jehoaiah's return, the Prophet Jeremy foretold, that it should prove idle, saying: Hee shall not return thither, but he shall die in the place whither they have led him captive, and shall see this Land no more. The Egyptians indeed, having spent all their Mercenary forces, and received that heavy blow at Carchemish, had not remaining such proportion of sharp steel, as of fair gold, which without other help, is of little effect. The valour of Necho was not in Psammetichus, who reigning after Psammetichus, did once adventure to shew his face in Syria; but after a big look, hee was glad to retire, without adventuring the hazard of a battell. Wherefore this decaying Nation fought onely with brave words, telling such frivolous tales, as men that mean to doe nothing, use, of their glorious acts fore-past, against Iosias & Jehoaiah. In this case it was easie for Jehojakim to give them satisfaction, by letting them understand the sincerity of his affection towards them, which appeared in time following. But Nabuchodonosor went to work more roundly. He sent a peremptory message to Jehojakim, willing him not to stand upon any nice points, but acknowledge himself a Subject; and pay him Tribute: adding hereunto such fearfull threats, as made the poor Judean lay aside all thought of Pharaoh, and yeeld to doe, as the more mighty would have him. So hee continued in the obedience of Nabuchodonosor three years. At this time Jeremy the Prophet cried out against the Jenes, putting them in mind that he had now three and twenty years exhorted them to repentance, but because they had stopt their ears against him, and the rest of the Prophets, hee now pronounced their captivity at hand, and that they should endure the yoke of bondage full seventy years. The same calamity he threatened to all the neighbouring Nations, to the Egyptians, Moabites, Ammonites, Idumeans, and the rest; foretelling that they should all drink out of the Babylonian Pitcher, the wine of his fury, whom they had forsaken; and after the seventy years expired, that the Babylonians themselves should taste of the same Cup, and be utterly subverted by the Medes, and Jerem. 25.

Jehojakim, after he heard a part of it, and perceived the ill newes therein delivered, made no more adoe, but did cut the Book in pieces and cast it into the fire. All which Jeremy caused to be new written with this addition; that the dead body of Jehojakim should be cast out, exposed in the day to the heat, and in the night to the frost, and there should be none of his seed to sit on the Throne of David.

Time thus running on, while Jehojakim rested secure of all danger, as Tributary to the Babylonian, yet well thought of by the Egyptian; the mighty City of Tyre opposed it self against the Chaldean forces, and upon just confidence of her own strength, despised all preparation that could be made against her. Now forasmuch as the terme of seventy years was prescribed unto the desolation, as well of Tyre, as of Jerusalem, and other towns and countries; it is apparent, that they which referre the expugnation of this City unto the nineteenth year of Nabuchodonosor, have sute authority for their warrant. Whereupon likewise it followes of necessity, that the siege thereof began in the seventh of his Reign; as having lasted thirteen years.

Here I will take leave to intrude a brief note, concerning the severall beginnings that are reckoned of this great Prince his Rule, whereupon hath risen much disputation. The third year of Jehojakim, was the last of Nabulassar, who being delivered from other cares, took notice of such as had revolted from him unto Pharaoh Necho, and sent this Noble Prince his son, with an Army into Syria, to reclaim them. In this expedition was Daniel carried away, who therefore makes mention of the same year. The year next following, being the fourth of Jehojakim, was the first of Nebuchadnezzar; which Jerem. 25. 1. my affirmeth in expresse words; and from this we reckon all his time and actions that follow. In his three and twentieth year he conquered Egypt; and then began to reign as a great Monarch, finding none that durst offend him. The second from this year it was, wherein hee saw that vision, of the Image consisting of sundry Metals; which did prefigure the succession of great Kingdomes, that should rule the Earth, before the coming of Christ. I will not stand to dispute about this, which is the best conclusion that I find, of long disputations: but return unto the siege of Tyre, which began in the seventh of his Reign.

The City of Tyre covered all the ground of an Island, that was divided from the main, by a deep and broad channell of the Sea. The Chaldeans had no Fleet, and were no Sea-men; the Tyrians, in multitude of goodly Sips, and skill to use them, excelled all other Nations; and every wind, from one part or other, brought needfull provisions into the City. Wherefore neither force, nor famine could greatly hurt the place, whereof neverthelesse the judgements of God (denounced against it by Esay, Jeremy, Ezekiel) had threatened the destruction; and the obstinate resolution of Nabuchodonosor had fully determined to performe it. This high-minded King, impatient of resistance, undertook a vast piece of work, even to fill up the Sea that parted the Island from the Continent. The City of old Tyris, that stood opposite to the new, upon the firm Land, and the mountain of Libanus neer adjoining that was loaden with Cedars, and abundance of other trees, might furnish him with materials. Thirteen years were spent in this laborious, and almost hopelesse businesse. Which needeth not seem strange: for Alexander working upon that foundation which was remaining of Nabuchodonosor's Peere, and being being withall assisted by a strong Fleet, was yet seven moneths ere he could make way into the City. Wherefore, if the raging of the Sea was able to carry away that where-with Alexander laboured to cover a Shelye, with much more violence could it overturn, and as it were consume, the work of Nabuchodonosor, who laid his foundations in the bottom of the deep, striving as it were, to fill the empty belly of this Cormorant, whereas the Macedonian did only stop the throat of it. Every man knows, God could have furthered the accomplishment of his own threats, against this place (though it had not pleased him to use, either Miracle, or such of his more immediate weapons, as are Earthquakes, and the like) by making at least the Seas calm, and adding the favourable concurrence of all second helps. But so it pleaseth him oftentimes, in chastising the pride of man, to use the hand of man, even the hand of man striving, as may seem, against all resistance of nature and fortune. So in this excessive labour of the Chaldeans, Every head was made bald, and every shoulder was made bare. Yet Nabuchodonosor would not give over till he was master of the Town.

Ezek. 26.

Ezek. 29.

Jud. l. 10. c. 7.

When he was entred upon this desperate service, whether it were so, that some Josses received some mutiny in his Army, or (which is most likely, and so Josephus reports) some glorious rumour of the Egyptians, gave courage to his evil willers; Fehojakim renounced his subjection, and began to hope for the contrary of that which quickly fell out. For Nabuchodonosor gave him no leisure to do much hurt: but with part of his Army marched directly into Judea, where the amazed King made so little resistance (the Egyptians having left him, as it were, in a dream) that he entred Jerusalem and layed hands on Fehojakim, whom he first bound and determined to send to Babylon; but changing counsell, he caused him to be slain in the place, and gave him the Sepulchre of an Asse, to be devoured by beasts and ravenous birds, according to the former Prophecies: leaving in his place Fehojakim or Fechonias his son; whom, after three moneths and ten dayes, Nabuchodonosor removed, and sent prisoner to Babylon, with Ezekiel, Mardocheus and Fesedech, the high Priest; The mother of Fechonias, together with his servants Eunuchs, and all the ablest men, and best Artificers of the Land, were also then carryed away Captives. This Fechonias, following the counsell of Jeremy the Prophet, made no resistance; but submitted himself to the Kings will: wherein he both pleased God, and did that which was best for himself; though at the present it might seem otherwise, to such as considered the evil that befell him, rather than the greater evil that he thereby avoided. This onely particular act of his is recorded, which was good. But it seems that he was partaker, at least of his Fathers faults, if not an instigator, which was the cause, that his submitting himself to Gods pleasure did not preserve his Estate: for so we read in generall words, that he did evil in the sight of the Lord, according to all that his Father had done. In his stead Nabuchodonosor established Mathania his Uncle in the Kingdom of Juda, and called him Zedechias, which is as much to say, as the justice of God. For like as Neco King of Egypt had formerly displaced Iehoahaz, after his Father Josias was slain, and set up Fehojakim, the son of another mother; so Nabuchodonosor slew Iehoakim, who depended on the Egyptians, and carrying his son Fechonias Prisoner to Babel, gave the Kingdom to this Zedechias, that was whole Brother to that Fehozabaz, whom Neco took with him into Egypt. From Zedechias he required an oath for his faithfull obedience, which Zedechias gave him, and called the living God to witnesse in the same, that he would remain assured to the Kings of Chaldea.

In the first year of Zedechias, Jeremy saw and expounded the Vision of the ripe and rotten Grapes, the one signifying those Judeans that were carried away captive, the other those that stayed and were destroyed.

In the fourth of Zedechias, Jeremy wrote in a book all the evill that should fall upon Babylon, which book or scrole he gave to Sheraisa, when he went with the King Zedechias to Babylon, to visit Nabuchodonosor, willing him first to read it to the Captive Fewes, and then to bind it to a stone, and cast it into Euphrates, pronouncing these words: Thus shall Babel be drowned, and shall not rise from the evill that I will bring upon her. This journey of Zedechias to Babel is probably thought to have been in way of visitation, carrying some presents. But I further think, that he had some sure there to make, which his Lordly Master refused to grant, and sent him away discontented. For at his return all the bordering Princes sent Messengers to him, inciting him (as it seems) to those unquiet courses, from which Jeremy detoured both him and them. The Prophet, by Gods appoint-appointment, made bonds and yokes, one of which he wore about his own neck, others he sent unto the five Kings, of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre and Zidon by those Messengers which came to visit Zedechias: making them know, that if they and the Kings of Juda abode in the obedience of Babylon, they should then possesse and enjoy their own countries; if not, they should assuredly perish by the sword, by fire, and by pestilence.

He also foretold them, that those Vessels which as yet remained in Jerusalem, should also travell after the rest, and at length they should be restored again.

The same year Ananias, the false Prophet, took off the wooden Chain which Jeremy wore in sign of the Captivity of the Fewes, and brake it: Vaunting, that in like manner, after two years God would break the strength of Babel, and the yoke which he layd on all Nations; restore Fechonias and all the Fewes, with the Vessels and riches of the Temple, and give an end to all these troubles. But Jeremy, in stead of his wooden yoke, wore a Coller of yron: and in sign that Ananias had given a deceitfull and fallie hope to the people, he foretold the death of this cold Prophet, which seized upon him in the second Moneth. After this, when Zedechias had wavered long enough between Faith and Passion, in the eighth year of his reign, hee practised more seriously against Nabuchodonosor, with his Neighbours the Edomites, Ammonites, Moabites, Tyrans, and others that were promised great aydes of the Egyptians: in confidence of whose resistance, he determined to shake off the Babylonian yoke. Hereof when Nabuchodonosor had knowledge, he marched with his Army in the dead of Winter, toward Jerusalem, and besieged it. Jeremy perswaded Zedechias to render the City and himself; but being confident of the help from Egypt, and being perswaded by his Counsellors and false Prophets, that it was impossible that the Kingdom of Juda should be extirpate, untill the coming of Silo (according to the Prophecy of Jacob) he despised the words of Jeremy, and imprisoned him. For Jeremy had told the King that the City should be taken and burnt; that the King should not escape, but be taken prisoner, and brought to the presence of Nabuchodonosor; that he should not perish by the sword, but being carried to Babel, die his naturall death.

Jer. 32. & 34.

Jerusalem being the following year surrounded by Nabuchodonosors Armie; the King of Egypt, Pharao Hophra, according to Jeremy, (Herodotus calleth him Apries) entred the border of Juda with his Army to succour Zedechias, of whose revolt he had been the principall Author. But Jeremy gave the Fewes faithfull counsell, willing them not to have any trust in the succours of Egypt: for he assured them that they should return again, and in no sort relieve them. And it fell out accordingly. For when the Chaldeans removed from Jerusalem to encounter the Egyptians, these vaunting Parrons abandoned their enterprize, and taking Gaza in their way homeward, returned into Egypt, as if they had already done enough; leaving the poor people of Jerusalem to their destined miseries.

Herod. lib. 2.

In the mean while the Fewes, who in their first extremity had manumised their Hebrew Bond-men (as Gods Law required at the year of Jubile) and made them free, thereby the better to encourage them to fight; did now upon the breaking up of the Chaldean Army, repent them of their Charity: and thinking all had been at an end, held them perforce to their former slavery. But the Chaldees being returned to the siege, the Prophet Jeremy, when the State of Jerusalem began now to grow to extremity, counselled Zedechias to render himself unto them; assuring him of his own life, and the safety of the Citie, if he would so do. But his obstinate heart conducted him to that wretched end, which his neglect of God, and his infidelitie and perjurie, had provided for him.

lib. 10. cap. 11.

Three and twenty Moneths (as some do reckon it) or, according to Josephus, eighteen, the Babylonian Army lay before Jerusalem, and held it exceeding straightly besieged, For they built Forts against it round about, or (as P. Martyr hath it) extruxerunt contra eam turres ligneam per circuitum: They surrounded the City with wooden Towers, so as the besieged could neither fall out, nor receive into the City any supply of men or victuals. Josephus reports, that they over-topped the Walls with high Towers raised upon Mounts, from which they did so beat upon the Wall with their engines, that the defendants were compelled to forsake their Stations. Now although it were so that the besieged also raised Counter-buildings, like unto these, yet the great King of Babel, who commanded all the Regions thereabouts, and had the Woods and Rivers to obey him, found means to overthrow all the Citizens endeavours; and to beat down as fast from without, as they raised from within; the body and foundation of his own works being guarded by the Walls of Jerusalem interposed; and theirs within, layd open to their enemies disturbance. Besides, both Famine and Pestilence (which commonly accompany men straightly besieged) grew on fast upon them, whereby, when the number, strength, and courage of the Jewes failed, the Chaldeans made a breach, the and forcing an entry, their Princes did seat themselves, as Lords of the Town, in the middle gate. Zedechias beholding this uncomfortable sight, and finding no remedy to the danger present, lost both his courage and his hope at once; and shifted himself, together with his Wives, Children, Princes, and principall servants, out of the Citie, by a way under ground; leaving his amazed and guidelesse people, to the mercilesse swords of their enemies. Thus he, who, when Jeremy the Prophet perswaded him to render himself, despised both the counsell of God, and the force of Nabuchodonosor, used now that remedy, which Wolphins truly termeth, Triste, turpe, & infelix: Wofull, shamefull, and unfortunate.

By this secret subterranean vault, Zedechias making his stealth, recovered (by the help of the dark night) the Plains or Desarts of Fericho: but by reason of the train that followed him and his (every one leading with him those whom they held most dear unto them) he was easily traced and pursued. How great soever the company was that attended on him, yet, as Josephus reports it, they, on whose fidelity he most reposed himself, no sooner beheld the Chaldeans approach, but they all abandoned his defence, and shuted themselves into the Desarts, as they could. For whom God had forsaken, no man followed, but the ministers of his vengeance; by whom Zedechias being made Prisoner, with his Children and Princes, he was conveyed to Rebla or Reblath, a City (as some think) of Nephthalim, where Nabuchodonosor then lay, as a place indifferent between Jerusalem and Tyre, with both which at once he had to doe.

Now after Nabuchodonosor had layd before Zedechias the many graces and benefits conferred upon him, together with the notable falshood and perjury, wherewith he had requited them; he commanded his Children, Princes and Friends to be slain before his face. This being done, to the end that so lamentable a spectacle should be the last that ever he should behold in the World, he caused his eyes to be torn out of his head, and so carried him in a slavish manner to Babel, where he consumed the rest of his wretched life in perpetuall imprisonment. Herein this most marvellous Prophecy of Ezechiel was performed; Adducam eum in Babyloniam, & ipsam non videbit: I will bring him into Babylon, and he shall not see it.

Thus in the eleventh and last year of Zedechias, which was the eighteenth of Nabuchodonosor, the Chaldeans entred the City by force, where sparing no sex nor age, they committed all to the sword that they therein found.

In the year next following, Nabuzaradan Generall of the Army, burnt the Kings Palace, and the rest of Jerusalem: and after this fire had lasted from the seventh to the tenth day, he also burnt the Temple of God to the ground, when it had stood four hundred thirty and one years.

After this, upon a second search, Nabuzaradan (not yet satiated with blood) commanded seventy and two others to be slaughtered, which had hidden themselves from the first fury, to wit, the chief, and the second Priest, two Commanders of Zedechias his men of Warre, five of his House-hold servants, and others to that number; carrying away to Babylon the ablest of the people throughout all Judea; and leaving the poorest labouring foules, with some that followed the party of Nabuchodonosor, to till the ground: over whom he left Governour, Godolia the Nephew of that Saphan, whom Josias had formerly employed in the reformation of Religion, who is, for his justice and equity, by Josephus highly commended. This man, a Jew by Nation, left Zedechias, as it seemeth, in the beginning of the Warre: and by Jeremies desire to live with him, it appeareth that he had embraced the same advice which the Prophet gave unto Zedechias; which was, to submit himself altogether to the Babylonian; who being ordained by God to exercise his justice, was therefore resistlesse. The Prophet Jeremy being left to his own choice, either to live in Chaldea, or elsewhere, he made election of Godolia, to whom he was recommended; who not only embraced Jeremy, but gave comfort to all the other Jewes that were left under his charge, promising them favour & liberty.

so long as they remained obedient subjects to Nabuchodonosor, by whom he was established Provinciall Governour of his own Nation.

But ere that year was expired, a Prince of the late Kings house (who during the siege of Jerusalem, had kept himself out of the storm, with Baalis King of the Amonites) being followed by ten other chosen men, while Godolia feasted them in Maspha or Mispha, the City of his residence, trayterously slew him, together with divers Chaldeans and Jewes that accompanied him. This done, he made an escape, and in his way encountering with eighty persons, repairing towards Godolia with presents, he slew the most of them, and spared the rest, because they promised to discover unto him some Treasures hidden in the fields during the war. He also took with him a Daughter of Zedechias, committed to the care of Godolia by Nabuchodonosor. This practice and intent of Ismael had been formerly discovered unto Godolia by Johanan, one of the Leaders of the few remaining Jewes; but Godolia was incredulous.

Judea being now left without a Governour (for Ismael durst not take it upon him, but retired himself, or rather fled as fast as he could to the Ammonites) the residue of the Jewes, fearing the revenge of the Chaldeans, resolved to fly away into Egypt, and brought Jeremy to ask counsell of God for them: who readily made them answer, that if they remained in Judea, God would provide for them, and shew them mercy; but if they sought to save themselves in Egypt, that they should then undoubtedly perish. Notwithstanding this advice, the Jewes held their determination; and despising the Oracle of God, and constraining Jeremy and Baruch to accompany them, they travelled into Egypt, and inhabited by the permission of Pharao, near unto Taphnes: where when Jeremy often reprehended them for their Idolatry, foretelling both the destruction of themselves, and the Egyptians, also, he was by these his own hard-hearted and ungratefull Country-men, stoned to death; and by the Egyptians, who greatly revenged him, buried neer the Sepulchre of their own Kings.

THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORIE OF THE WORLD:

Intreating of the Times from the destruction of Jerusalem to the time of Philip of MACEDON.

THE THIRD BOOK.

CHAP. I.

Of the time passing between the destruction of Jerusalem, and the fall of the Assyrian Empire.

S. I.

Of the connexion of sacred and prophane Historie.

THE course of Time, which in profane Histories might rather be discerned through the greatest part of his way hitherto passed, in some out-worn footsteps, than in any beaten path, having once in Greece by the Olympiads, and in the Eastern countries by the account from Nabonassar, left surer marks, and more applicable to actions concurrent, than were the War of Troy, or any other token of former date; begins at length in the ruin of Jerusalem to discover the connexion of antiquity fore-spent, with the story of succeeding ages. Manifest it is, that the originall and progresse of things could ill be sought in those that were ignorant of the first creation: as likewise that the affairs of Kingdoms and Empire afterwards grown up, are not to be found among those that have now no state nor policy remaining of their own. Having therefore pursued the story of the World unto that age, from whence the memory of succeeding accidents is with little interruption of fabulous discourse derived unto us, I hold it now convenient briefly to shew by what means and circumstances the History of the Hebrews, which of all other is the most ancient, may be conjoyned with the following times, wherein that Image of sundry metals, discovered by God unto Nebuchadnezzar, did reign over the earth, when Israel was either none, or an unregarded Nation.

Herein I doe not hold it needfull to insist upon those authorities which give, as it were by heare-say, a certain year of some old Assyrian King unto some action or event, whereof the time is found expressed in Scripture: for together with the end of Ninus his line in Sardanapalus, if not before, all such computations were blotted out; the succession of Belochus and his issue that occupied the kingdom afterwards, depending upon the uncertain relations of such as were neither constant in assigning the years of his beginning, nor of credit enough for others to rely upon. Let it therefore suffice that the consent and harmony which some have found in the years of those over-worn Monarchs, doth preserve their names, which otherwise might have been forgotten. Now concerning the later Kings of that Nation, howsoever it be true that we find the names of all or most of them in Scriptures, which are recorded by prophane Historians, yet hereby could we only learn in what age each of them lived, but not in what year his reign began or ended, were it not that the reign of Nebuchadnezzar is more precisely applied to the times of Jehojakim and Zedechia. Hence have we the first light whereby to discover the means of connecting the sacred and prophane Histories. For under Nabuchadnezzar was the beginning of the captivity of Juda, which ended when 70. years were expired; and these 70. years took end at the first of Cyrus, whose time being well known, affords us means of looking back into the ages past, and forwards into the race of men succeeding. The first year of Cyrus his reign in Persia, by generall consent, is joyned with the first year of the 55. Olympiad, where, that he reigned three and twenty years before his Monarchy, and seven years afterwards, it is apparent, and almost out of controverfie. Giving therefore four hundred and eight years unto the distance between the fall of Troy, and the instauration of the Olympiad, by Iphitus; we may easily arrive unto those antiquities of Greece, which were not merely fabulous. As for Princes ruling the whilst in sundry parts of the world, S. Augustine and others may be trusted in setting down their times, which they had by Tradition from Authors of well-approved faith and industry.

From Cyrus forwards, how the times are reckoned unto Alexander, and from him to the battell of Actium, it were (peradventure) in this place impertinent to set down. But seeing that the beginning and end of the Babylonian captivity are marks whereby we are chiefly directed, in passing from the first unto the latest years of the world through any story, with least interruption; it is very expedient that we take some pains to inform our selves truly of the 70. years during which it continued, even from Nabuchadnezzar unto Cyrus.

A briefe rehearsal of two opinions touching the beginning of the captivity: with an answer to the cavils of Porphyrie, inveighing against S. Matthew and Daniel, upon whom the later of these opinions is founded.

Many Commentators, and other Historians and Chronologers find that the captivity then began when Jechonias was carried prisoner into Babylon; eleven years before the final destruction of Jerusalem under Zedechias. This they prove out of divers places in Ezekiel, especially out of the fourteenth chapter, where he makes a plain distinction between the beginning of the Captivity, and utter destruction of Jerusalem by Nabuzaradan, in these words, In the five and twentieth year of our being in Captivitie, in the beginning of the year, in the tenth day of the month, in the fourteenth year after that the Cisse was smitten. In which words he beginneth the captivity in plain terms, eleven years before the City was destroyed. Beroaldus is of opinion that it began in the first of Nabuchodonosor, and the fourth of Joaikim, which he endeavours to prove out of the second of Chronicles, but more especially out of Saint Matthew, and Daniel, whose words afford matter of disputation, but serve not to make good so much as Beroaldus would enforce. That place of S. Matthew, and the whole book of Daniel have ministred occasion of scoffing and railing at the Christian Religion to that wretched man Porphyrie, who, not understanding how the sons of King Jesus were called by divers names, as Epiphanius hath shewed at large, thought that the Apostle had spoken he knew not what in reckoning the sons, or, according to some Translations, the Sonne and Nephews of that good King, begotten about the time of the Captivity. Upon Daniel also the same Porphyrie doth spend the twelfth of his malicious books written against the Christians, affirming, that these prophecies and visions remembered by Daniel, were written long after his death, and at, or near the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. This fond supposition of his, Eusebius, Apollonius, and others, have sufficiently answered. For the seventy Interpreters, who converted the old Testament about an hundred years before Epiphanes, did also turn this book of Daniel out of Hebrew into Greek, as a part of Scripture received. And were there no other argument to confound Porphyrie, than that of Alexander Macedon, it were sufficient, who lived divers years before Antiochus Epiphanes. For Saddus the high Priest shewed that great Conquerour, when he came towards Jerusalem to have destroyed it, this book of Daniel, wherein he beheld his own glory foretold, as the same was plainly expounded unto him; which not only stayed his hand from the harme of that City and people, but his assurance and resolution was so confirmed and strengthened thereby, as despising all future perill and resistance, he conquered Darius, and the Eastern Empire, in a shorter time than Nabuchodonosor had done one City, to wit, Tyre in Phoenicia.

It is true indeed that the Jews themselves give lesse authority to Daniel, than to Moses and the Prophets, accompting his book among those which they call Cetaphim, or Hagiographa, or holy Writings, which they say *Esdra*s and the Seniors of the Synagogue compiled after their return from Babylon. But first, that the book of Daniel (I mean so much as is found in the Hebrew) is Canonically: secondly, that it was written by Daniel himself, and not by *Esdra*s and the Seniors, we may assure our selves by testimony of Counells and Fathers. For in the Councell of Laodicea held about the year of our Lord 368. after the death of Jovinian the Emperour, and after the Nicene Councell three and forty years, this book of Daniel was received, verified and confirmed among the other Canonically Scriptures, as in the Epitome of the same Councell it may be seen; and so doth Meliton the most antient Bishop of Sardis number it, witness Eusebius in his Ecclesiasticall History, the fourth book, and five and twentieth chapter: so doth the same Author in the Catalogue of Canonically books upon Origen: so doth Hilarius in his Preface upon the Psalms, and Epiphanius in his book of Weights and Measures, &c. To these I may adde Saint Hierome, Gregorie Nazianzene, and others. For the Hagiographie books or holy Writings, the Jews and Rabbines reckon to be these: Daniel, Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Hester, Esdra, Nehemia, and the Chronicles. And that it was Daniel, and not *Esdra*s, that wrote this book, Gods commandment unto him by his Angell, to seal up the same to the time appointed, is an unanswerable testimony. Yea, that which exceedeth all strength of other proof, our Saviour Christ, who citeth no Apocryphall Scripture, in Matthew and Mark allegeth Daniel the Prophet, to wit, the last verse of his ninth chapter. Further, in the fifth of John, Christ distributeth the risen from the dead, as in Daniel the twelfth, verse the second, Saint Paul describeth Antichrist out of Daniel, and the Revelation is wholly an interpretation of *Daniel*s visions.

That the 70. years of captivity are to be numbred from the destruction of Jerusalem; not from the migration of Jechonia.

HAVING thus far digressed in maintaining that authority which must often be cited in the present argument, it is now convenient, that we return unto the differences of opinion concerning the beginning of these 70. years. Neither will I stand to trouble my self and others with laying open the grounds or weakness of that which Eusebius and some few namelesse Authors have sometimes held in this point, which is lately revived by Beroaldus; but will forthwith enter into consideration of that opinion, which many both ancient and late Writers have so earnestly maintained, that it wants not much of being common.

Four Kings of Juda were carried away captives to Babylon: First, Manasses, then Jehojakim, and with him among others, Daniel the Prophet: thirdly, Jechonia, and with him Ezechiel: lastly, Zedechias, at which time the city & temple were destroyed. To the first of these captivities the beginning of the 70. years is referred by none that I have read; to the second, by few, and with weak proof; to the third, by very many, and with much confidence. For besides those places of Ezechiel already cited, there is a strong argument gathered gathered out of Jeremy, which may seem to make the matter plain. For the Prophet, in comforting the people that were carried away with Jechonia, useth these words: Thus saith the Lord, After 70. years be accomplished at Babel, I will visit you, and perform my good promise towards you, and cause you to return to this place.

But it stands indeed with little reason that we should seek the interpretation of a prophecy out of circumstances, when the prophecy is such as doth sufficiently expound it self. Jeremy hath already, in the fourth year of Jehojakim, denounced the judgement of God against the Land, for the sins and impenitency of that obstinate people, in these words: *Behold, I will send and take to me all the families of the North, saith the Lord, and Nebuchadnezzar the King of Babel, my servant, and will bring them against this Land, and against the Inhabitants thereof, and against all these Nations round about, and I will destroy them, and make them an astonishment, and an hissing, and a continuall desolation. Moreover, I will take from them the voice of mirth, and the voice of gladnesse, the voice of the Bridegroom, and the voice of the Bride, the noise of the mill-stones, and the light of the candle, and this whole Land shall be desolate, and an astonishment, and these Nations shall serve the King of Babel 70. years. And when 70. years are expired, I will visit the King of Babel: Here we see prescribed unto the captivity the terme of 70. years; which were to commence, neither when the prophecy was uttered, nor when Jehojakim, who then reigned, was taken by Nebuchadnezzar, nor yet in the time of Jechonia, but with the utter desolation of the City, whereof Jeremy did again give notice to those that were already in Babylon, at such time as he sent them the comfort of deliverance before rehearsed. And so did the people understand this prophecy, in those times when they saw it accomplished, beginning the 70. years at the time of the desolation, as manifestly appears in the end of the History of Juda, where it is said thus: *They burnt the house of God, and brake down the wall of Jerusalem, and burnt all the Palaces thereof with fire, and all the precious vessels thereof to destroy all: And they that were left by the sword, carried he away to Babel, and they were servants to him and to his sons, untill the kingdome of the Persians had rule, to fulfill the word of the Lord by the mouth of Jeremia, untill the Land had her fill of her Sabbaths: for all the days that she lay desolate, she kept Sabbath, to fulfill 70. years. But in the first year of Cyrus King of Persia when the word of the Lord spoken by the mouth of Jeremia, was finished, the Lord stirred up the spirit of Cyrus. We seldom find one piece of Scripture so precisely and plainly expounded by another, as in this prophecy, to have afterwards been the subject of alteration. For one can hardly devise how, either the desolation could have been expressed more sensibly, than it was by the Prophet, or the event of the prophecy have been more exactly set down, than it was in the place now last of all cited. If it be requisite that we bring more proof in so evident a case, the ninth Chapter of Daniel yeelds testimony sufficient, unto this expedition of Jeremia his prophecy, that Jerusalem was to lye waste 70. years. For in the first year of Darius the Mede, which was the last of the 70. Daniel obtained of God, the deliverance that had been promised, by prayer, which he made upon consideration of the time that was expired: as he telleth in these words: *In the first year of his reign, I Daniel understood by books the number of the years whereof the Lord had spoken unto Jeremia the Prophet, that he would accomplish 70. years in the desolation of Jerusalem. So that howsoever the time of Daniel his own captivity be reckoned from the taking of Jehojakim, and that the people carried away with Jechonia, did accompt, as well they might, the years of their own captivity; yet with the generall desolation of the Country, wherein were few or none of the Israelites left remaining to inhabite, began in the nineteenth year of Nabuchodonosor the great captivity, which by Gods appointment continued unto the end of seventy years.

This I will not further seek to prove, by the authority of Josephus and others affirming the same; forasmuch as that which already hath been produced, is enough to satisfy any man that hath not fully determined to hold the contrary.

Sundry opinions of the Kings which reigned in Babylon during the 70. years.

Xenoph. Cyropæd lib. 1.

VHat Kings reigned in Babylon, during these seventy years of the Captivity, and how long each of them did wear the Diademe, it is a matter of no great importance to know, forasmuch as neither their acts were notable in the age wherein they lived, nor the length of their reigns, any way helpfull to the concordance of times, foregoing or succeeding. The conquests recounted by Xenophon of Syria, Arabia (or rather some part of it) Hyrcania, Bactria, and perhaps of some other Countries, may seem fruits of the victories obtained by Nebuchadnezzar the Great (or by some of his Ancestors) in the former part of his life, before he betook himself to ease, and to the sumptuous building of his great Babel, for the house of his Kingdom, and for the honour of his Majesty, where it may seem that he and his Heirs kept a great state, and did very little. The idle behaviour of the Assyrian Souldiers, in such skirmishes as afterwards they had with the Medes, doth argue no lesse. For whereas under Nebuchadnezzar, they were so stout and industrious, that (to omit other proofs) they attempted, and finished that hardy piece of work, of winning the strong City of Tyre, by joyning unto it the continent, filling up the deep and broad channell of the Sea, dividing it from the main with a mole or piece of earth, and other matter, the reparation wherof when the Sea had washed it away, was the very greatest of Alexanders works: in the times following, they became timorous, that they durst not approach nearer to the enemy than their bows would carry, but were ready to turn their backs, as soon as any, though inferiour in numbers, adventuring within the distance, offered to charge them.

Xenoph. Cyropæd lib. 1. c. 13.

Now as their actions from the end of Nebuchadnezzars wars, till the ruin of their Empire, were not worthy to be recorded; so was the distinction of their times, and reign of their severall Kings, unworthy of the great labour that hath in vain been taken in that businesse. For when it is granted, that the captivity of Juda, ending with that Empire, lasted 70. years, we may as reasonably forbear to search into the particular continuance of two or three slothfull Kings, as we are contented to be ignorant of the ages of the Patriarchs, and their children living in the Egyptians servitude; resting satisfied in both with the generall assured sum.

Yet forasmuch as many have travelled in this businesse, upon desire (as I take it) to approve the beginning and end of the 70. years, not only by the reigns of other Princes, ruling elsewhere, but by the times of the Assyrians themselves; I will not refuse to take a little pains in collecting their opinions, and shewing what I think may best be held for likely; if the certain truth cannot be found.

Jer. 37. 7.

The opinions are many, and greatly repugnant, both in recounting the Kings themselves, and in setting down the years of their severall reigns. The first (as I take it) the surest, is theirs, who meely follow the authority of the Scriptures, without borrowing any help from others. These name only three Kings, Nabuchadnezzar, Evilmerodach, and Balthasar. Neither have they only the silence of Daniel, who names none other, to be their warrant, but the prophecy of Jeremy precisely, and in a manner purposely teaching the very same. For God, by the mouth of that Prophet, shewing that he being absolute Lord of all, would dispose of all according to his own will, and making it known that he had put some Countries here named, into the hands of the King of Babel, saith thus: And all Nations shall serve him, and his Son, and his Sons Son, until the very time of his land come also; then many Nations and great Kings shall serve themselves of him. These words, expressing the continuance of the Chaldean Empire, and number of the Kings, will hardly be qualified with any distinction. But indeed I find no other necessity of qualification to be used herein, than such as may grow out of mens desire to reconcile the Scriptures unto profane Authors. And this desire were not unjust, if the consent of all histories were on the one side, and the letter of the holy Text were single on the other side.

But contrariwise, the Authors which are cited in this case, are so repugnant one to the other, & the proofs of their different reports are so slender & insufficient, that the succession of these Princes, had it not bin thus delivered in Scriptures, but only set down by some some Author of equall credit with the rest, might very well have found and deserved as good belief, as any of those things which they have delivered in this point. For some there are, who following Josephus, derive that Empire, as by descent, from father to son, through five generations; beginning with Nabuchodonosor the great, and giving to him 43. years, to Evilmerodach 18. to Niglifar the son of Evilmerodach. 40. to Labosardach the son of Niglifar 9. months, and lastly, to Balthasar (whom Josephus intimates to be of the race of Nabuchodonosor, without naming his father) 17. years. And this opinion (save that he forbears to reckon the years, and plainly calls Balthasar the son of Labosardach) Saint Hierome doth follow, alleging Berosus and Josephus as a scetator of Berosus, for his Authors, though Berosus, as he is cited by Josephus, report the matter far otherwise. For he tels us that Evilmerodach the son of Nabuchodonosor did reign but two years, for his wickednesse and lust, slain by his sisters husband Nisiglossoroor, who occupied the kingdome after him four years, and left it to his own son Labosardach; who being an ill-conditioned boy, was at the end of nine months slain by such as were about him, and the kingdome given to one Nabonidus, who held it by the election of the Conspirators, and left it unto Cyrus after 17. years. This relation ill agrees with that of Josephus, and both of them as bad with the Scriptures, in number either of years, or of generations; yet the particularities which they handle, have procured unto them some authority, so that the names which they have inserted, are taken as it were upon trust. There is a third opinion which makes the three last Kings brethren, and sons of Evilmerodach; and this may well enough agree with the Scripture: though I had rather beleve Xenophon, who saith that the last King of Babylon was immediate successor to his father. But whereas the Author of the Scholasticall History, who is founder of this opinion, placeth between him that took Jerusalem, and Evilmerodach, another Nabuchodonosor: plain enough it is that he hath, out of any History sacred or profane, as little warrant to guide him, as we have reason to follow him. Eusebius, Sulpitius, Severus and Theodoret, upon better ground have supposed, that Evilmerodach and Balthasar were brethren and sons of the great Nabuchodonosor. This is built on the fifth Chapter of Daniel, wherein Balthasar (for of Evilmerodach there is none that ever doubted) is often called Nabuchodonosor his son. And so common grew this explication, that S. Hierome called it the vulgar opinion. But the place of Jeremy before cited, proves that Balthasar was not the son indeed, but the grand-child of that great Conqueror, though by the phrase very common in Scriptures, and familiar in those Eastern languages, he was called the son.

Annius his Metasthenes hits very rightly the seventy years of captivity, giving to Nabuchodonosor 45. years, to Evilmerodach 30. years, and to the three sons of Evilmerodach, Nephews of Nabuchodonosor, fourteen years; that is, to Reg-Assar the eldest son, three years, to Lab-Assar Dach the second son, six years, and to Balthasar the third son, five.

To this accompt agreeing with the Scriptures, both in the whole sum of years, and in the number of generations, I have sometime subscribed, as not daring to reject an appearance of truth, upon no greater reason than because the Author was of Annius his edition. Yet could I not satisfie my self herein; both for that none of the Ancient, and few such of the modern Writers as deserve to be regarded, have consented with this Metasthenes; and for that in making Balthasar succeed unto his brother in the kingdom, and not unto his father, he is wholly against Xenophon, whose History of the elder Cyrus in his Assyrian war I cannot slightly value in many respects, and especially because it is very agreeable to the Scriptures, in the taking of Babylon; while the King was at his drunken feast.

Seeking therefore diligently into all circumstances that might give any light in this obscurity, I found manifest proof, that the time allotted unto Balthasar by Annius his Metasthenes, was far short of the truth, which is enough to render all suspected that he hath said in distributing what part of the 70. years he pleased among the rest. For in the third year of Balthasar, Daniel saw a vision, after which he was sick certain days, but when he rose up, he did the Kings businesse: from which businesse, that he did afterwards withdraw himself, and live retired, so long, that he was forgotten in the Court, it appears plainly, both by the many words which the old Queen used to set out his sufficiency, and by the Kings asking of him, when he came into his presence, whether he were were Daniel. Now to think that a man of such account and place as Daniel had held, could in two years have been worn out of remembrance, were in my judgement a very strange conceit, which rather than I would entertain, I can well be contented to think the whole story (thus related) a part of Annius his impostures.

Out of these reports of Josephus, Berosus, and others, many new opinions are framed; by conjectures of late Writers. For the endurance of the captivity being 70. years, and these years extending unto the first of Cyrus, in which course of time Nabuchadnezzar, his son and grand-child, must have reigned; it hath seemed needfull to supply the years of these three descents, by inserting some, whose reigns might fill up the whole continuance of the captivity; with which the time allotted by Berosus and others, to Evilmerodach and Balthasar, joynd unto the years following the nineteen of Nabuchadnezzar, 10 (wherein Jerusalem was laid desolate) are nothing even.

Therefore Mercator and others following him, fashion the years of Evilmerodach in this sort. They say, that the 18. years given to him by Josephus in the tenth of his Antiquities, should be read and numbered 28. years, and the two years that Berosus hath allowed to Evilmerodach should be written 23. in the first number the figure of (1) is mistaken for the figure of (2.) and in the latter there should have bin added the figure of (3.) to that of (2.) this granted (to wit) that Evilmerodach reigned 28. years, whereof five together with his father, and 23. after his death, and the same number of 23. added to the 25. which Nabuchodonosor lived after the destruction of Jerusalem, make 48. then 4. years of Niglifar according to Berosus, 9. moneths of Labassardach his son, and 17. years of Nabonidus or Balthasar, make up the number of 70. years to the first of Cyrus. But 10 whether by error in figures, or in words, the numbers be utterly mistaken in all copies extant; upon how weak a foundation do they build, who having nothing to help them, save onely the bare names of two unknown Kings, found in authors manifestly corrupted, and such as if they had been entirely extant, were not worthy to have the place of Jeremy called into dispute, in regard of their authority.

A more particular examination of one opinion touching the number, persons, and reigns of 30 the Babylonian Kings.

Other suppositions, little different in substance from this of Mercator, I purpose to forebear to rehearse, as falling under the same answer. That of Joseph Scaliger I may not forget, as deserving to be considered apart from the rest. Hee giveth to Nabuchadnezzar 44. years, to Evilmerodach two, to Belsazar five: and to Nabonidus 17. So that from the 19. of Nabuchadnezzar, in which Jerusalem was destroyed, unto the time of Cyrus, he accounteth only 59. years; beginning (as many do) the captivity 11. years sooner from the transportation of Jechonia. But hereof enough hath bin said already. That which we are now to consider, is his distribution of the time running between the 19. of Nabuchadnezzar, and the fall of the Chaldean Empire: wherein if he 40 have erred, then is all further inquisition frivolous.

Concerning the length of Nabuchadnezzar's reign, I shall hereafter upon better occasion deliver my opinion. The time which he gives to Evilmerodach is very short, and more precisely agreeing with Berosus than with the Scriptures. For we find in Jeremy, that this Evilmerodach in the first of his reign, shewing all favour to Jechonia, did, among other things, take order for him at his table; and that he did continually eat bread before him all the dayes of his life. His portion was a continuall portion given him of the King of Babel, every day a certain, all the dayes of his life untill he died. The very sound of these words (which is more to be esteemed than the authority of Berosus, were he perfectly extant) imports a farre longer time than two years, wherein Jechonia, under this 50 gentle Prince, enjoyed the comfort sent by God, whose commandement he had obeyed in yeelding himself to Nabuchadnezzar. Indeed how long Jechonia did live, it cannot be proved; but plain it is hereby, that all his remaining dayes he did eat bread before this King. Now that he lived not so short a while after this as 2. years, it is more than likely; for he was but 55. years old when he was set at liberty, having bin 37. years in the prison, whereinto he was cast at the age of 18. years; after which time it seems plain that he begat Salustiel, as well by the age of Zorobabel, who is said to have been but

Of Belsazer, to whom Scaliger gives the next five years, naming him also Laborsardach, I should wonder why he calls him Nabuchadnezzar's daughters son, were it not that herein I find him very carefull to help out Berosus, by shifting in his Niriglissaroor, as husband to Nabuchadnezzar's daughter, and Protector of his son four of these years; by which means there remains about one year to Belsazer alone, agreeing neerly with the nine moneths assigned by Berosus to the son of Niglifar. But Jeremy hath told us that it was to Nabuchadnezzar, and to his son, and to his sons son (not to his daughters son) 10 that the Empire was promised: which difficulty, if Scaliger could not help, it was well done of him to passe it over with silence.

Nabonidus the last of these, whom others (desirous to reconcile Berosus to the Scriptures) have judged to be all one with Balthasar, is by Scaliger thought to be Darius of the Medes. But herein Scaliger is no firm Berosian: for Berosus makes him of the same stock or race, a Babylonian. I speak not this to disgrace the travell of that most learned man (for it highly commends his diligence and judgement, that he was not so wedded to any author, as affected with the love of truth) but to shew that he himself, having in some points disliked those Writers, whom in generall he approveth, might with greater reason have wholly reformed them by the Scriptures, wherein can be no error. Two things there are which chiefly did breed or confirme this opinion in Scaliger, that hee whom Berosus calls Nabonidus, was the same whom Daniel had called Darius of the Medes: First, the phrase of Scripture, which signifies unto us, that Darius took the Kingdome, not saying that he wanne it by force of arms: Secondly, a fragment of Megasthenes found in Eusebius, wherein this Nabonidus is called the Median. Touching the word of the Originall, or of the Greek translation, which expressing no force of arms, doth only signifie that Darius took or received the Kingdome; I see no reason why we should thereupon infer, that the next king entred by Election; seeing Daniel relateth not the means and circumstances of Balthasar's death, but onely the swift accomplishment of his own prophecy. Neither could it indeed have properly been said (if Daniel had cared to use the most expressive termes) that Darius of the Medes, breaking into the City, did win the Kingdome; seeing this was performed by Cyrus in the absence of Darius, though by his forces, and to his use. Now concerning the fragment of Megasthenes, true it is, that in Eusebius his works printed at Basile, in the year 1559. I find onely thus much of Megasthenes, cited out of Alpheus; That Nabuchodonosor was more valiant than Hercules; that he subdued all Lybia, and the rest of Asia, as far as to the Armenians; and that, as the Chaldeans report, being returned into his Kingdome, and rapt with a divine fury, he cryed with a loud voyce: O Babylonians, I foretell ye of a great calamity that shall come upon you, which neither Bel, nor any of the gods shall avert: There will come a Persian, halfe an Asse, that shall bring slavery upon yee: and that, this and 40 the like when he had spoken, he vanished. Of all this I believe little, or nothing, saving that Nabuchodonosor knew before-hand, that his Empire should be translated, as Daniel had foretold, from the golden head, to the silver breast. But that he wane all Africa or Lybia, I doe hold it neither true nor probable.

If Scaliger's copy of Eusebius were the more perfect, out of which Megasthenes tells us that Nabuchodonosor wanne both Africa and Spain, I believe the fragment so much the lesse: and am as little moved with the authority of it, where it calls a Median the pride and confidence of the Assyrians; as where it tels of Nabuchadnezzar his own vanishing away. Indeed that same title of half an Asse, by which he calleth Cyrus, makes me to suspect the fable, as cunningly forged out of Apollo his Oracle, wherein he termeth 50 him a Mule, because his parentage was more noble on the mothers side than on the fathers; as Mules are begotten by Asses upon Mares. And thus much in answer of the two principal foundations whereon this opinion is built. As for the concinnity and coherence which it had within it self, I easily allow it. But this proves nothing, for meere fictions have not wanted these commendations: neither can any man believe that one so judicious, industrious, and deeply learned as Joseph Scaliger, would overshoot himself, in setting down repugnancies.

It now remaineth to examine the agreement of this with the Scriptures, from which there is no appeal. And herein it seems that Scaliger, well knowing his own sufficiency, hath hath been little carefull to satisfie men that would frame Arguments against him. For if the prophecy of Daniel were true, that the Kingdome of Balthasar was divided, and given to the Medes and Persians, either we must think that Darius of the Medes was not Nabonidus, or else we must bethink our selves what Persian it might be that shared the Kingdome with him. For it is not more certain that Balthasar lost his life and Kingdome, than that his Kingdome was divided and given to the Medes and Persians. Neither did the Medes and Persians fall out and fight for it, as by supposing Nabonidus to have been Darius, they should be thought to have done; but these two Nations did compound the body of that Empire, and were accounted as Lords over all the subject Provinces, insomuch that the Greek Historians did commonly call those warres which Darius, and after him Xerxes, made upon Greece, The Warres of the Medes. Yea, to clear this point, even Daniel himself resembles that King, with whom Alexander fought, unto a Ramme with two horns, calling him the King of the Medes and Persians. Wherefore the whole Nation of Chronologers were not to have been condemned by Ioseph Scaliger, for maintaining upon such good grounds, that Darius of the Medes was partner with Cyrus, in his victories, and not a Chaldean King by him subdued. Neither was Iosephus to be the lesse regarded, for affirming that Balthasar was destroyed by Darius of the Medes, and his Nephew Cyrus, though herein he varied from Berosus and others, whose authority elsewhere he gladly citeth. For Iosephus had no reason to believe any mans faith or knowledge of those times half so well as Daniels, whom I believe that he understood as farre as was needfull in this case. Lawfull it was for him to allege all Authors that had any mention, though unperfect, of the same things that were contained in the writings of the Fewes, to whose Histories thereby he procured reputation in the Roman world, where they were strangers, and might seem fabulous. Even so doe Eusebius and other Writers willingly embrace the testimonies of Heathen books making for the truth in some particulars; yet will they not therefore be tried in generall by the self-same Ethnick Philosophers, but leave them where they are against the truth; as Iosephus in this case hath left Berosus. And thus much I thought it meet to say of Scaligers opinion in this point; holding nevertheless in due regard his learning and judgement, which if in some things it had not failed, the miracle had then been very great.

S. VI.

What may be held as probable of the Persons and Times of Nabuchodonosor his successors.

IT now remains that I freely acknowledge mine own weaknesse, who cannot find how the 70. years of captivity are to be divided among them which reigned in Babylon, though I find that the distribution made of them, in such wise as already is rehearsed, be ill agreeable to the holy Scriptures. Wherefore I may truly say with Peregrinus, that we ought liberally to pardon those whose feet have failed them in the slippery waies of Chronology, wherein both learning and diligence are subject to take a fall at one time or other, by ignorance, forgetfulness, or heedlesse reckoning. Yet will I adventure to deliver my opinion, wherein the judgement of Lyra and others (holding those only to have reigned over the Chaldeans, whose names are found in the Scriptures) appears more conformable to reason and account of time, than any of the other Sentences or Conjectures before rehearsed. Not that I will take upon me to defend Lyra his Conjectures, when he supposeth by Niglifar and Labosardach to be meant the same persons which are called in Scriptures Evilmerodach and Balthasar (for this can by no good colour be maintained) but only to shew that the Kings by him cited, are likely to have occupied the whole time of seventy years. First therefore let us consider the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, in whose eighteenth year Jerusalem was taken and sackt, but in his nineteenth laid utterly desolate.

Most of Writers have given to him 43. years of reign, following therein Berosus. There are who have added one year more; and some have made it up 45. To dispute about the certainty were needlesse: for in shewing by what length of time the Scriptures measure him, we shall shew the certain truth.

Manifest

Manifest it is, that the 19. year of Nebuchadnezzar, is joyned with the 11. of Zedechias; also that his eighth year, was the first year of Jechonia his captivity; the reign of Zedechias occupied all the mean space, being of 11. years. This is generally agreed upon, so that it needs no further proofes: As for the beginning of his successor Evilmerodach, it was in the seven and thirtieth year of Jechonia his captivity; so that Nebuchadnezzar after his 8. year (which was the first of Jechonia his bondage) reigned 35. whole years, and peradventure a good part of the six and thirtieth, forasmuch as Jechonia was enlarged with so great favour, not untill the end of the year. Subtracting therefore out of these four and forty, which Nebuchadnezzars reign did well-neer occupie, those eighteen years of his which passed away before the captivity of Judas, and ruin of the City, we have remaining six and twenty years of the seventy, that were almost wholly spent when his son began to reign.

It is now to be considered how the remainder of the seventie years were divided between the Kings ruling in Babylon untill the first of Cyrus. A question more difficult (as I said before) than greatly needfull: the whole sum being certain, and the distinction of times affording no benefit in knowledge of their actions, who were slothfull Princes. Neither can any man the more justly suspect the beginning or end of the whole 70. years, for that the distribution of some part of them is only conjecturall; seeing that none who gives any other termes to their beginning or end, hath refused to follow both unlikely and desperate conjectures in dividing them. I will therefore be bold to doe as others have done; knowing well before-hand, that whosoever shall discover my error, must do me the pleasure (which I could rather wish in a case more material) of making me to understand the truth.

Of the four and forty years remaining in accompt of Nebuchadnezzars death, wee are to take away the last, which was the first of Darius the Mede, & then having authority good enough to warrant us from blame of presumption, in giving us seventeen years to Balthasar, we find left in our hands to bestow upon Evilmerodach six & twenty years. Of the year belonging unto Darius the Mede, I have already spoken what I thought sufficient, in delivering my opinion of the beginning and continuance of this captivity. That Balthasar did reign seventeen years, we have the authority of Iosephus, before cited in expresse words; Wee have also the generall consent of all, or the most late Writers, interpreting Berosus his Nabonidus, who reigned so long; & Balthasar to have been one. But nothing moveth me so much to beleieve this Tradition, as first those evident places in Daniel, shewing that in the third year of Balthasar hee followed the Kings business, and yet was forgotten ere the end of his reign, (a proof sufficient of no few years, passing under this man, especially seeing it is no where found that Daniels employments took end either that year or the next.) Secondly, the consideration of Cyrus his warres against the Assyrians, which beginning with the death of this mans father, & being alwaies prosperous, could hardly have occupied any longer time; though yet we make large allowance to his deeds in the lower Asia, which fell out in the midde-way: I have already shewed, that there appears in the Scriptures likelihood enough to make it credible, that the reign of Evilmerodach was not short, and that men of great judgement have found it most probable, that he was a King three and twenty years. More, I think, they would have allowed him, had not the desire of satisfying Berosus quired them to rest content with this. And surely it were greatly to bee wished, that books of such antiquitie, as those of Berosus, were extant without corruption; a great light (no doubt) they would yeeld in many dark passages of Antiquitie. I will yet confesse, that were his works never so excellent, and in all things else unquestionably true, I would not therefore condescend unto him in some one point, wherein the Scriptures were his open enemy: How much lesse ought I to obey a broken fragment of his, containing onely seven or eight lines, and part even of the title corrupted, as they beleve that follow him in the rest? The Scriptures have told us that God gave the Empire to Nebuchadnezzar, to his sonne, and to his sonnes sonne: How long each of them held it, wee find not expressed; yet would we gladly know it of Berosus; or of any other that would teach us; provided alwayes, that helping us in a particularity, hee destroyed not thereby the generall truth. More words are needlesse. It is enough to say with others, that Berosus, or Iosephus who cited him, hath been wronged by the carelesnesse of Scribes; and that it was as easie for those Scribes to erre in writing two for six and twenty, as for three & twenty, or perhaps more easie. For, the omission of the second figure, was as likely the one way as the other; and the Character 5. signifying 6. hath a neerer resemblance of 2 that stands for 2. than hath 3, which is used for 3. So that the numerall notes 25. expressing 26. were not safe enough from being mistaken in the true copie, and might bee altered, as ill written, if some crooked hand, or other mischance not unusuall, had omitted the first strok of the former letter, or added a dash to the latter, which might cause them to seem not two different figures, but the one a correction of the other, which how it could bee supposed in 25 standing for 23. I doe not well perceive. As for the Arithmetically figures now in use, they were long after the time of Josephus brought in by the Arabians, and therefore doe not appertain unto this businesse; unless we should ghesse that his works were corrupted in that unlearned age, which following the Saracen conquest, was little occupied in the studies of humanity, but in a sort wholly given over to the doctrine of Aristotle. If this will serve to make Berosus our friend, so let it be; if not, I will not purchase the favour of his authority, by forsaking Jeremy and Daniel when they seem to be his opposites.

Of the victories which Nabuchodonosor obtained between the destruction of Jerusalem and conquest of Egypt.

With what actions this time of 70. years was entertained by the Babylonian Kings, few have written, or little is remaining in record. Which may peradventure have been some cause that the time it self was, and is yet sought to bee abridged, as not having left sufficient matter to witness the length of it. But by such an argument we might as well deny to many people even their being. For every Nation (I know not whom I should except) between the beginning and last end of it, hath in some slothfull age rather dreamt away the time, than spent it. It is therefore no marvell, if the posterity of Nabuchodonosor, finding all things ready to their hand, which their hearts could have desired, betook themselves to their ease and pleasures, thinking perhaps, like the prodigall sons of greedy fathers, their own wisdom greater, which knew how to enjoy, than that of their Ancestors, which wearied away their days in the restless travell of purchasing: Though indeed the reign of Nabuchodonosor was so divided, that his youthfull and stronger years having been exercised in victorious armes, no small part of his life was remaining to be spent in establishing what was gotten, and gathering the fruit of his worthie labours past. The nineteenth year of his reign it was, when destroying utterly the great and mighty Citie of Jerusalem, hee enriched himself with abundance of spoil, and terrified all that would offer to resist him, by that fearfull example. From that time forward, he, untill his three and twentieth year, laboured in the conquest of those adjoining Regions, which God had exposed unto his sword, and commanded to wear his yoke; namely, the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, Tyrians, Sydonians, and Egyptians, though some of these were already become his followers, and served under him, when Jerusalem was beaten down and burnt. But the Tyrians, whose Citie was founded on an Island, safe enough from any danger of a Land-army, & whose fleet was so strong, that they needed not to fear any enemy at sea, were neither daunted with the fall of their neighbour cities, nor with the obstinate resolution of this mighty Prince, employing all his power to their subversion.

That the Citie of Tyre was rather well pleased, than any way discouraged with the fall of Jerusalem (which had held the same course that Tyrus did, and endured all that might bee in the same quarrell against the common enemy) it appears by the words, which Ezekiel condemneth as the common voice of Tyrus; Aha, the gate of the people is broken, it is turned unto me; for seeing she is desolate, I shall be replenished. Yet at length, even in the nineteenth year of Nabuchodonosor, that great work of his, whereof we have already spoken, began to appear above the waters, and threaten them with inevitable mischief.

But those prophecies of Jeremy & of Esay, which appoint unto this desolation of Tyre the same terme of 70. years, that was prescribed unto the reign of the Chaldeans, doe plainly plainly shew, that she followed Jerusalem, the same nineteenth year of Nabuchodonosor, in the same, or a very like fortune. The particularities, which doubtlesse were memorable in the issue of so great and laborious a siege, are in a manner utterly lost. Thus much we find, That the Citizens perceiving the Town unable to hold out, embarked themselves, and fled into the Isle of Cyprus. Nevertheless it seems that this evasion served only the principall men, who escaping with their goods, abandoned the poorer sort unto the enemies fury. For, not onely such people of Tyre as dwelt on the Continent, (who are Called her Daughters in the field) were put to the sword; but the like execution was done in the streets, into which, with excessive labour, the Assyrian made way for his Horses and Chariots. Thus Nabuchodonosor caused his Armie to serve a great service against Tyrus, wherein every head was made bald, and every shoulder was made bare, yet had hee no wages, nor his Armie; but was faine to rest contented with the Honour of having destroyed that Citie, which in all mens judgements had been held invincible.

The destruction of these two great and powerfull Cities, having made the name of the Chaldeans dreadfull in the ears of all the Nations thereabout, Nabuchodonosor used the advantage of that reputation which he had obtained by victories already gotten, to the getting of more, and more profitable, with lesse pain. The Kingdome of Egypt was the mark at which he aimed; a Country so abounding in all riches and pleasures, that it might well have tempted any Prince, finding himself strong enough, to seek occasion of quarrell against it; and so farre an enemy to the Crown of Babylon, that had it been poorer, yet either it must have been subdued, or the conquest of Syria could ill have been established. Nevertheless it was needfull, that before he entered into this businesse, the Countries adjacent should bee reduced into such termes, that either they should wholly stand at his devotion, or at least be unable to work him any displeasure. And herein the decree of God concurred, as in all prosperous enterprises, with reason of state. For, the people of Moab, Ammon, Edom, Damascus, Kedar, Hazar, and other adjoining Regions, whom God for their sins had condemned to fall under the Babylonian swords, were such, as regarding only their own gain, had some of them, like Ravens, followed the Chaldean Armie, to feed upon the carcasses that fell by the cruelty thereof; others taking advantage of their neighbours miseries, occupied the Countries which were by his victories belonging to Nabuchodonosor: all of them thinking, that when the Assyrian had satisfied his fury, he should be faine to forsake those desolate parts, and leave the possession to those that could lay hand upon it. Particularly the Edomites and Philistims had shewed much malice to the Jewes when their City was taken. What good service they had done to the Chaldeans, I find not; if they did any, it is likely to have been with reference to their own purposes, wherein they were disappointed. The Ammonites were not contented to rejoyce at the fall of Jerusalem, but presently they entered upon the Country of Gad, and took possession, as if not the Assyrians, but they, had subdued Israel. Neither can I perceive what other ground that practice had of Baalis King of the Ammonites, when he sent Ismael, a Prince of the blood of Juda, to murder Gedalia, whom the King of Babel had left Governour over those that remained in Israel; and to carry captive into the Ammonites Countrey the people that abode in Mizpah, than a desire of embroyling Nabuchodonosor with so many labours at once, as should make him retire into his own Countrey, and abandon those wasted Lands to himself and others, for whom they lay conveniently. Such or the like policy the Moabites did exercise; whose pride and wrath were made frustrate by God, and their dissimulation condemned, as not doing right.

All these nations had the art of ravening, which is familiar to such as live or border upon deserts; and now the time afforded them occasion to shew the uttermost cunning of their theevish wits. But Nebuchadnezzar did cut asunder all their devices by sharp and sudden warre, over-whelming them with unexpected ruine, as it were in one night; according to the prophecies of Esay, Jeremy, and Ezekiel, who foretold, with little difference of words, the greatnesse and swiftnesse of the miserie that should come upon them. With which of them he first began, I find not; it seems that Moab was the last which felt his hand: for so doe many good Authors interpret the prophecie of Esay, threatening Moab with destruction after three years, as having reference to the third year following the ruine of Jerusalem; the next year after it being spent in the Egyptian expedition.

expedition. This is manifest, that all the principall towns in these Regions were burnt, and the people slain, or made slaves, few excepted, who being preserved by flight, had not the courage to return to their habitations over hastily, much lesse to attempt any thing against Nabuchodonosor, but lived as miserable out-lawes, or at least oppressed wretches, untill the end of the seventy years, which God had prescribed unto the destruction of their Countries, as well as of the Land of Juda.

That Egypt was conquered, and the King therein reigning slain by Nabuchodonosor, contrarie to the opinion of most Authors: who, following Herodotus and Diodorus, relate it otherwise.

When by a long course of victory Nabuchodonosor had brought into subjection all the Nations of Syria, and the bordering Arabians, in such wise, that no enemy to himself, nor friend to the Egyptian, was left at his back, that might give impediment unto his proceeding, or take advantage of any misfortune; then did he forth-with take in hand the conquest of Egypt himself, upon which those other Nations had formerly bin depending. Of this expedition, and the victorious issue thereof, the three great Prophets, Esay, Jeremy, and Ezekiel, have written so plainly, that I hold it altogether needlesse to look after more authoritie, or to cite for proof halfe of that which may be alleged out of these. Nevertheless, we find many and good Authors, who following Herodotus, and Diodorus Siculus, are well contented to strain these Prophecies with unreasonable diligence unto such a sense, as gives to Nabuchodonosor little more than the honour of having done some spoile in Egypt, omitting the conquest of that Land by the Babylonian, and referring the death of Apries or Hophra to a chance long after following, which had no coherence with these times or affairs. So preposterous is the delight which many men take in the means and second helps conducing to their purpose, that oftentimes they doe preferre the Commentator before the Author, and to uphold a sentence, giving testimony to one clause, doe carelessly overthrow the history it self, which thereby they sought to have maintained. The reports of Herodotus and Diodorus, concerning the Kings of Egypt, which reigned about these times, are already rehearsed in the former book: but that which they have spoken of Apries, was purposely reserved unto this place. Herodotus doth affirm that he was a very fortunate King, but wherein he telleth not; (unless we should understand that he was victorious in the Warre, which he is said to have made upon Tyrus and Sidon) that he reigned five and twenty years, and was finally taken and put to death by his own Subjects; who did set up Amasis, as King, which prevailed against him. The rebellion of the Egyptians hee imputeth to a great losse which they received in an expedition against the Cyrenians, by whom almost their whole army was destroyed. This calamity the people of Egypt thought to be well pleasing to their King, who had sent them on this dangerous expedition, with a purpose to have them consumed, that so he might with greater securitie reign over such as staid at home. So they who escaped, and the friends of such as were slain, rebelled against Apries, who sent Amasis to appease the tumult; but Amasis became Captain of the rebels, and was by them chosen King. Finally, the whole Land consented unto this new Election; whereby Apries was driven to trust unto his forraign Mercenaries, the Ionians and Carians, of whom he kept continually in readinesse thirty thousand good Souldiers that fought valiantly for him, but were at length vanquished by the great number of the Egyptian forces, amounting unto two hundred and fifty thousand, which were all by birth and education, men of Warre. Apries himself being taken prisoner, was gently intreated by Amasis for a while, untill the Egyptians, exclaiming upon him, as an extreme enemy to the Land, got him delivered into their hands, and strangled him, yet they gave him honourable buriall. Such is the report of Herodotus, with whom Diodorus Siculus doth needly agree, telling us that Apries did vanquish the Cyprians and Phenicians in battell at Sea, took by force and demolished Sidon, wanne the other Towns of Phenicia, and the Isle of Cyprus, and finally perished, as is before rehearsed, when hee had had reigned two and twenty years. This authority were enough (yet not more than enough) to inform us of Apries his history, if greater authority did not contradict it. But the destruction of Egypt by the Babylonian, foretold by the Prophets, which hath no coherence with these relations, hath greater force to compell our belief, than have the traditions of Egyptian Priests (which the Greek Historians followed) and greater probabilities to perswade those that look only into humane reasons. For Esay prophesied long before of the shamefull captivity of the Egyptians, whom the King of Asshur should carry away naked, young and old, in such wise, that the Fews, who fled unto them for deliverance from the Assyrian, should be ashamed of their own vain confidence in men so unable to defend themselves. Esa. 20. v. 4-7.

But Ezekiel and Jeremy, as their prophecies were neerer to the time of execution, so they handled this argument more precisely. For Ezekiel telleth plainly, that Egypt should be given to Nabuchadnezzar, as wages for the service which he had done at Tyre: Also he recounteth particularly all the chief Cities in Egypt, saying, That these by name should be destroyed, and go into captivity, yea that Pharaoh and all his Army should be slain by the sword. Wherefore it must needs be a violent exposition of these Prophecies, which by applying the issue of such threatnings to an insurrection and rebellion concludes all, without any other alteration in Egypt, than change of the Kings person, wherein Amasis did succeed unto Apries, by force indeed, but by the uniforme consent of all the people. Certainly, if that notable place of Jeremy, wherein he foretelleth how the Fews in Egypt should see Pharaoh Hophra delivered into the hand of his enemies, as Zedekia had been, were to be referred unto the time of that rebellion, whereof Herodotus hath spoken, as the generall opinion hath over-ruled it; then was it vainly done of the same Prophet (which God forbid that any Christian should think, seeing he did it by the appointment of God himself) to hide in the clay of a Brick-hill, those very stones, upon which the Throne of Nabuchodonosor should be set, and his Pavilion spread. Yea then was that prophecy no other than false, which expressed the end of Pharaoh thus: Behold, I will visit the common people of No, & Pharaoh, and Egypt, with their gods and their Kings, even Pharaoh, and all that trust in him: and I will deliver them into the hands of those that seek their lives, and into the hand of Nabuchadnezzar, King of Babel, and into the hands of his servants. The clearnesse of this prophecy being such as could not but refute that interpretation of many other places, which referred all to the rebellion of Amasis, it caused me to wonder what those Commentators would say to it, who are elsewhere so diligent in fitting all to the Greek Historians. Wherefore looking upon Junius, who had in another place taken the enemies of Pharaoh Hophra to be Amasis and his followers, I found him here acknowledging that the Egyptian Priests had notably deluded Herodotus with lies, coyned upon a vain-glorious purpose of hiding their own disgrace and bondage. And surely it may well be thought, that the history of Nabuchadnezzar was better known to the Fews, whom it concerned, than to the Greeks; that scarcely at any time heard of his name. Therefore I see no cause why we should not rather beleevé Josephus, reporting that Nabuchodonosor in the three and twentieth year of his reign, and the fifth year of the destruction of Jerusalem, did conquer Egypt, kill the King thereof, and appoint another in his stead, than Herodotus or Diodorus; who being meer strangers to this businesse, had no great reason to labour in searching out the truth, but might rest contented with any thing that the Priests would tell them. Now if setting aside all advantage of authority, we should only consider the relations of Josephus, and of the Greek Historians, as either of them might be verified of it self by apparent circumstances, without reflecting upon the Hebrew Prophets, or Egyptian Priests; me thinks the death of Apries can no way be approved, as having been wrought by consent of the people, but affords great matter of suspicion; yea, though no man had opposed the reports of Herodotus and Diodorus. For the great love & honor which the Egyptians did bear unto their Kings, is notorious by the uniform testimony of all others that have handled the matters of that Country, as well as by the report of Diodorus himself. How then can we think it probable, that Apries having won great victories, did for one only losse fall into the hatred of all his people: or which may serve to perswade us, that a King of Egypt would seek, or so demean himself, that he might be thought to seek the destruction of his naturall subjects? As for that Army of thirty thousand souldiers, Carians and Ionians, which the King of Egypt, whom Amasis took prisoner, is said to have kept for his defence: doth it not argue that he was a forrainger, and one that armed himself against the Egyptians, withing them few and weak; rather than any of the Pharaohs, who accounted the force of the Country, as assuredly their own, as the strength of their own bodies? It were more tedious than any way needfull to use all Arguments that might be alleged in this case. The very death of this supposed Apries, which the clamours of the people obtained of Amasis, who sought to have kept him alive, doth intimate that he was some forrainger Governour, not a naturall Prince; otherwise the people would have desired to save his life, and Amasis to take it quickly from him. I will not labour any further to disprove that opinion, whereunto I should not have yeelded, though it had stood upon great appearance of truth, considering that the voice of truth it self cries out against it; but leave the circumstances, proving the Conquest of Egypt by Nabuchodonosor, to be observed where due occasion in course of the story following shall present them.

How Egypt was subdued and held by Nabuchadnezzar.

IT is a great losse, that the generall History of the World hath suffered, by the spoil and waste which Time hath made of those Monuments that should have preserved the memory of such famous actions as were accomplished by this mighty Prince Nabuchodonosor; wherein, whether his Vertue, or Fortune were greater, it is now uncertain. That his Victories following the Conquest of Syria, and the Neighbour-Provinces, were such as did more enlarge his Dominion, than all the former Wars had done, it may easily be gathered out of Ezekiel, who reckoneth up in his thirtieth Chapter (besides the whole Country of Egypt) Phut and Lud, with other Nations, that may seem to have reached out into Mauritania, as people subdued by this great Babylonian. The circumstances of these Wars are in a manner utterly lost; but that the victory was easie and swift, any man shall find, who will take the pains to conferre the places, wherein the three great Prophets touch this Argument. Thus much I think worthy of more particular observation; that Pharaoh, who (as is already noted in the former Book) thought himself most safe in Egypt by the well defended situation of his Country, did very unwisely in suffering his enemies to sweep the way clean unto his own doors, by consuming all his friends and adherents in Syria. For as the labour of this businesse did more harden than weary the Chaldean Army, so the confidence and vain security of the Egyptians, relying upon the difficult passages which the enemy was to make thorow the Arabian deserts, and the much advantage which the great river of Nilus would afford unto themselves, did little avail them in provision for the war, and much astonish them (as may justly be thought) in the time of execution: it being usually seen, that the hearts of men fail, when those helps fail, in which they had reposed more confidence than in their own vertue. Hitherto the Kingdome of Egypt had flourished under the rule of the Pharaohs, about a thousand five hundred and fourscore years; but from this time forward it remained forty years without a King, under the subjection of the Babylonians; and then at length it began to recover by little and little the former greatness, yet so, that it was never dreadful unto others, God having said of that people, I will diminish them, that they shall no more rule the Nations. For whereas it hath been said of Pharaoh: I am the son of the wife, I am the son of the ancient Kings; and whereas he had vaunted, The River is mine, and I have made it; the Princes of Egypt now became fools, the river failed them, the King himself was taken and slain, and that ancient lineage quite extinguished. This came to passe in the first year after the destruction of Jerusalem, and the three and twentieth of Nabuchadnezzar, at which time (saith Josephus) He slew the King then reigning, placed another in his room, and carried captives thence to Babylon the Jews whom he found in that Country. Now concerning the time which Josephus gives unto this businesse, and the businesse it self, I have already shewed, that it is warranted by all the prophecies which insinuate the same. As likewise the last destruction of Jerusalem, and carrying away those unto Babel, who inhabited the miserable ruins of that great city, which was in the same three and twentieth year of Nabuchadnezzar, is not improbably thought by good good authors to have been at the return from this Egyptian expedition. But whereas Josephus tells us, that there was another King put in the room of Apries by Nabuchadnezzar, we must understand, that he was only a Vice-roy, and not (as some have mistaken it) think that this was Amasis. For to place the beginning of Amasis's his reign in the three and twentieth of Nabuchadnezzar, were as well repugnant unto the prophecies before alleged, as to all Chronology and History. Some therefore, which to help this inconvenience, imagine that there were two successively bearing the name of Amasis; others, that there were two Apries, the one slain by Nabuchadnezzar, the other by Amasis: a question of small importance, because the difference is only about a name, it being once granted that the person mentioned in Scriptures, was deprived of life & Kingdome by the Assyrians. Yet for anything that I can perceive, that Apries, of whom the Greek Historians wrote, could not be the Deputy of Nabuchadnezzar, seeing that he was the Grand-child of Pharao Necho, and made war (as they report) upon the Phoenicians, who were, before the Egyptians, become subject unto the Crown of Babylon. I might adde, perhaps, that he whom Nabuchadnezzar left as Governour of Egypt, was more likely to have had some Chaldean or Assyrian, than Egyptian name; unless we should think that he had been a traitor to his naturall Prince, and so rewarded by the Conquerour with Lieutenantship of the Country: about which it were but frivolous to dispute. Thus much in brief we ought to believe, that Nabuchodonosor made an absolute Conquest of Egypt; that he was not so foolish as to give it away, any man may guess, that he appointed one to rule the Country, it is consequent unto the former, and hath authority of Josephus, that his Governour (or some Successour of his) was afterwards taken and slain by Amasis, I see probability enough to perswade my self, and yet can well be content, that others use their liberty, and believe what they list. As for the army which this Egyptian King Apries is supposed to have kept of Ionians and Carians, I hold them to be none other than the garrisons of mercenary souldiers which were left by the Assyrian for the guard of his Viceroy, and custody of the new subdued Province: as likewise the company returning from Cyrene & Berce, who together with the friends of such as were slain in that expedition, remembered before out of the Greek Historians, deposed and slew Apries, I take them to have been the Egyptian fugitives, which then recovered their own Country. Sure it is that this Prophecy of Ezekiel was verified, At the end of forty years will I gather the Egyptians from the people where they were scattered, and I will bring again the captivity of Egypt, and will cause them to return into the land of Pathmos, into the land of their habitation, and they shall be there a small Kingdome. If the Egyptian Priests alluded hereunto in the tale which they made of Amasis's obtaining the Kingdome, then are they to be helped with this or the like interpretation; if they devised matter that had no shadow of truth, only to keep the Greeks from knowledge of their Countries disgrace, then are they little to be regarded, since we know the truth with them.

Of the sundry accounts drawn from sundry acts of Nabuchadnezzar, and of the destruction of Nineve, by him; the time of which action is uncertain.

THESE victories brought the greatness of the Assyrian Empire to the full, & from them was reckoned the time of Nabuchadnezzar's reign in sundry places of Scripture. To speak any more of the questions arising about the supputation of Nabuchadnezzar's his times, might seem to be the over-handling of one Argument: Yet thus much I will note; that whereas Daniel was carried captive in the third year of Felsojakins reign (which ran along with some part of Nabuchadnezzar's first year) and was kept in diet three years more, before he was brought into the Kings presence; it could not be the second of Nabuchadnezzar's Kingdom, wherein he interpreted the forgotten dream of the great Image, foretelling the success of Monarchies, but the second of his Empire. The same or the like may be said of divers places, which refer sundry matters unto their set years; as that of Ezekiel before cited, where he foretels, that Egypt should be given in reward for the service done before Tyrus, during his prophecy in the seven and twentieth year; and that of Daniel, placing the erection of the golden Image in the eighteenth year: for these years held no dependance upon either the beginning of Nabuchadnezzars Kingdome, or of his Empire, nor yet upon any of the captivities, but had reference to some memorable actions, omitted in Scripture, and therefore not eafie to be found, nor worth the labour of uncertain search.

Nahum 3. 8.

Of any War made by Nabuchadnezzar, after fuch time as he returned from the Conquest of Egypt, I doe not read: excepting that againft Nineve, the destruction whereof was fore-told by the Prophet Nahum. Nineve had long before been taken by Merodach (as in due place hath been shewed) and together with the rest of Assyria made subject to Babylon. Yet was it left under a peculiar King, who rebelling against the Chaldeans, as Jehojakim and Zedechias, tributary Kings of Juda, had done, tasted likewise of the same fortune. That the destruction of Nineve followed the Conquest of Egypt, it appeareth by the comparison which Nahum the Prophet made between this City, that was to fall, and the City of No in Egypt, that was fallen already. But how long after this came to passe, it is (me thinks) impossible to find out. For whereas it is found in an Hebrew Chronology, that it was in the first of Nabuchadnezzars reign, the place of Nahum last cited is enough to disprove it. Whereas it is referred by some unto the first of his Monarchy, which began at the end of the Egyptian Wars, the whole Prophecy of Nahum which went between the one and the other, argueth strongly, that there was longer space of time intercurrent. So that to enquire into the very year of this destruction, or other circumstances of the War, whether managed by Nabuchodonosor in person, or by his Lieutenants, were somewhat like unto the vain curiosity of Tyberius Caesar, enquiring who was the Mother of Hecuba, or to the like idle pains which he should take, who would seek to learn what woman that Huzzab Queen of Nineve was, whose wofull captivity the same Prophet Nahum likewise did fore-tell.

Of the latter time of Nabuchadnezzar; his buildings, madnesse, and death.

Dan. 4. 27.

OF the time which this great Monarch spent in quiet, I think there are no monuments extant, save those which we find among the prophecies of Daniel. Among these we may reckon his great works of Babylon, wherewith he pleased himself so well, that he brake out into these glorious words: Is not this great Babel that I have built for the house of the Kingdom, by the might of my power, & for the honour of my Majesty? Surely if those things be true that are by Josephus rehearsed of him out of Berofus and Megasthenes, he might well delight himself with the contemplation of such goodly and magnificent buildings. For it is said, That he fortified Babylon with a triple wall; that besides other stately works, he raised those huge arches wherewith were born up the high Orchards, hanging as it were in the air, and equalling the tops of Mountains, which most sumptuous frame, that out-lasted all the remainder of the Assyrian, and all the Persian Empire, is said to have been reared, and finished in fifteen days.

But of all this, and other his magnificence, we find little else recorded, than that (which indeed is most profitable for us to consider) his over-valuing of his own greatness abased him unto a condition inferiour to the poorest of men. And not undeservedly fell these judgements of God upon him. For whereas God had honoured him, not only with many victories, and much happiness in his own life, but with a discovery of things to come after him, yea and had approved the certainty of his dream, by the miraculous reducing of it into his memory, and interpretation thereof by Daniel the Prophet; he nevertheless became so forgetfull of God, whose wonderfull power he had seen and acknowledged, that he caused a golden Image to be set up and worshipped; ordaining a cruell death as reward unto them that should dare to disobey his Kingly will and pleasure, which was utterly repugnant to the law of him that is the Kings of Kings. Hereof S. Hierome hath well noted, Felix oblivio veritatis, ut qui dudum servum Dei quasi Deum adoraverat, nunc statuam sibi fieri jubeat, ut ipse quasi Deus in statua adoraretur: A hastie forgetfulness of the truth, that he who so lately had worshipped (Daniel) the servant of God, as if he had been God himself, should now command a statua to be erected unto himself, wherein himself might be worshipped as God. From this impiety it pleased God to reclaim him, by the strange and wonderfull delivery of those blessed Saints out of the fiery fornace; who being thrown into it bound, for refusing to commit Idolatry, were assisted by an Angell; preserved from all harm of the fire; loosened from their bands; and finally called out with gracious words, and restored to their former honour, by the King: who amazed at the miracle, made a decree tending to the honour of God, which by erection of his Image he had violated. Yet this devotion of Nabuchadnezzar was not so rooted in him, that it could bring forth fruit answerable to his hasty zeal. Therefore was he forewarned by God in a dream of the terrible judgement hanging over his head, which Daniel expounded, advised him to break off his sin by righteousness, and his iniquities by mercy towards the poor; that there might be an healing of his error. Hereby it seems that injustice and cruelty were the faults, for which he was threatened: but this threatening sufficed not unto his information. For, that so great a Monarch should be driven from among men; (according to the tenor of the dream and interpretation) yea, compelled to dwell with the beasts of the field, and made to eat grasse as the Oxen, was a thing so incredible in mans judgement, that easily it might be thought an idle dream; and much more easily be forgotten at the years end. One whole years leisure to repent was given to this haughty Prince: which respite of the execution may seem to have bred in him a forgetfulness of Gods sentence. For at the end of twelve moneths, walking in the royall Palace of Babel, he was so over-joyed and transported with a vain contemplation of his own seeming happiness; that without all fear of Gods heavie judgement pronounced against him, he uttered those loftie words before rehearsed, in vaunting of the Majestickall works which he had reared, as well becomming his majesticall person. But his high speeches were not fully ended, when a voyce from heaven, telling him that his Kingdome was departed from him, rehearsed over unto him the sentence again, which was fulfilled upon him the very same hour.

That Salomon, and many other Princes, and great ones, have taken delight in their own buildings, it cannot any way be doubted; yet I doe not remember that ever I have read of any, that were punished for rejoycing in works of this kind (though it is hard in joy, or any passion of the mind, to keep a just measure) excepting onely this Nabuchadnezzar.

The like may be said of David: for other (and some very godly) Kings have mustred all their forces to the very last man; but few or none have been known to have been punished as David was. Surely I not only hold it lawfull to rejoyce in those good things wherewith God hath blessed us; but a note of much unthankfulness to entertain them with a fullen and unfeeling disposition. Yet as all humane affections, wherein due reference to God is wanting, are no better than obscure clouds hindring the influence of that blessed light, which clarifies the soule of man, and predisposeth it unto the brightness of eternall felicity; so that insolent joy, which man in the pride of his vain imagination conceiveth of his own worth, doth above all other passions blast our minds, as it were with lightning, and make us to reflect our thoughts upon our seeming inherent greatness, forgetting the whilest him, to whom we are indebted for our very being. Wherefore these Mala mentis gaudia; The evill joyes of the minds were not unaptly, by the Prince of Latine Poets, bestowed in the entrance of hell, and placed further inward than sorrows, cares, and fear; not far from the yron Cabbins of the Furies. And certainly it is no unlikely token of vengeance near at hand, when these unreasonable flushes of proud and vain joy, doe rage in a mind; that should have been humbled with a just repentance, and acknowledgement of ill deserving.

This was verified upon Nabuchadnezzar; whose punishment was singular and unexampled. For he ran among beasts in the fields and woods, where for seven years he lived, not onely as a salvage man, but as a salvage beast; for a beast he thought himself, secundum suam imaginationem, as Thomas noteth; and therefore fed himself in the same manner, and with the same food that beasts do; Not that he was changed in figure externally, according to Mediana, inasmuch as he appeared a beast to other mens eyes, as S. Hierome in the life of Hilarius (how true God knows) speaks of a woman that appeared to all other mens sight a Cow, but to Hilarius onely a woman; neither was hee changed as Iphigenia, the daughter of Agamemnon was said to be, into a Hinde; nor made a Monster, as Dorotheus and Epiphanius dreamed: but according to S. Feromes exposition of these words: At the same time as my understanding restored unto me, &c. Quando dicit (saith S. Ferome) señum sibi redditum, ostendit non formam se amisisse, sed mentem; When hee saith that his sense was restored unto him, he shewed that he had not lost his humane shape; but but his understanding. Seven years expired, it pleased God to restore Nabuchodonosor, both to his understanding, and his estate, for which he acknowledged and praised God all the rest of his life, confessing his power, and everlasting being; that he was the Lord of heaven and earth, and wrought without resistance what he pleased in both; that his works were all truth, and his ways righteous. Which gave argument to many of the Fathers, and others, not to doubt of his salvation; namely, S. Augustine, Theodoret, Lyra, Carthusianus, and others. And for that place of Esay the fourteenth, out of which his perdition may be gathered, the aforementioned Authors apply the same to Balthasar, because Esay, both in the thirteenth and fourteenth Chapters, speaketh of the King, and the destruction of Babylon jointly.

§. XII. of Evilmerodach.

HAVING already spoken what I could of the succession and years of Nebuchadnezzar's posterity; the most that may be said of him, is said of Evilmerodach, which I will not here again rehearse.

He lost some part of that which his father had gotten; and left his Kingdom burning in a warre that consumed it to ashes. Hee lost Egypt by rebellion of the people, in the nineteenth year of his reign, which was forty years after his Father had conquered it. But this agrees neither with the account of Herodotus, who allows to Amasis four and forty years of reign; nor with that of Diodorus, who gives him five and fifty, saying, that he died in the third year of the threescore and third Olympiad, when Cambyses did conquer Egypt. There were indeed but seven and thirty years, which passed between the second year of the four and fiftieth Olympiad, (which was the nineteenth of Evilmerodach, and the first Amasis) and the sixt of Cambyses his reign, wherein he was Egypt; of which seven and thirty years it is credibly held, that Psummiticus, the son of Amasis, reigned three: so that Amasis could bee no longer King than four and thirty years. But seeing that these two Greek Historians have been abused by Egyptian Priests, in the substance of that which was spoken of Amasis, it is no marvell though they were also deceived in the length of his reign. This is the plain answer to this objection. For to say either that the numbers were miswritten, and four and forty set down in stead of four and thirty, or that Amasis did temporise a while with the Assyrians, and not bear himself as absolute King of Egypt, untill the nineteenth of Evilmerodach (at which time, and not before, it hath been proved out of Ezechiel, that Egypt became again a Kingdom) I hold it a superfluous excuse.

Whether these Egyptian troubles did animate the King of the Medes to deal with Evilmerodach, as with a Prince greater in fame and reputation, gotten by the decayed valour of his people, than in present forces; or whether (as I rather think) some foyle received by the Assyrian invading Media, emboldned the Egyptians to rebell against him; I will neither undertake, nor seek to define. Xenophon tells that the first service of young Cyrus in warre, was under Astages King of the Medes, his Grand-father, in a prosperous fight against the Assyrian Prince, who did set upon him; at which time Cyrus was fifteen or sixteen years old. If therefore Cyrus lived threescore and three years (as he is said to have died well stricken in years) which is held to be the ordinary term of no short life, then was this encounter in the third year of Evilmerodach his reign. Yet by the same reckoning it should follow, that the warre began more early between these Nations, for as much as the manner of their fight in former times, with other circumstances insinuating as much, are found in the same place of Xenophon. And it may well be, that the death of destruction of Nabuchodonosor gave courage unto those that had felt him a troublesome neighbour, to stand upon prouder termes with the Assyrians, so than in his flourishing estate they durst have used. Howsoever the quarrell began, we find that it ended not before the last ruine of the Assyrian Monarchie. For the Babylonian, being too proud to digest the losses which he received by the Medes and their Allies the Persians, drew unto his partie the Lydians, and all the people of the lesser Asia, with gifts and strong perswasions, hoping so to over-whelm his enemies with a strong Invasion, whom in vain hee had sought to wearie out with a lingering Warre.

This

This happened after the death of Astages, who left the world in the nineteenth year of Evilmerodach, at which time Amasis took possession of Egypt. So that the Assyrian having his hands already full of businesse, which more earnestly did affect him, seemes thereby to have given the better meanes unto the Egyptians, of new erecting their Kingdom, which by long distance of place did sundry times find occasion to rebell in after-ages, and set up a King within in self, against the far more mighty Persian.

The issue of these great preparations made by Evilmerodach against the Medes, was such as opened the way unto the fulfilling of those prophecies, which were many years before uttered against Babel, by Esay and Jeremy.

For the Assyrians and their Confederates, who, trusting in their numbers, thought to have buried the Medes and Persians under their thick showres of arrowes and darts, were encountered with an army of stout and well-trained men, weightily armed for close fight, by whom they were beaten in open battell, wherein Evilmerodach was slain. So that great frame of Empire which Nabuchodonosor had raised and up-held, being shaken and grievously cracked under his unfortunat son, was left to be sustained by his unworthy Nephew; a man more likely to have overthrown it, when it was greatest and strongest, than to repair it, when it was in way of falling.

§. XIII.

A private conjecture of the Author; serving to make good those things, which are cited out of Berosus, concerning the Successors of Evilmerodach, without wrong to the truth. The quality, and death of Balthasar.

THOUGH I have already (as it seemes to me) sufficiently proved that Balthasar was the Son, and immediate Successor to Evilmerodach, yet considering earnestly the conjectures of those Writers, which following Berosus, insert Niglissar, or Nirigissoreor, and his son Labassardach between them; as also that which I find in Herodotus of Nitocris, a famous Queen of Babylon, who greatly adorned and fortified that City; I have thought it not superfluous here in this place to shew, by what means it was possible that some error might have crept into the Historie of those times, and thereby have brought us to a needlesse trouble of searching out the truth; as it were by candle-light, in the uncertain fragments of lost Authors, which we might have found by day-light, had we adhered only to the Scriptures. First therefore I observe, that the time which Berosus divides betwixt Evilmerodach, and the two next Kings, agrees with the years in which Nebuchadnezzar lived vvild among brute beasts in the open field: Secondly, that the suddenesse of this accident, vvhich came in one hour, could not but vvork much perturbation in that State, vvherein doubtlesse the honour of so noble a Prince vvvas highly regarded, his calamity pitied, and his restitution hoped: the prediction of Daniel finding reputation in that clause vvhich promised his recoverie, as being verified in that which had bin more incredible. Now if we doe in common reason judge, what course was like to be taken by the great ones of the Kingdom, for settling the government, vvhist the King was thus distracted, wee shall find it most likely, that his Son and Heir did occupie the Royall Throne, with condition to restore it unto his Father, when God should enable him to repesse it. In this his rule Evilmerodach being to supply the utter want of understanding in his Father, as Protectors doe the unripenesse of a young, but reasonable Kings, might easily either commit the insolences, or fall into the troubles, incident to such an office. That he had in him very small abilitie of government, it appears by his ill maintaining the Empire, when hee held it in his own right: That his sister Nitocris (if Nitocris were his sister) was a woman of an high spirit, as appears by that which Herodotus reports of her, saying, that shee was more cunning than Semiramis, as appeared in her magnificent and usefull works about the River of Euphrates, and her forsification of Babylon against the Medes, who had gotten many Towns from the Assyrians, and amongst them Ninive. Wherefore it were not unreasonable to think, that such a woman, seeing how the Empire went to decay through her brothers misgovernment, used practices to get the rule into her own hands, and afterwards, as a mother, to leave it unto her ungracious son. Other time than this, where Nitocris could have reigned, wee doe not find; but wee find in Berosus (as Josephus hath cited him) that Niglissar, who got the Kingdom from Evilmerodach, was his sisters husband; usband; which argues this to have been the same woman. As for Labassardach the son of Niglissar, if at the end of nine months reign he were for his lewd conditions slain by the Nobility, as the same Berosus reporteth, it seemes that God prepared hereby the way for Nebuchadnezzars restitution (whose term of punishment was then expired) by raising such trouble, as should make him the more desired, both of the Princes and the people. I will not here use many words to confute that which Berosus hath further set down of Evilmerodach, telling us that he was slain by his sisters husband: for the plain words of the Scripture, naming the year wherein he gave liberty to Jechonia, do plainly testifie that he out-lived the three or four and fortieth year of his Fathers reign, which was the last of his life.

This may suffice to shew, that they who are said to have succeeded Evilmerodach in the Kingdom, might indeed have so done, though not when he held it in his own right. Of Balthasar, who was his Son and Heir, we find, that he had such conditions, as God permitted to be in a King for the ruin of the people. Hee was from his young years of a mischievous nature; having in his Fathers time slain a Noble young-man that should have married his sister, only for spight and envie to see him kill two wild beasts in hunting, at which himself having thrown his Javeline had missed them. Another great Lord he had gelded, because a Gentlewoman commending his beauty, said it were a happy woman that should be his wife. Such barbarous villanies caused many which had loved his Father (as a good and gracious, though unfortunate Prince) to revolt from him unto the enemy as soon as hee was King. Neither doe I find that hee performed any thing worthy of record, but as a coward and a fool he lost all; sitting still, and not once daring to give battell to them that daily took somewhat from him. Yet carelessly feasting when danger had hemmed him in on every side, and when death arrested him by the hands of those whom he had wronged in his Fathers life. So the end of him was bale and miserable; for he died as a fool taken in unexcusable security, yet had not that happiness, such as it is; of a death free from apprehension of fear, but was terrefied with a dreadful vision; which had shewed his ruin not in many houres before, even whilest he was drinking in that wine, which the swords of his insulting enemies drew out of him, together with his latest blood. It is therefore in this place enough to say of him, That after a dishonourable reign of seventeen years, he perished like a beast, and was slain as he deserved. The rest that concerneth him in question of his time, hath been spoken heretofore; in matter of his affaires, shall be handled among the acts of Cyrus, to whose story, that of Balthasar is but an appendix.

CHAP. II.

Of the originall and first greatnesse of the Persians.

S. I.

That the Medes were chief actors in the subversion of the Babylonian Empire.

THE Line of Belochus being now extinguished in Balthasar, the Empire of Babylon, and of Assyria, was joyned first to that of Media, which then was governed by Cyaxares or Darius Medus, after whom Cyrus became Lord and Monarch, both of Assyria and of Media it self.

Of the race of Phul Belochus there were ten Kings besides himself, and of Arbaces as many are found by Metasthenes. These two Provinciall Governours having cut down the last branch of Ninus in Sardanapalus, divided between them the Eastern Empire. Cyaxares (whom the Scriptures call Darius Medus) the last of the race of Arbaces, dying about two years after that the line of Belochus was ended in Balthasar; the Dominions aswell of the Conquerour; as of the conquered, fell to a third Family, namely, to Cyrus of the house of Achamenes the Princes of which blood reigning in Persia, had formerly formerly been dependants on the Medes, and were of as little power at home, as of fame abroad in the world.

Of the Familie of the Achamenes, and Line of the Persian Kings, we shall hereafter find occasion in due place to intreat.

The Nation of the Medes descended from Madai the third son of Japhet; that they had Kings soon after the Flood, Lactantius and Diodorus have found record; For Lactantius remembreth an ancient King of the Medes called Hydaspes, and Diodore speaketh of Pharnus with his seven sons, slain by the Assyrians in the beginning of their Empire.

But of these who succeeded Arbaces the first, that freed his Nation from the Assyrians, I take the list and number from Eusebius, adding Darius Medus: of whom I have spoken in their proper places heretofore; and they are these;

Arbaces	28. years.
Sosarmus	30. years.
Medius	40. years.
Cardiceas	13. years.
Diocles	53. years.
Phraortes	24. years.
Cyaxares	32. years.
Astyages	38. years.

reigned

And though the Greeks ascribe the conquest of Babylon to Cyrus alone, yet the Scriptures teach us, that Darius was not only King of Media, and had the Persians his followers, but that the Armie victorious over Balthasar was his; as the Assyrian and Babylonian Empire also was during his own life. For we find in Daniel, that Darius of the Medes took the Kingdome being threescore and two years old: And further, what Officers it pleased him to set over the Kingdome. And so was it prophesied by Isay long before: Behold, I will stir up the Medes against them, &c. And by Jeremie, The Lord hath raised up the Spirit of the King of the Medes: for his purpose is against Babel to destroy it; and in the eight and twentieth Verse, Prepare against her the Nations, with the King of the Medes, the Dukes thereof, the Princes thereof, and all the Land of his Dominion. These Scriptures Julius Africanus doth well open, who taking authority from Diodore, Castor, Thallus, and others, delivereth that Babylon was taken before Cyrus began to reign; which also agreeth with Strabo, where he saith, That as the Medes were subjugated by the Persians, so before that, both the Babylonians and Assyrians were mastered by the Medes. And therefore the reports of Fustine and Herodotus are not to be received, who attribute the taking of Babylon to Cyrus alone.

By what means the Empire was translated from the Medes to the Persians.

HOW the Kingdome of the Medes fell into the hands of Cyrus, it is a doubt not sufficiently cleared by Historians, but rather their different relations of his beginnings have bred the former opinion of those who give the conquest of Babel to the Persians only. For some there are who deny that Astyages had any other Successor than Cyrus his grand-child by Mandane. Whereas Ctesias on the contrary side affirmeth, that Cyrus was no way descended from Astyages (whom he calleth Astius or Apania) but only that having vanquished him in battell, and confined him to Bactria, he married his Daughter Amysis. But I find the relations of Ctesias often cited, and seldome followed, and himself sometimes very justly reproved of wilfull untruth.

Viginier, a diligent and learned historian of this age, produceth many probable reasons that Astyages had no such son as Cyaxares, or Darius Medus; and to confirm this opinion the more, he citeth Diodore, Fustine, Strabo, Plato, Aristotle, Isocrates, and before them Castor, Thallus, and Phlegon; who do not find any such successor. Neither do Tatianus, Theophilus Antiochenus, Julius Africanus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Fustine Martyr, Lactantius, Eusebius, S. Hierome, or S. Augustine, make report out of any faithfull Author by them read, that hath given other Son or Successor to Astyages than Cyrus.

Yet seeing that this manner of argument ab authoritate negativa, doth never inforce consent; we may be the bolder (all this great list of noble Writers by him alleged notwithstanding) to affirm, that either Astyages himself must have been Darius of the Medes, which cannot agree with his place in the course of time; Or else to give him some other Successor, according to Josephus and Xenophon, the same whom Daniel calleth Darius. For it is manifest and without dispute, that the King of the Medes commanded in chief, and was absolute Lord of that Conquest, Cyrus during his life, being no other than the Lieutenant of his Armie, and subject to his authoritie; The strength of both Nations, to wit, the Medes and Persians, with other the Vassals of Darius, being joyned together to compound it.

But it is very certain that the honour of that great victorie over Babylon was wholly given to Cyrus, who was the instrument preordained and forenamed by God himself for this action, but for the deliverie of his Church; a greater work not only in the eyes of God, than the subversion of any State or Monarchie how powerfull soever.

And it may well be thought, that the Souldiers employed in that service did rather ascribe the glory to him that was the best man of war, than to the Median, who was greatest in riches and power. All which also falling upon Cyrus by succession, and continuing in his posteritie, did much augment the fame of his vertue; which among prophane Historians overgrew altogether the honour due to Cyaxares, both because he was old, and did nothing in person; as also because he soon after quitted the world, and left all to Cyrus, who was possessor of whatsoever belonged to Darius, before the fame of any such King or Conqueror was carried far off.

And for the Greek Historians, they took all things from the relation of the Persians, who gave to Cyrus all the praise of a most excellent Prince, making none his equal. Only Daniel in the first, fift, and sixt Chapters of his Prophecie, makes it plain, that himselfe not only lived a great Officer under King Darius, but that he continued in that estate to the first of Cyrus; which being the year of Daniels Death, could not have been distinguished from the reign of Darius, if they had begun together and reigned joynly: Neither can it be imagined that Darius held the Kingdome by Cyrus permission, considering that Cyrus began after him.

Xenophons relation of the Warre with the Medes and Persians, made with joynt forces upon the Assyrians and others.

These Testimonies of the Scriptures, which need no other confirmation, yet made more open to our understanding, by that which Xenophon hath written of these wars: The cause whereof, according to his report, was this.

When the Assyrian had enlarged his Empire with victories, and was become Lord of all Syria, and many other Countries, he began to hope that if the Medes could be brought under his subjection, there should not then be left any Nation adjoining able to make head against him. For the King of the Medes was able to bring into the field threescore thousand foot, and ten thousand horse, to which the forces of Persia being joyned, made an exceeding strong Armie.

The Assyrian considering the strength of such a Neighbour, invited Cresus King of Lydia, a Prince very mighty both in men and treasure, and with him other Lords of Asia the lesse, to his assistance, alleging, that those Eastern Nations were very powerful, and so firmly conjoynd by league and many alliances, that it would not be easie, no not possible, for any one Nation to resist them. With these incitements, and strengthened with great presents, he drew to himself so many adherents, as he compounded an Armie of two hundred thousand foot, and threescore thousand horse; of which, ten thousand horse, and forty thousand foot were led by Cresus, who had great cause of enmitie with the Medes, in regard of the Warre made by them against his Father Alyattes. But this great Armie was by Cyaxares King of the Medes, and by Cyrus Generall of the Persian forces, utterly broken; Upon which defeat the Assyrian King being also slain, so many of the Assyrians revolted, as Babylon it self could not longer be assured without the succours of Mercenaries, waged with great summes of money out of Asia the lesse, Egypt, and elsewhere. Which new gathered forces were were also scattered by Cyrus, who following his advantage, possesse himself of a great part of the lesse Asia; at which time it was, as I take it, that Cresus himself was also made prisoner.

The attempt of Babylon following soon after, the Armie lying before it being paid by Darius, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, and led by Cyrus his sifers son, prevailed against Balthasar, as in due time shall be set down.

Those Persians which followed Cyrus, and by him levied, are numbred thirty thousand foot-men, of which a thousand were armed Gentlemen, the rest of the common sort were Archers, or such as used the Dart or Sling. So far Xenophon. Of whom in this argument, as it is true, that he described in Cyrus the pattern of a most Heroicall Prince, with much Poeticall addition: so it cannot be denied, but that the bulk and grosse of his Narration was founded upon meer Historicall truth.

Neither can it indeed be affirmed of any the like writers, that in every speech and circumstance he hath precisely tyed himself to the phrase of the speaker, or nature of the occasion, but borrowed in each out of his own invention, appropriating the same to the times and persons of whom he treated. Putting therefore apart the Morall and Politick discourse, and examining but the Historie of things done, it will easily appear, that Xenophon hath handled his under-taken subject in such sort, that by beautifying the face thereof, he hath not in any sort corrupted the body.

S. IV.

The estate of the Medes and Persians in times fore-going this great War.

For it is commonly agreed upon, that Achamenes the sonne of Perse being Governor of Persia, did associate himself with Arbaces, who commanded in Media, in that rebellion against Sardanapalus, and that each of them after the victorie obtained, held for himself the Dominion of those Countries, which he had formerly ruled for the Assyrians; as also that they conveyed over the same honour and power to their posteritie; which in Media was not absolutely Regall, but with some restraint limited, untill such time as Deioces took upon him the full authoritie and majestie of a King. From the death of Sardanapalus to the reign of Deioces, are usually accounted about an hundred and forty years, in the last sixty whereof there reigned in Assyria mighty Princes, namely, Salmanassar and his Successors; whose great achievements in Syria and elsewhere, witnesseth, that the Medes and Persians found it not for their advantage to undertake any offensive war against those victorious Kings, it being also probable that the league continued as yet between these the successors of Belochus and Arbaces, who had formerly shared the Empire.

Now from the beginning of Deioces to the first of Astyages, there past above ninetie years, in which, if Herodotus have written truly, that Phraortes conquered Persia, and how he and other Kings of Media by many victories greatly enlarged their Dominions, and commanded many parts of Asia, it had been but an unadvised enterprise of the Assyrians and Babylonians, to have wasted themselves against the Syrians and Egyptians, leaving so able and victorious a Nation on their backs. But that the Medes had done nothing upon the South parts of Persia; and that the Persians themselves were not masters of Susiana in Nabuchodonosors time, it is manifest in Daniel, who was then Governor for the Babylonian in Susa, or Susan, the chief City thereof. It is true indeed, that the Medians, either under Cyaxares or Astyages, or both, had quarrell with Halyattes the father of Cresus, which after some fix years dispute was compounded.

How the affairs of Persia stood in so many ages, I doe not find any memorie. It seemeth that the roughnesse of the mountainous Countrey which they then possesse, with the confederacie which they continued with the Medes, gave them more securitie than fame: For if their Kings, being the posteritie of Achamenes, had done any memorable acts, the greatnesse which they afterward obtained would not have suffered any forgetfulness thereof. But as we find all Xenophons reports, both of these Warres and the state of those countries to be very consonant and agreeable to the relation of many other good Authors, so it appears, that the race of Achamenes held the Principalltie of Persia from Father to Son for many descents. And therefore we may better give credit to Xenophon, who affirmeth, That Cambyſes the father of Cyrus was King of Persia; than to those that make him a mean man, and say, that Aſtyages gave him his daughter Mandane in marriage, to the end that her son (whose nativitie he feared) might be disabled from any great undertaking by his fathers ignobilitie.

For what cause of grief could it be to Aſtyages, that the son of his daughter should become Lord of the best part of Asia? No, it was more likely, that upon such a Prophecie his love to his grand-child should have encreased, and his care been the greater to have married her to some Prince of strength and eminent vertue.

Yea, the same Herodotus, who is the first Author, and as I think the deviser of the mischief intended against Cyrus by his Grandfather, doth confesse, That the line of the Achemenide was so renowned, that the great King Xerxes in the height of his prosperitie did thence derive himself, and vaunt of it: which he would never have done, had they been ignoble, or had they been the vassals of any other King or Monarch.

For in this sort Xerxes in the seventh of Herodotus deriveth himself.

{	Achamenes.	{	Teispens.	{	Hystaspes.	}

Of the Achemenide there were two races: of the first was Cyrus the great, whose issue male failed in his two sons, Cambyſes and Smerdis. This royall familie is thus set down by the learned Reineccius.

Achamenes, the son of Perſes, first King of Persia.

Darius.

Cyrus, the first of that name, had Cambyſes, and Atoſſa, who married to Pharnaces, King of Cappadocia, had Artyſtana and other daughters.

Cambyſes had

Cyrus the Great: Cyrus had

Cambyſes, who succeeded him, and Smerdis, slain by his brother Cambyſes.

Of the second were those seven great Princes of Persia, who having overthrown the usurped royaltie of the Magi, chose from among themselves Darius, the son of Hystaspes, King.

This Kingdome of Persia was first known by the name of Elam, so called after Elam the son of Sem, and the people therein inhabiting, Elamites; by Elianus, Elyma; by Josephus, Elymi.

Suidas derives this Nation sometimes from Aſſur, sometimes from Magog, of whom they were called Maguſai; which Maguſai, according to Eusebius, are not to be taken for the Nation in generall, but for those that were afterward called the Magi or Wise men.

So doe the Greeks, among many other their sayings of them, affirm, That the Persians were anciently written Arizai, and that they called themselves Cephenes. But that they were Elamites, Moses and the Prophets, Eſay, Jeremie, Ezekiel, Daniel and Eſdras, in many places confirm: Which also S. Hierome upon Jeremie the five and twentieth, upon Daniel the eighth, and also in his Hebrew questions, approveth, saying: Elam, a quo Elamites Principes Persidis; Elam, of whom were the Elamites Princes of Persia.

And that Citie which the Author of the second book of the Maccabees calleth Perſepolis, is by the Author of the first called Elemais, but is now called Siras, being the same which Antiochus, for the great riches thereof, twice attempted in vain, and to his great dishonour. And yet this Citie, now called Siras, was not the old Perſepolis; for Alexander at the request of Thais the Harlot, burnt it.

The first King of Persia to us known, if we follow the current of Authors interpreting the fourteenth chapter of Genesis, was Chedorlaomer, who lived with Amraphel or Nimrod, and joyned with him in the war against those Arabians; who was afterward extinguished by the forces of Abraham.

CHAP. III.

Of Cyrus.

S. I.

Of Cyrus his name, and first actions.

Touching the name of Cyrus, Strabo saith, That the same was taken from a river which watereth Persia; this great Prince having Agradatus for his proper name. But the great Cyrus was not the first of that name. Herodotus otherwise; and that Cyrus signifieth a father in the Persian Tongue, and therefore so intitled by the people. It is true, that for his Justice and other excellent vertues he was indeed called a Father; but that the name of Cyrus had any such signification, I think it be mistaken.

Plutarch hath a third opinion, affirming, That Cyrus is as much to say as the Sun, in the same Language. Howsoever it be, yet the Prophet Eſay, almost two hundred years before Cyrus was born, gives him that name, Thus saith the Lord unto Cyrus his Anointed, &c.

Before the Conquest of Babylon, the victories which Cyrus obtained were many and great: among which, the Conquest of Lydia, and other Provinces thereto subject, together with the taking of Cræſus himself, are not recounted by Eusebius, Orosius, and others, but placed among his latter achievements: whose opinion for this difference of time is founded upon two reasons; namely, That of the Median there is no mention in that last war against Cræſus; and that the obtaining of Sardis is referred to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad; and the glorious victorie which Cyrus had over Babylon, to the five and fiftieth Olympiad.

The former of which might have bin used (and was by the Greeks) to exclude the Medes from the honour of having won Babylon it self, which in due place I have answered. The latter seems to have reference to the second War which Cyrus made upon Lydia, when it rebelled; at which time he so established his former Conquest, as after that time these Nations never offered to revolt. Wherefore I like better in this particular to beleieve with Herodotus, whom the most of Chronologers follow, and find the enterprise of Sardis to precede that of Babylon.

S. II.

Of Cræſus the King of Lydia, who made War upon Cyrus.

I Have in the last Book spoken somewhat of Cræſus, of his race and predecessors, as also of those Kings which governed Lydia in more ancient times: of which the first (to prophane Authors known) was Lydus the son of Atys: which Familie extinguished, the kingdom was by an Oracle conferred upon Argon, descended from Hercules, whereof there were two and twentie generations, Candaules being the last, who by shewing his fair wife naked to Gyges his favorite, he was by the same Gyges (thereto urged upon perill of his own life by the Queen) the next day slain. Which done, Gyges enjoyed both the Queen and the Kingdom of Lydia, and left the same to Atys his son, who was father to Sadyattes, the father of Halyattes (who thrust the Cimmerians out of Asia) and Halyattes begat Cræſus. Which five Kings, of a third race, enjoyed that kingdom an hundred and severie years. Halyattes the father of Cræſus was an undertaking Prince, and after he had continued a war against Cyaxares the Median, a Prince very powerfull, and maintained it six years, a peace was concluded upon equall conditions between them.

Aſtyages, the son of Cyaxares, and grandfather to Cyrus, thought himself greatly honoured by obtaining Aryenes, Cræſus sister, whom he married.

But Cresus so far enlarged his dominions after his fathers death, as he was nothing inferior in territory to a y King or Monarch of that age: Of which, about that time there were four in effect of equall strength, to wit, the Median, the Babylonian, the Egyptian, and the Lydian: only Nabuchodonosor, after he had joynd Phœnicia, Palastina, and Egypt to his Empire, had thence-forward no Competitor during his own life.

Her. l. 5.
Abe. l. 14. c. 17

But Cresus, notwithstanding the men and treasure spent in the quarrell of the Babylonians, he yet mastered Æolis, Doris, and Ionia, Provinces posselt by the Greeks in Asia the lesse, adjoyning to Lydia; gave law to the Phrygians, Bithynians, Carians, Myrians, Paphlagonians, and other Nations. And that he also inforc'd the Ephesians to acknowledge him, notwithstanding they compassed their Citie with Diana's girdle, Herodotus 10 witnesseth. Moreover, Athenaus out of Berosus (which also Strabo confirmeth) makes report of a Signall victorie which Cresus obtained against the Sacians, a Nation of the Seythians, in memory whereof the Babylonians his allies did yearly celebrate a Feast, which they called Sacæa: All which he performed in fourteen years.

And being now confident in the continuance of his good fortune, and envious of Cyrus fame, doubting also, that his prosperous undertakings might in the end grow perillous to himself, he consulted with the Oracle of Apollo, whom he presented with marvellous rich gifts, what successe he might hope for against Cyrus, if he undertook him: from whom he received this riddle, Cresus, passing over the River Halys, shall dissolve a great Dominion. For the devill being doubtfull of the successe, payed him with merchandize 20 of both sides alike, and might be inverted either way, to the ruin of Persia, or of his own Lydia.

Cresus his Expedition against Cyrus.

Hereupon Cresus being resolved to stop the course of Cyrus fortunes, if he could, despised all the arguments used by Sandanes to the contrary, who desired him to fore-think, That he urged a Nation inhabiting a barren and mountainous re- 30 gion; a people not covered with the soft silk of worms, but with the hard skins of beasts, not fed with such meat as they fancied, but content with what they found; drinkers of water, not of wine: and in a word, a Nation warlike, enduring, valiant and prosperous; over whom if he became victorious, he could thereby enrich himself in nothing but fame, in which he already excelled; and if by them beaten, and subjected, so great would his losse appear of all things which the world hath in account, as the same could neither hastily be told, nor readily conceived.

Notwithstanding this solid counsel, Cresus having prepared a powerful army, he led the same toward Media, but in his passage he was arrested at Pterium, a City of great strength in Cappadocia; which while he fought by all means to surprize or to force, Cyrus came 40 on, & found the Lydians encamped before it. That each was inferior to other in strength or opinion, I doe not find: for out of doubt, Cresus, as he excelled any Prince of that age in riches and abilitie, so was he not under any in territorie and fame that then lived.

But as Cratippus of Misylene answered Pompey when he complained against the gods, because they favoured a disturber and usurper of the Common-weale against him who fought for the Romane libertie, That Kingdoms and Common-weals had their encrease and period from divine Ordinance: so at this time was the winter of Cresus prosperitie at hand, the leaves of his flourishing fortune ready to fall, and that of Cyrus but in the flower and first spring. The God of all power, and not Admetis Herdman, Apollo, had given a date to the one, and a beginning of glory to the other.

When these two Armies were in view of each other, after the entertainment of divers skirmishes, the Persians and Lydians began to joyn in grosse troops: supplies from both Kings thrust on upon the falling off, and advancement of either Nations; and as the Persians had somewhat the better of the day, so when the dark vaile of night had hidden each Armie from the others view, Cresus doubting what successe the rising Sun would bring with it, quitted the field to Cyrus, and with all speed possible retired, and taking the next way into Lydia, recovered Sardis his first Citie and Regall Seat, without any pursuit made by Cyrus to retard him. Where being arrived, and nothing 50 suspecting suspecting Cyrus approach, or any other War for that Winter, he dismissed the Souldiers, and sent the troops of his sundrie Nations to their own Provinces, appointing them to re-assemble at the end of five months, acquainting his Commanders with his intents for the renewing of the War at the time appointed.

S. IV.

The Conquest of Lydia by Cyrus.

C*yrus* in the following morning finding the Lydians departed, put his Armie in order to pursue them, yet not so hastily, and at their heels, as to be discovered. But having good intelligence of Cresus his proceeding, he so measured his marches, as he presented not himself before Sardis, till such time as Cresus had disposed his Armie to their wintring garrisons: which being altogether unlooked for, and unfeared, he surrounded Sardis with his Armie; Wherein Cresus having no other Companies than his Citizens and ordinary Guards, after fourteen days siege the same was entered by assault, and all executed that resisted. Cresus having now neither arms to fight, nor wings to flee, Sardis being on all parts strongly encompasled, thrust himself into the heap 20 and miserable multitude of his vassals, and had undergone the common fortune of common persons vanquished, had not a son of his, who had been dumb all his life, (by extreme 20 mitie of passion and fear enabled) cried out to the Souldiers to spare Cresus. Who thereupon being taken and imprisoned, despoyled of all things but the expectation of death, he was forthwith tied in fetters, and set on the top of a great and high heap of wood, to be consumed to ashes thereon. To which when the fire was set and kindled, remembering the discourse which he had with the Athenian Law-giver, he thrice cried out on his name, Solon; Solon, Solon: and being demanded what he meant by that invocation, he first used silence; but urged again, he told them. That he had now found it true which Solon had long since told them, That many men in the race and couries of their lives might well be accounted fortunate, but no man could discern himself for happy indeed, till his end.

Of which answer Cyrus being speedily informed, remembering the changes of fortune, 30 and his own mortalitie, he commanded his ministers of Justice to withdraw the fire with all diligence, to save Cresus, and to conduct him to his presence: Which done, Cyrus demanded of him, Who it was that had perswaded him? or what self reason had conducted him to invade his territory, and to make him of a friend an enemy? To whom he thus answered; It was thy prosperous, and my unprosperous destiny (the Grecian god flattering therewithall my ambition) that were the inventers and conductors of Cresus War against Cyrus.

Cyrus being pierc'd with Cresus answer, & bewailing his estate, though victorious over it, did not only spare his life, but entertained him ever after as a King and his companion, shewing therein a true effect of mercy indeed, Qua non causam, sed fortunam spectat.

And herein is the reall difference discerned between that behaviour which we call beneficium latronis, and gratiam Principis: A thief sometime sparing the life of him which is in his power, but unjustly: A King that giveth breath, and a continuance of being, to him that was the cause and author of his own evill.

The report made by Xenophon, is, That Cyrus did friendly entertain Cresus at the first fight, not mentioning that which Herodotus delivers, and is here already set down, that he should have bin burnt alive. It may very well be, that Xenophon portraying (in Cyrus) an heroicall Prince, thought an intent so cruell, fitter to be forgotten than rehearsed, as too much mis-beseeming a generous nature. And it is very likely, that neernesse of alliance might with-hold Cyrus (had he bin otherwise vicious) from so cruell a purpose against his grandmothers brother. Howsoever it was, the morall part of the Storie hath given much credit and reputation to the report of Herodotus (as to many the like it often doth) and made it passe for currant, though the trust reposed in Cresus afterwards may seem to argue, that Cyrus did not use him inhumanly at the first.

For as Herodotus himself telleth us, when Cyrus past with his Armie over Anaxes into Scythia, he left Cresus to accompany and advise his son Cambyfes, Governour of the Empire in his absence, with whom he lived all the time of Cyrus, & did afterward follow Cambyfes Cambyses into Egypt, where he hardly escaped his tyrannous hand. What his end was, I do not find.

But in this time the races of three of the greatest Kings in that part of the world took end; to wit, of the Babylonians, Medians, and Lydians, in Balthasar, Cyaxares, and Crasus.

S. V.

How Cyrus won Babylon.

After this Lydian War ensued the great Conquest of Babylon, which gave unto Cyrus an Empire so large and mightie, that he was justly reputed the greatest Monarch then living upon earth. How long time the preparations for this great action took up, it is uncertain; only it seems, that ten whole years did passe between his taking those two Cities of Sardis and Babylon; which nevertheless I doe not think to have bin wholly occupied in provision for the Assyrian war, but rather to have bin spent in settling the Estate which he had already purchased. And hereunto perhaps may be referred that which Ctesias hath in his fragments, of a war made by Cyrus upon the Scythians, though related as foregoing the victory obtained against Crasus. He telleth us, That Cyrus invaded Scythia, and being victorious over that Nation, took Amorges their King prisoner: but being in a second battell overthrown by the wife of Amorges, Sparetha, and therein taken, the one King was delivered for the other.

Likewise it may be thought, that no small part of those troubles which arose in the lower Asia, grew soon after the departure of the victorious armie, before the Conquest was fully established.

For after Cyrus was returned out of Asia the lesse, many Nations, conquered formerly by Crasus, and now by Cyrus, revolted from him; against whom he employed Pactias, and then Harpagus, who first reduced the Phocians under their former obedience, and then the rest of the Greeks inhabiting Asia the lesse, as the Ionians, Carians, Eolians, and Lycians, who resolutely (according to the strength they had) defended themselves. But in the attempt upon Babylon it self, it is not to be doubted, that Cyrus employed all his forces, having taken order before-hand, that nothing should be able to divert him, or to raise that siege, and make frustrate the work upon which he did set all his rest. And great reason there was, that he should bend all his care and strength unto the taking of that citie, which beside the fame and reputation that it held, as being head of an Empire thereon depending, was so strongly fenced with a treble wall of great height, and surrounded with waters unfoordable, so plentifully victualled for many years, that the inhabitants were not only free from all doubt and fear of their estate, but despised and derided all purposes and power of their besiegers.

The only hope of the Medes and Persians, who despaired of carrying by assault a Citie so well fortified and manned, was in cutting off all supplies of victuals and other necessities wherof though the Town was said to be stored sufficiently for more than 20. years, yet might it well be deemed, that in such a world of people as dwelt within those gates, one great want or other would soon appear, & vanquish the resolution of that unwarlike multitude. In expecting the success of this course, the besiegers were likely to endure much travel, & all in vain, if they did not keep streight watch & strong guards upon all quarters.

This was hard to doe, in regard of the vast circuit of those wals which they wereto gird in, with numbers neither great enough, nor of men sufficiently assured unto their commander: The consideration wherof ministred unto the Babylonians matter of good pastime, when they saw the Lydians, Phrygians, Cappadocians, and others, quartered about their Town to keep them in, who having bin their ancient friends and allies, were more likely to joyn with them, if occasion were offered, than to use much diligence on the behalf of Cyrus, who had, as it were, yesterday layd upon their necks the galling yoke of servitude. Whilst the besieged were pleasing themselves in this deceitfull and vain gladnesse, that is the ordinary fore-runner of sudden calamitie, Cyrus, whom the Ordinance of God made strong, constant, and inventive, devised by so many channels and trenches as were sufficient and capable of Euphratus, to draw the same from the walls of Babylon, thereby to make his approach the more facile and assured: which when by the labour of many hands he had performed,

he stayed the time of his advantage for the execution: for he had left certain bankes or heads un-cut, between the main river which surrounded the Citie, and his own Trenches.

Now Balthasar, finding neither any want or weaknes within, nor any possibilitie of approach for his enemies without, prepared an exceeding sumptuous feast, publike Playes, and other Pastimes, and thereto invited a thousand of his Princes or Nobilitie, besides his wives, curtizans, and others of that trade. This he did either to let the besiegers know, that his provisions were either sufficient, not onely for all needfull uses, but even for jollitie and excess; or because he hoped that his enemies, under the burthen of many distresses were well neere broken; or in honour of Bel his most reverenced Idoll; or that it was his birth or coronation day; or for many or all these respects. And he was not contented with such magnificence as no Prince else could equall, but (using Daniels words) He lifted himself up against the Lord of Heaven: for he and his Princes, wives and concubines, made carowing cups of the Vessels of God, in contempt of whom he praised his own puppets, made of Silver and Gold, of Brasse, Iron, Wood, and Stone; *Quanta fuit stultitia in vasibus aureis bibentes, lignis & lapideis deos laudare? How great a foolishnesse was it (saith S. Hierome) drinking in golden Cups, to praise gods of Wood and Stone? While Balthasar was in this sort triumphing; and his brains well filled with vapors, he beheld a hand, which by divine power wrote on the wall opposite unto him, certain words which he understood not: wherewith so great a fear and amazement seized him, as the ioynts of his loyns were loosed, and his knees smote one against the other. Which passion when he had in some part recovered, he cried out for his Chaldeans, Astrologians, and Soothsayers, promising them great rewards, and the third place of honour in the kingdome to him that could read and expound the writing: but it exceeded their Art. In this disturbance and astonishment, the Queen hearing what had past, and of the Kings amazement, after reverence done, used this speech: *There is a man in thy Kingdome, in whom is the spirit of the holy Gods, and in the dayes of thy father, light, and understanding, and wisdom, like the wisdom of the Gods, was found in him, whom the King Nabuchodonosor, thy father, the King (I say) thy father made chief of the Interpreters, Astrologians, Chaldeans, and Soothsayers, because a more excellent spirit, and knowledge, and understanding, &c. were found in him, even in Daniel, &c. Now let Daniel be called, and he will declare the interpretation.

This Queen, Josephus takes for the grandmother; Origen and Theodoret for the mother of Balthasar; either of which may be true: for it appeareth, that she was not any of the Kings wives, because absent from the feast; and being past the age of dancing and banquetting, she came in upon the bruit of the miracle, and to comfort the King in his distraction. And whereas Daniel was forgotten and neglected by others both of younger years and times, this old Queen remembered well what he had done in the dayes of Nabuchodonosor, grandfather to this Balthasar, and kept in mind both his religion and divine gifts.

When Daniel was brought to the Kings presence, who acknowledged those excellent graces wherewith God had enriched him, he prayed him, together with promises of reward and honour, to read and interpret those words miraculously written; to whom Daniel made answer in a farre different style from that hee used towards his Grandfather: for the evil which he foretold Nabuchodonosor, he wished that the same might befall his enemies; but to this King (whose neglect of God, and vice, he hated) he answered in these words, Keep thy reward, to thy self, and give thy gifts to another, yet will I read the writing unto the King, and shew him the interpretation. Which before he had performed, he gave him first the cause of Gods just judgement against him, and the reason of this terrible sentence, wherof the King and all his Wife men were utterly ignorant. Which being written at large in Daniel, hath this effect, That forgetting Gods goodness to his Father, whom all Nations feared and obeyed, and that for his pride and neglect of those benefits, as hee deprived him of his estate and understanding, so upon the acknowledgement of Gods infinite power he restored him to both. This King notwithstanding lifted himself up against the same God, and presuming both to abuse those vessels dedicated to holy uses, and neglecting the Lord of all power, praised and worshipped the dead Idols of Gold, Silver, Brasse, Iron, Stone, and Wood: and therefore those words, from the Oracle of a true God delivered, (to wit) Mene, Tekel, Upharzin, gave gave the King knowledge, that God had numbred the time of his kingdome, and finished it; That he was weighed in the ballance of Gods justice, and found too light; and that his Empire was divided and given to the Medes and Persians.

The very evening or night of this day, wherein Balthasar feasted and perished, Cyrus, either by his spiall, according to Xenophon, or inspired by God himself, whose ensigne he followed in this warre, found the time and opportunitie to invite him: and therefore while the Kings head, and the heads of his Nobilitie were no lesse filled with the vapors of wine, than their hearts with the fear of Gods judgement, he caused all the banks and heads of his trenches to be opened and cut down with that diligence, as by them he drew the great River of Euphrates dry for the present, by whose channell running, his Armie made their entrance, finding none to disturb them. All the Town lay buried (as the Poet saith) in sleep and wine: such as came in the Persians way, were put to the sword, unlesse they saved themselves by flight, as some did, who ran away crying, and filling the streets with an uncertain tumult.

Esay 47.

Such Assyrian Lords as had revolted from Balthasar, and betaken themselves to the party of Cyrus, did now conduct a selected companie to the Kings Palace, which having easily forced, they rushed into the chamber where the King with his Princes were banquetting, slew both him and them without any mercie, who struggled in vain to keep those lives which God had newly threatned to take away. And now was the prophetic of Jeremie fulfilled, and that of Esay, two hundred years before this subversion, wherein his seven and fortieth Chapter, and elsewhere, writeth this destruction so feelingly and lively, as if he had been present both at the terrible slaughter there committed, and had also seen the great and unfear'd change and calamitie of this great Empire; yea, and had also heard the sorrows and bewailings of every surviving soul thereunto subject. His Prophecie of this place he beginneth in these words; Come down, and sit in the dust, O virgin daughter of Babel: sit on the ground, there is no Throne, &c. And again, Sit still and get thee into darkness, O daughter of the Chaldeans, for thou shalt no more be called the Lady of Kingdomes. For though it cannot be doubted, that God used Nabuchodonosor and the Chaldeans, to punish the Idolatrie of the Judaans, yet Esay teacheth us in this place, That he did not yet forget, that the execution of his judgements was mixt with a rigorous extremite. For (saith Esay) in the person of God, I was wroth with my people, I have polluted mine inheritance, and given them into thine hand: thou didst shew them no mercy, but thou didst lay thy very heavy yoke upon the anient. I will rise up against them, saith the Lord of Hosts, and will cut off from Babel the name and the remnant, and the son and the nephew. And in the thirteenth, Every one that is found, shall be stricken thorow: and whosoever joyneth himself, shall fall by the sword, their children also shall be broken in pieces before their eyes, their houses spoiled, and their wives ravished. So as there is no Historian who was either present at this victory of Cyrus, or that received the report from others truly as it was, that could better leave the same to posteritie after it happened, than Esay hath done in many places of his Prophecies, which were written two hundred years before any thing attempted.

Diod. l. 3.

The greatnesse and magnificence of Babylon, were it not by divers grave Authors set down, might seem altogether fabulous: for, besides the reports of Saint Hierome, Solinus, and Orosius, Aristotle in the third of his Politicks, the second Chapter, received the report for true, That one part of the Citie knew not that the rest was taken three dayes after. Which is not impossible, if the testimonie of Diodorus Siculus may be taken; who finds the compass thereof at three hundred and threescore Stadia or Furlongs, which makes five and forty miles: the walls whercof had so great a breadth, that six Chariots might passe in front thereon. And of height, according to Ctesias and Clitarchus, three hundred threescore and five foot, garnished with an hundred and fiftie Towers. Strabo in the beginning of his sixteenth Book of Geographie gives it a greater circuit, adding five and twenty furlongs more to the former compass, reckoning the same at three hundred fourscore and five furlongs, which makes eight and fortie mile and one furlong, but finds the wall farre under that which Diodore reports: and so doth Curtius measure their thicknesse but at two and thirtie foot, and their height at an hundred cubits, which is also very much; every cubit containing a foot and half of the large measure, though to the whole circuit of the Citie he gives the same with Siculus, and eight furlongs more. Herodotus finds a greater content than Strabo doth, namely, foure hundred and fourscore furlongs circle; the thicknesse of the wall he measures at fiftie cubits, and the height at two hundred of the same regall cubit. For entrance it had an hundred gates of Brasse, with posts and hooks to hang them on of the same metall: and therefore did the Prophet Esay rightly intitle Babylon, The Princeesse and Glory of Kingdomes.

But when Cyrus had wonne her, he stript her out of her Princely Robes, and made her a slave; dividing not only all her goodly houses, and her whole Territorie, with all the riches therein contained, among his Souldiers; but bestowing the inhabitants themselves as bond-slaves upon those that had taken possession of their goods.

Touching the reign of Cyrus, and the time which he enjoyed in rest and pleasure, I can say no more of it, than that it is generally agreed by all Chronologers to have lasted only seven years: in which time he made such Constitutions as differ little from the Ordinances of all wise Kings that are desirous to establish a Royall power to themselves and their posteritie.

S. VI.

The end of Cyrus.

The last warre, and the end of this great King Cyrus, is diversly written. Herodotus and Justin deliver, That after the Conquest of Asia the lesse, Cyrus invaded the Massagetes, a very warlike Nation of the Scythians, governed by Tomyris their Queen: and that in an encounter between the Persians and these Northern Nomades, Tomyris lost her Armie, and her Son Spargapises that commanded it: In revenge whercof, this Queen making new levies of men of War, and following the War against Cyrus, in a second battell beat the Persian Armie, and taking Cyrus prisoner, cut off his head from his body, and cast the same into a boule of bloud, using these words; Thou hast all thy life time thirsted for bloud, now drink thy fill, and satiate thy self.

It should hereby seem, that Cyrus knowing the strength and multitude of those frozen Nations, was perswaded to abate their furie by some forcible invasion and depopulation, because in the time of Cyaxares, father to Astyages, those Scythians invaded Media and Asia the lesse, and held the same in a servile subjection eight and twenty years.

This war which Metasthenes calleth Tomyrique, lasted (saith he) six years, and took end at the end of Cyrus.

But in this particular I believe with Viginier, that this Scythian War was rather the same which Cyrus made against the Sacians, before the conquest of Lydia, according to Ctesias before cited, who calleth Tomyris, Sparetha, though he deliver the successe of that war otherwise than Herodotus doth: The rather (saith Viginier) because Strabo in his eleventh book reciteth, that Cyrus surprized the Sacians by the same stratagem by which Justin saith he defeated the son of Tomyris. And the same Ctesias also reporteth, That the last war which Cyrus made, was against Amorrhæus king of the Derbicians; a Nation (as the rest) of Scythia; whom though he overcame, yet he then received the wound of his death, which he suffered three dayes after.

Strabo also affirmeth, That he was buried in his own Citie of Pasagardes, which himself had built, and where his Epitaph was to be read in his time, which is said to have bin this: O vir, quicumque es, & undecumque advenis, neque enim te adventurum ignoravi: Ego sum Cyrus qui Persis imperium constitui, pusillum hoc terra quo meum tegitur corpus mihi ne invidias; O thou man, whosoever thou art, or whencesoever thou comest; for I was not ignorant that thou shouldest come: I am Cyrus that founded the Persian Empire, doe not envie unto me this little earth, with which my body is covered.

This Tombe was opened by Alexander, as Qu. Curtius reporteth, either upon hope of treasure, supposed to have been buried with him, or upon desire to honour his dead body with certain ceremonies; in which there was found an old rotten Target, two Scythian Bowes, and a sword. The Coffin wherein his body lay, Alexander caused to be covered with his own garment, and a Crown of gold to be set upon it. These things well considered, as they give credit to the reports of Xenophon and Zonaras, so they derogate much from Herodotus, who leaves his body in the hands of Tomyris.

And

Zon. l. 1. c. 20.

And surely, had Cyrus lost the Armie of Persia in Scythia, it is not likely, that his son would so soon have transported all his remaining forces into Egypt, so farre off from that quarter; the Scythian Nation then victorious, and bordering Media: neither had Cambyfes been able in such haste to have undertaken and performed so great a Conquest. Wherefore I rather believe Xenophon, saying, That Cyrus died aged and in peace: and that finding in himself that he could not long enjoy the world, he called unto him his Nobilitie, with his two sons, Cambyfes and Smerdis; or after Xenophon, Tanaoxares: and after a long Oration, wherein he assured himself, and taught others of the immortality of the Soul, and of the punishments and rewards following the good and ill deserving of every man in this life; he exhorted his sons by the strongest arguments he had, to a perpetuall concord and agreement. Many other things he uttered, which make it probable, that he received the knowledge of the true God from Daniel, when he governed Susa in Persia; and that Cyrus himself had read the Prophecie of Esay, wherein he was expressly named, and by God (for the delivery of his people) preordained. Which act of delivering the Jewes from their Captivitie, and of restoring the holy Temple and Citie of Hierusalem, was in true consideration the noblest work that ever Cyrus performed. For in other actions he was an instrument of Gods power, used for the chastising of many Nations, and the establishing of a government in those parts of the world, which was not long to continue. But herein he had the grace to be an instrument of Gods goodnesse, and a willing advancer of his Kingdome upon earth; which must last for ever, though heaven and earth shall perish.

of Cyrus his Decree for building the Temple of God in Jerusalem.

HAVING therefore spoken of his great victories, mentioned by sundrie Historians, the glory of all which was a reward of this his service done unto him that was Author of them and of all goodnesse: I hold it meet at length to speak of the Decree made in the first of his Reign, being perhaps the first that ever hee made after his possession of the Babylonian Empire: That the captive Jewes should return again into their own Territorie, and re-build the House of God in Jerusalem, having now endured and finished the threescore and ten years captivitie, by the Prophets foretold. For the accomplishing whereof, hee gave order to his Treasurers to furnish them with all things necessary and wanting. He also restored unto them five thousand four hundred threescore and nine Vessels of Gold and Silver, whereof Nabuchodonosor, the grandfather of Balthasar, had formerly robbed the Temple.

The number of the Jewes which returned out of Chaldea under their Leader Zorobabel, the son of Salathiel, and Nephew to King Jeconias, and Jesus or Josua the son of Josadak, were about fifty thousand; where, as soon as they arrived, they built an Altar to the living God, and sacrificed thereon, according to their own law, and afterward began to think themselves how to prepare materials for the rebuilding of the Temple.

But no sooner did the Jewes begin to lay any one stone, than the Samaritans and other idolatrous Nations adjoining, gave all the impediment they could. So did the Governours of those Provinces under Cyrus altogether countenance the disturbers, and in no sort favoured the Jewes, nor the labours nor purposes they had in hand. And not onely those which were but Provinciaall Lieutenants, and other officers of lesse place, but Cambyfes himself; who having the charge of the whole Empire, while Cyrus was busied otherwise, countermanded the building begun. And whereas some Authors make doubt, that whatsoever Cambyfes did when himself had obtained the Empire, yet during the life of Cyrus there was no such impediment or prohibition: they may herein relolve themselves out of *Esdra*s, That by the conspiracies of the neighbouring Nations, the building was hindered all the time of King Cyrus life, &c. And therefore it is true, that the Jewes themselves affirm, as it is written in the second of John, That the Temple was 46. years in setting up, having received so many hinderances from the first foundation to the second of Darius.

And if we seek the naturall and politique courses which moved Cambyfes to withstand his fathers decree, as well while he governed under him, as when himself became sole and sovereign Monarch, we shall find them in that Epistle, remembred by *Esdra*s, written by Belemus, Mithridates, and the rest, Presidents and Counsellors in Phenicia, where in they complain that the Jewes were evermore rebellious and troublers of Kings; that their City being once built, they would then refuse to pay tribute, and fall from the obedience of the Empire, as they had formerly done in the times of other Kings.

But that which for that present seemed the most forcible impediment, was, that Cambyfes having it in his resolution to invade Egypt, and that it was a common opinion, That the Jewes were descended of those Nations, because they issued thence under Moses, when they conquered Judea; their Citie being once repaired and fortified, they might return to their old vomit, and give the same disturbance to Cambyfes Conquest, which they did to Sennacherib, Nabuchodonosor, and other Kings of Babylon. For as it is written in Ezechiel, Egypt was the confidence of the house of Israel.

But it is to be understood, as Codoman and others have observed, that Artaxerxes, to whom the Counsellors and Governours of Phenicia complained against the Jewes, did not precede, but succeed Darius Hystaspes, as in the sixth and seventh chapters of *Esdra*s it is made plain: and also that those Governours (whose Epistle sheweth as much) did not withstand the building of the Temple, but the fortifying and enclosing of the City, as by the reasons given in the said Epistle, and by the Kings answer, it is evident.

Also in the sixth of Ezra, the fourteenth verse, the kings are named in order as they governed, and Artaxerxes written after Darius; as: And they built and finished it (to wit the Temple) by the appointment of the God of Israel, and by the commandment of Cyrus and Darius, and Artahastate Kings of Persia. Lastly, in the seventh of Ezra it is written; Now after these things, in the reign of Artahastate King of Persia: which was as much as to say, after the finishing of the Temple in Darius time. And therefore Artaxerxes in the second of *Esdra*s is there named by anticipation, not in his own time and place.

And thus much concerning the rebuilding of the Citie and Temple of Hierusalem. Which action though prospered by the hand of God, was very slowly pursued by the men whom it most concerned, but first set on foot by Cyrus. The other ordinances of Cyrus, with his forme and manner of government, are to be found in Xenophon. At his death he bequeathed the Empire unto his eldest son Cambyfes, appointing Smerdis or Tanaoxares his yonger son to be Satrapa, or Lieutenant of Media, Armenia, and Cadusia; and then died, after he had reigned (saith Herodotus) one and thirty years, or (according to Justine) but thirty.

of Cyrus his issue: and whether Atossa were his daughter, or (as some think) were the same with Queen Hester.

Cyrus had issue two sons, Cambyfes and Smerdis, with three daughters, Atossa, Meroe, and Artystona: Ctesias addeth to these, Amytis. Atossa and Meroe their brother Cambyfes married; Artystona, Darius Hystaspes obtained; so did hee Atossa, Cambyfes being dead: who (as some Writers have supposed) inflamed both her husbands, Darius, and Xerxes after him, to invade Greece, to be avenged of the whole Nation for the cruel intent that Aman (whom the old Translation calleth a Macædonian) had against the Jewes, though the opinion of Josephus be more probable, who finds Aman to be an Amalekite. But it is hard to be understood, how Atossa, the daughter of Cyrus, should have been Esther, whose History seemes rather to appertain to the time of Artaxerxes Longimanus, than of Darius the son of Hystaspes, or of Xerxes. The desire of Atossa to have Greece brought under the yoke of Persia, was partly grounded upon the honour which thereby the thought her husband might obtaine, partly upon a feminine humour of getting many brave Dames, Corinthians, Athenians, and others of that Nation to be her bond-women. Wherefore I cannot give assent to the opinion of Codoman, who upon the near sound of the two names, Atossa and Hadassa, (by the latter of which Esther was also called) makes them to have been one person. For though it bee true that Esther concerning her parentage, a while might bee taken for a great Lady; yet *Codoman*s inference is nothing probable, that she should therefore, and for the great affection which the King bare unto her, he thought the daughter of Cyrus. Certain it is, that Esther did at length discover her Kindred and Nation; whereby, if Histories could be kept free from this error, yet the people, and especially the Nobility, must needs have understood the truth: who nevertheless did so well know the parentage of Atoffa, that for her sake, as being daughter of Cyrus, her son Xerxes was preferred to the kingdom before his elder brother, against whom also he could have pretended a very weak claim. But of these things more hereafter in fitter place.

CHAP. IV.

The estate of things from the death of CYRUS to the reign of DARIUS.

S. I.

Of the number and names of the Persian Kings.

Of the successors of Cyrus, and the continuance of the Persian Empire, there are many opinions; As that of Metasthenes, who hath numbered the Persian Kings, and their times as followeth.

Darius Medus , and Cyrus jointly.	2
Cyrus alone.	22
Priscus Artaxerxes .	20
Darius Longimanus .	37
Darius Nothus .	19	years.
Artaxerxes Mnemon .	55
Artaxerxes Ochus .	26
Artes , or Arfames .	4
Darius the last, conquered by Alexander .	6

To which Philo agreeth; which number of years added, make in all an hundred nine and one. But in this Catalogue Metasthenes hath left out Cambyfes and Xerxes, and names Artaxerxes Assuerus for the immediate successor of Cyrus; in place (saith Melancton) of Darius the son of Hystaspes: for Metasthenes, as Melancton conjectureth, doth not account Cambyfes in the Catalogue, because his reign was confounded with that of Cyrus.

There is a second opinion, though ridiculous, of Sedar Olam, who finds but foure Persian Kings from the beginning to the end of that Empire.

Genebrard, Schubert, and Beroaldus have also a differing account from the Greeks; whom nevertheless Eusebius and most of the Latines follow, and so doth Krentzheim, who hath fully answered, and, as I take it, refuted all the former Authors varying from that account. For in this sort doe the Greeks marshall the Persian Kings with the times of their reigns.

Cyrus in all.	30
Cambyfes with the Magi.	8
Darius Hystaspes .	36
Xerxes .	21
Artaxerxes Longimanus .	40
Darius Nothus .	19	years.
Artaxerxes Mnemon .	43
Artaxerxes Ochus .	23
Arfames .	3
Darius the last.	6

Which numbers put together, make in all two hundred and thirty.

This account (as I have said) the most Chronologers, and the best learned approve. These Persian Princes, being all warranted by the authority of the Scriptures, as Peuce in his historical Animadversions hath gathered the places, finding first Cyrus in the second of Chronicles, ch. 36. ver. 22, 23. Ezra. i. ch. i. ver. i. and often elsewhere.

Secondly, Cambyfes in the eleventh of Daniel, who may indeed be well esteemed for one of those three Kings in the second verse named, and so the marginal Commentator upon the Geneva understands that place; but, under correction, mistakes the matter greatly, when he saith in the same note, that Darius Hystaspes was an enemy to the people of God, and stood against them: his great favour and liberality to the Jews being elsewhere proved.

Thirdly, is Darius Hystaspes found in Ezra the first, c. 4. v. 5. who in the sixth verse is also named Ahasuerus.

Fourthly, in the eleventh of Daniel verse the second, Xerxes is plainly foretold and described, and the great War which he should make against the Greeks by Daniel remembered.

Fifthly, Artaxerxes Longimanus in Ezra the fourth, verse seven, who is also called Aribashta, c. 4. l. i. Ezra. v. 7. and cap. 7. v. 7.

Sixthly, Darius Nothus, Ezra cap. 4. verse 24. and cap. 5. verse 6. Nehem. cap. 12. verse 22.

Seventhly, Artaxerxes Mnemon in Nehem. c. 2. v. 1. who was father to Artaxerxes Ochus, and Arfames: for Darius the last, he was of another Family, the Line of Cyrus the Great ending in Ochus, who descended from Xerxes the son of Atoffa, Cyrus his daughter; and the issue male of Cyrus failing with his own sons.

But to proceed, Eusebius with the Latines, following the Greeks, apply the beginnings and ends of every Persian King with their Acts, to some certain Olympiad; As the War of Astages (Cyrus his maternall Grand-father) and Alyattes (Crasus his father) to the nine and fortieth Olympiad; The beginning of Cyrus reign to the beginning of the five and fiftieth Olympiad; The taking of Sardia by Cyrus to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad; The invasion of Egypt by Cambyfes to the third year of the threescore and thirtieth Olympiad, and so of the rest. Which reference with good agreement between several forms of computation, adde the more credit unto both.

Again, this historical demonstration is confirmed by the Astronomicall computation of Ptolomie, who refers the death of Alexander the Great, who died the 12. of November, in the beginning of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad, to the four hundred and four and twentieth year after Nabonassar. And the Ara of Nabonassar began on the six and twentieth of February: which conferred with the Olympiad, was in the ninth Month of the first year of the eighth Olympiad; So that whether we follow the accounts of the Olympiads, as doe the Greek Historians, or that of Nabonassar with Ptolomie, we shall find every memorable accident to fall out right with each computation.

For Ptolomy reckons the time answerable to two hundred and four and twenty Julian years, and an hundred and forty days from Nabonassar to the sixteenth of July in the seventh year of Cambyfes.

The Greeks, and namely, Diodorus Siculus, place the taking of Egypt by Cambyfes in the second or third year of the threescore and third Olympiad; and the beginning of Cambyfes seventh year, in the first of the threescore and fourth Olympiad: which first of the threescore and fourth Olympiad runs along with part of the two and twentieth of Nabonassar. The like agreement is consequently found about the beginning and end of Cyrus.

Likewise the twentieth of Darius, who succeeded Cambyfes, is according to Ptolomie the two hundred and six and fortieth of Nabonassar, which (observing the differences of Nabonassar Ara and the Olympiad, viz. eight and twenty years) agrees with the third of the threescore and ninth Olympiad, wherein it is placed by the Greeks. In this Josephus agrees with the Greeks throughout, saving that he joyneth Darius Medus, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, with Cyrus in the destruction of Babylon; which is true, and not contrary to the Greek computation, but may very well stand with it.

Lastly, the disagreements and confused accounts of those that follow the other Catalogue of the Persian kings formerly rehearsed, doth give the greater credit to this of the Greeks.

Greeks, which being constant in it self, accordeth also with the computation of other Historians, and Astronomers, and likewise with the holy Scriptures.

s. II.

of Cambyfes, and the conquering of Egypt by him.

Will therefore according to the truth give the Empire of Persia to Cambyfes, the son of Cyrus, though degenerate in all things, saving the desire to increase the greatnesse of his Empire: whereof he was posselt in his Fathers time while Cyrus made war in the North. Ctesias with others give him a longer reign than agreeth with the Grecian account before received.

In the fifth year of his sole reign, and in the third year of the threescore and third Olympiad, according to Diodore and Eusebius, he invaded Egypt, and having overthrown the King thereof, Psammeniticus, he not only caused him to be slain, but also did put to death all his kindred and dependants, with the most of his children.

Herodotus and Ctesias give for cause of this war (being no other indeed than the Ambition of Cambyfes) that when he sent to Amasis King of Egypt, to have his daughter in marriage, Amasis presented him with Nitetis the daughter of Apries his predecessor, which Cambyfes disdaind.

Howsoever it were; true it is, that Cambyfes gathered an Armie fit for such an enterprise, and caused the same to march. But before they entred Egypt, Amasis died, and left 20 Psammeniticus, whom Ctesias called Amyrteus, his successor; who enjoyed Egypt after his father (according to the best copies of Herodotus) but six Months, though other Chronologers give him six years.

But how long soever he held the Crown, in one battell he lost it, and was himself taken prisoner.

It is said that Cambyfes, following therein the example of Cyrus, did not only spare life to the conquered King, but that he also trusted him with the government of Egypt, and that upon some revolt, or suspicion thereof, he caused him to be slaughtered. But the race of this King was not so extirpated, if we may beleieve Herodotus and Thucydides, but that he left a son called Inarus, who caused the Egyptians to revolt both from 30 Xerxes and Artaxerxes.

That Psammeniticus was at the first entreated gently by Cambyfes, I hold it very improbable, if it be true which is also written of him, That he so much hated Amasis the King of Egypt, who died before his arrivall, that he caused his body to be drawn out of the grave, and after divers indignities used, commanded the same to be burnt, contrary to the custome both of the Egyptians and Persians. For the Egyptians used to powder their dead bodies with salt, and other drugs, to the end the worms might not devour them. The Persians durst not consume them with fire, which they esteemed as a God, and therefore feared to feed it with Carrion.

The rest of Cambyfes his Acts.

After this victory obtained in Egypt, Cambyfes sent an Army into Cyprus, and constrained Evelthon King thereof to acknowledge him, who before held that Island of the Egyptians.

While Cambyfes yet busied himself in Egypt, he so much detested the Idolatry of that Nation, as he caused the images themselves, with the Temples wherein they were worshipped, to be torn down and defaced. This done, he directed a part of his Armie into Lybia, to overturne the Temple of Jupiter Ammon; but the Devill in defence of his 50 ratorie raised such a Tempest of Sand, wherewith the greatest part of that Country is covered, as the Persians were therewith choked and over-whelmed.

Notwithstanding which misadventure, Herodotus and Seneca report, that disdainng to be resisted, he prepared the rest of his Army, which himself meant to conduct into those parts, but that finding a beginning of those incommodities, which his first sent troupe had tryed, he changed his purpose. For though conquering Kings have power over men, yet the elements doe not obey them, according to that old English proverb, 60, saith the King 3 Stay, saith the Tide.

After

After his return from the attempt of Ethiopia, he caused Apis the Egyptian Bull, worshipped by that Nation as God, to be slain: a deed very commendable, had it proceeded from true zeal, and been executed as in service of him that only is, and liveth. But soon afterwards, when in a dream it seemed unto him that Smerdis did sit in the royall throne of Persia (which apparition was verified in Smerdis the Magus) he gave it in charge to his favorite Praxaspes, to murder Smerdis his brother. And having married his own sisters, contrary to the Persian Lawes, he committed a most causelesse, and most detestable murder upon the one of them called Meroe; then by himself with child, because she bewailed the death of her brother Smerdis. I find it written of this Cambyfes, 10 That because his Predecessors observed religiously the ordinances of their Empire, he assembled his Judges, and enquired of them whether there were any Law among the Persians that did permit the brother to marry his own sister; it being his own intent so to doe: The Judges (who had alwayes either lawes or in distinctions store to satisfy Kings and times) made answer, That there was nor any thing written allowing any such conjunction, but they notwithstanding found it in their customes, that it was alwayes left to the will of the Persian Kings to doe what best pleased themselves; and so as Nearchus termes it, invenerunt occasionem: That is as much to say, as the Judges found a shift to please the King, and to secure themselves. And yet, where it concerned not the Kings private satisfaction, he caused Sisamnus one of his Judges, and perchance one of those which favoured his incestuous match, to be slayed alive, for an unjust judgement given, 10 and the same his hide to be hung up over the judgement seat. After which, bestowing the fathers office on his son, he willed him to remember that the same partiality deserved the same punishment.

Among other his cruelties, that which he exercised against the son of his beloved Praxaspes was very strange and ungrateful. For when he desired to be truly informed by him what the Persians thought of his conditions, Praxaspes answered, That his vertues were followed with abundant praise from all men; onely it was by many observed, that he took more than usuall delight in the tast of Wine: With which taxation inflamed, he used this replication; And are the Persians double-tongued, who also tell me that I have in all things excelled my father Cyrus? Thou Praxaspes shalt then witness, whether in this report they have done me right: for if at the first shot I pierce thy sons heart 30 with an arrow, then is it false that hath been spoken; but if I misse the mark, I am then pleased that the same be accounted true, and my subjects believed. This being spoken, he immediately directed an arrow towards the innocent child, who falling down dead with the stroke, Cambyfes commanded his body to be opened, and his heart being broched on the arrow, this monstrous Tyrant greatly rejoycing, shewed it to the Father, with this saying in stead of an Epitaph: Now Praxaspes, thou maist resolve thy selfe, that I have not lost my wits with Wine, but the Persians theirs, who make such report.

Many other barbarous cruelties he exercised; till at the last, according to the phrase of our Law, he became felon de soy. For when he was informed that Patizites, and Smerdis the Magi Cedrenus writeth them Sphendanes and Cimerdius) Ministers of his domesticall affairs, taking advantage of the great resemblance between Smerdis the Kings brother, and Smerdis the Magus, posselt themselves of the Empire, he made all haste towards Persia, and in mounting hastily on horseback, his sword dis-sheathing, pierced his own thigh, where-with deadly wounded, falling into an over-late and remediesse repentance of the slaughter which he had executed upon his own brother, he soon after gave up his wicked ghost; when he had reigned eight years, accounting therein those seven Months in which the Magi governed, while he was absent.

In Cambyfes the Male Line of Cyrus failed. For he had no issue either by Atossa or Meroe: yet Zonaras out of Hierome gives him a daughter called Panaspes, and a son called 50 Orontes, who being drowned in the river Ophites by Antioch, the same was afterward in memory of the Princes death called Orontes.

He built the Citie of Babylon in Egypt, in the place where Latopolis was formerly seated, and that of Meroe in the Island of Nilus, calling it by the name of his sister Meroe.

§. III.

of the inter-regnum between Cambyfes and Darius.

CYRUS and his two sons being now dead, and the Kingdome in the possession of one of the Magi, the counterfeit of Smerdis, the Princes, or Satrapes, or Provincial Governors of the Empire (to wit, Otanes, Intaphernes, Gobrias, Megabyfus, Aspathines, Hidarnes, and Darius, who were all descended from Achamenes the first Persian King) having discovered the fraud of this imposture, joyned their forces together, surpris'd and rooted out the Conspirator with his Companions and Assistants. In which action (saith Iustine) Intaphernes and Aspathines were slain: but Herodotus otherwise, that they were onely wounded; for he avoweth that all the seven Princes were present at the election following.

For the Empire being now without a Governour, these Princes grew into a consultation how the same might be ordered from thenceforth. Otanes one of the seven did not fancy any election of Kings, but that the Nobilitie and Cities should confederate, and by just lawes defend their liberty in equality, giving divers reasons for his opinion, being as it seemed greatly terrified by the cruelties of Cambyfes; As first, that it was not safe to give all power to any one, seeing greatnesse it self, even in good men, doth often infect the mind with many vices, and the liberty and freedome in all things is most apt to insult, and to commit all manner of wicked outrage. Again, that tyrants do commonly use the service of wicked men, and favour them most; they usurp upon the lawes of their Country; take other mens wives by force, and destroy whom they please without judgement.

Megabyfus was of another opinion, affirming that the tyrannie of a multitude was thrice more intolerable than that of one. For the multitude doe all things without judgement, runne into businesse and affairs with precipitation, like raging and overbearing floods.

He therefore thought it safest to make election of a few, and those of the best, wisest, and most vertuous; because it is ever found, that excellent Counsels are ever had from excellent men.

Darius gave the third judgement, who perswaded the creation of a King, because even among few diuturnity of concord is seldome found, and in great Empires it doth ever happen that the discord of many Rulers hath enforced the election of one Supreme. It were therefore, saith Darius, far safer to observe the lawes of our Country, by which Kingly government hath been ordained.

The other four Princes adhered to Darius, and agreed to continue the same Imperial government by God established, and made prosperous. And to avoyd partiality, it was accorded, that the morning following these seven Princes should mount on Horseback, and on him the kingdome should be conferred, whose Horse after the Sun-rising should first ney or bray. In the evening after this appointment was made, it is said that Darius consulted with the Master of his Horse Oebarus, who in the Suburbs of the City where the election was resolved of, caused the same Horse, whereon in the morning Darius was mounted, to cover a Mare, who as soon as he came into the same place, was the first Horse that brayed. Whereupon the other six Princes descended from their Horses, and acknowledged Darius for their Lord and King.

Plato in the third of his Lawes affirmeth, that in memory of the seven Princes, whereof Darius himself was one, that delivered the Empire from the usurpation of the Magi, he divided the whole into seven governments; Herodotus saith, into twenty Satrapies.

of Darius his Linage.

Arius was descended of the ancient Persian Kings, to wit, of the Achamenida, of which, Cyrus the Great was the lineall successor. For in this sort Herodotus derives him as before;

Cyrus the first, who had Teispus, who begat Ariaramnes, who was father of Arsamnes, the father of Hytaspes, the father of Darius, surnamed Celes, the father of Xerxes.

CHIT. 1. 4.

Hytaspes accompanied Cyrus the Great, in the wars against the Scythians, at which time Cyrus being made jealous of Darius by a dream of his own, caused him to be sent into Persia, others say to be imprisoned, from whence by the death of Cyrus he was delivered, and made Governour of the Persian Magi. He afterward followed Cambyfes into Egypt; he then joyned with the rest of the Princes against the Magi, and either by the neying of his horse, or, as others affirm, by strong hand he obtained the Empire, which he the more assured to himself by taking two of Cyrus Daughters, and as many of his Neeces for his wives.

of Darius his Government, and suppressing the rebellion of Babylon.

D*Arius* devised equall lawes whereby his subjects might be governed, the same being formerly promised by Cyrus. He gave access to all his subjects, and behaved himself so mildly to all men, that many Nations desired and offered themselves to become his Vassals: Only he layd divers payments and taxes on the people, which had not been accustomed in Cyrus time, to the value of fourteen thousand five hundred and threescore talents, saith Herodotus.

The war which Cambyfes made a far off in Egypt, and the contention between the Magi and the Princes of Persia, for the Empire, gave heart to the Babylonians to recover their liberty, and to shake off the Persian yoke; whereof Darius being advertised, he prepared an Army to recover that City and State revolted. But finding the same a difficult work, he used the service of Zopirus, who for the love he bare Darius, did cut off his own Ears and Nose, and with other wounds yet fresh bleeding, he seemed to fly to the Babylonians for succour, to whom he accused the cruelty of Darius: who for having given him advice to give over the siege of their City, had in this sort dismembred and deformed him; whereupon the Babylonians gave him that credit, as they trusted him with the disposition and commandement of their greatest forces: which when Zopirus had obtained, after some small colourable over-throwes given to the Persians upon sallies, he delivered the Citie into Darius his hands, who had lyen before it twenty moneths.

of Darius his favour to the Jewes in building the Temple.

Ezra. 6. 6.

IN the second year of Darius, he gave order that the building of the Temple at Jerusalem should goe on, and commanded that the same should be finished at his own charge, and out of the revenues of the Crown. And whereas the Governours of those Provinces which are situate between Euphrates and the Phanician, and mid-land Sea (whom Ezra calleth the Captains beyond the River) had hindred the work in Cambyses his time, Darius gave commandement that they should not thenceforth come over unto Jerusalem, to give any impediment to the building, but that they should withdraw themselves, and get them far off till all were finished, and at an end. In the old Latine it is written, Procul recedite ab illis, With draw your selves far from them; in our English, Be ye far from thence, to wit, from the City and Temple now in building.

Ezra 6. 11.

He also made a decree which concerned his own Subjects, That whosoever should thenceforth hinder the setting up of the Temple of God, that his house should be torn down, and the disturber hanged on the Gallows made of the timber thereof. He also in the same decree maketh invocation to God; That hath caused his Name to dwell there (to) destroy all Kings and People that put their hands to alter, and to destroy this house of God which is in Jerusalem, &c. In four years after which decree (the Jewes being really furnished with money and all things necessary from Darius) the Temple was in all finished; to wit, in the beginning of the Spring, in the sixth year of Darius Hystaspes, and in the two and fortieth after their first return.

Diod. 1. 11.

AFTER the recovery of Babylon he invaded the Scythians, whose King Fustine calleth Lanthinus; and faith, that Darius undertook this warre against him, because he refused him his daughter in marriage. The better to convoy his Army into Scythia, he built a bridge of small Vessels over the River Ister or Danubius, and gave the custody of the same in charge (among others of Asia the lesse) to the Ionians and Asiatics, among whom was Miltiades, who perswaded the Asian Grecians to break down the bridge, to the end Darius might not return thereby, and if by any other way, then not without great difficulty; but the same was resisted by Hystians Prince of Milet, a Cite of Ionia, which Nation being a Colonie of the Greeks, Diodorus calleth Traytors to their Countrey, because they joyned themselves to Darius. But the Scythians more elegantly termed them good slaves, for as much as they would not runne away from their Master, but were more mindfull of doing their duties, than of shaking off their bondage, when they were presented with as fair an occasion of liberty as could have been desired. For the great Armie of Darius entring the desert Countrey called Bessarabia, found in it neither people to resist them, nor any lustenance to relieve them. For the Scythians were then, as are the Chim Tartars, their posteritie, at this day, all horse-men, using the Bow and Sword. They were not Plough-men, but Grasers, driving their Herds from one place to another, as opportunity of Pasture led them. Standing Towns they had none; but used for Houses the Waggon wherein they carried their wives and children. These Waggon they place at every Station in very good order, making Streets and Lanes in the manner of a great Town, removeable at their pleasure. Neither hath the Emperour himself, called now the great Chim, any other Cite than such as Agora, (as they name it) or Town of Carts. When as therefore Darius had wearied himself, and wasted his provision in those desolate Regions, wherein he found neither wayes to direct him, victuals to refresh him, nor any houses, fruitfull trees, or living creatures, nor any thing at all, which either he himself might make use of, or by destroying it might grieve his enemies, he began to perceive his own folly, and the danger into which he had brought him. Yet setting a good face upon a bad game, he sent brave messagers to the Scythian, bidding him to cease his fight, and either to make triall of his valour and fortune in plain battell; Or, if he acknowledged himself the weaker, then to yield by fair means, and become his Subject, giving him Earth and Water, which the Persians used to demand as a sign that all was yielded unto them. To this challenge the Scythian returned an Hieroglyphicall answer, sending a Bird, a Frog, a Mouse, and five Arrows: which dumb shew Darius interpreting by his own wish, thought that he did yield all the Elements wherein those creatures live, and his weapons withall into his hands. But Gobryus, one of the seven Princes, who had slain the Magi, construed their meaning aright, which was thus; O ye Persians, get ye wings like Birds, or dive under the water, or creep into holes in the earth, for else ye shall not escape our arrows. And this interpretation was soon verified by the Scythians themselves, who assailed the Persian to camp, drave the horsemen into the trenches, and vexed the Armie with continuall Alarums day and night; were so fearelesse of this great Monarch, and so little regarded him, that within his hearing, and even in his sight, they did not forbear the pastime of courting a Hare, which they had started by chance. By this boldnesse of theirs, Darius was so discouraged, that he forsook his Camp by night, making many fires, and leaving all that were sick and weak behind him, and so with all speed marched away towards the River Ister. He was pursued hardly by the Scythians, who mist him; yet arriving at the Bridge before him, perswaded the Ionians to depart, assuring them that the Persian king should never more be able to do them either good or harm. Which words had certainly been proved true, had not Hystians the Milesian prevailed with his people, to attend the coming of Darius, whom the Scythians did likewise fail to meet, when they returned from Ister to seek him out.

§. V.

Some actions of the Persians in Europe, after the Scythian War.

DARIUS having thus escaped out of Scythia, determined the invasion of Thrace and Macedon, in which War he employed Megabazus, who mastered the Paonians, and transplanted them, and posselt Perinthus, Chalcedon, Byzantium, and other places, being also soon after subjected, and added to the Persian Empire by Otares, the son of Sylamnes, whom Cambyses had exoriated for false judgement. So were the Cities of Selybria, and Cardia likewise taken in from the Persian, who having now reduced under his obedience the best part of Thrace, did send his Embassadors to Amintas King of Macedon adjoining, demanding of him by the Earth and Water, the Sovereignty over that kingdome. Amintas doubting his own strength, entertained the Embassadors with gentle words, and afterwards invited them to a solemne and magnificent feast; the Persians greatly desired that the Macedonian Ladies might be present: which being granted, the Embassadors, who were well filled with wine, and presumed upon their greatnesse and many victories, began to use such embracings, and other lastivious behaviour towards those Noble Ladies, as Alexander the Kings son, great Grandfather to Alexander the Great, disdaining the Persians barbarous presumption, besought his father to with-draw himself from the assembly, continuing notwithstanding all honourable respect towards the Embassadors, whom withall he entreated that the Ladies might refresh themselves for a while; promising their speedy return. This being obtained, Alexander caused the like number of well-favoured yong men to clothe themselves in the same garments, and to use the same attires which the Ladies had worn at the feast, giving them in charge, That when the Persians offered to abuse them, they should forthwith transpierce them with their long knives, of which they were provided for that purpose, which was accordingly performed. Charge was soon after given by Darius for a severe revenge of this murder. But Alexander somewhat before the death of Amintas, gave his sister Gygea in marriage to Bubaris, a principall Commander of Darius forces on that side, who perswading her husband how helpfull the Alliance of Macedon would prove for the invasion of Attica intended, so prevailed, as Alexander escaped that tempest, which threatened to fall upon him very suddenly; the war of Asia the lesse, called Ionick, falling out at the same time.

§. VI. The

The first occasion of the War which Darius made upon Greece, with a rehearſall of the government in Athens, whence the quarrell grew.

Now the better to understand the reason and motives of that great War, which followed soon after, between the Persians and Greeks, it is necessary to make a short repetition of the state of Athens, which Citie endured the hardest and worst brunt of Darius invasion on that side the Sea, with admirable success. Neither doe I hold it any impertinency to be large in unfolding every circumstance of so great a buſineſſe as gave fire to those wars, which never could be thoroughly quenched, until in the ruin of this great Perſian Monarchy, Perſepolis the capitall City of the Empire, was at the request of an Athenian Harlot consumed with a flame, as dreadfull, as in the pride of their greatneſſe, the Persians hath raised in Athens.

Now therefore as out of the former books it may be gathered, how Athens and other parts of Greece, were anciently governed, the same being already set down, though scatteringly, and in severall times, among other the Contemporary occurrents of the Eastern Emperors, and the Kings of Judea; so I thought it very pertinent in this place to remember again the two last changes in the State of Athens. As for the Lacedæmonians, they maintained still their ancient policy under Kings, though these also after some fifteen descents were bridled by the Ephori.

Codrus King of the Athenians, in the former books remembred, who willingly died for the safety of his people, was therefore so honoured by them, as (thinking none worthy to succeed him) they changed their former government from Monarchical to Princes for terme of life, of which Medon the Son of Codrus was the first, after whom they were called Medontide; and of these there were twelve Generations besides Medon, to wit, Ageſtus.

Archippus, in whose times the Greeks transported themselves into Ionia, after Troy an hundred and fourcore years, according to Eusebius: which migration all other Cronologers (such as follow Eusebius herein excepted) find in the year after Troy fallen one hundred and forty.

Agamneſtor.

Achylus, in whose time the Ephori (according to Eusebius) were erected in Lacedæmon.

Alcamenon, the last Prince for life, after whose death the Athenians elected Decennial Governours: the former Princes for life having continued in all three hundred and sixteen years. The first of those that governed for ten years, or the first Archon, was Charops, then

Alſymedes.

Elydicus.

Hippomenes.

Leocrates.

Aſander.

Eraxius was the last Archon of the decennial Governours, which form continuing threecore and ten years, was then changed into annuall Magistrates, Maiors, or Burg-masters, of which Theſeus was the first, according to Pausanias: and then Anthoſthenes.

Archimedes.

Miltiades.

Damafias.

Draco.

Megacles.

Solon, & others, who are the leſſe to be regarded, by reason of the yearly change.

This Solon being a man of excellent wiſdome, gave Laws to the Athenians, which were published, according to Gellius, in the three and thirtieth year of Tarquinus Priſcus, and were in after ages derived unto the Romanes, and by the Decem-viri (Magistrates in Rome created for that purpose) reduced into Twelve Tables, which were the ground of the Roman laws. But these goodly ordinances of Solon, were in his own days violated, and for a while almost quite extinguished. For whereas they were framed unto the practice practice and maintenance of a popular government; the state of Athens was very soon changed into a Monarchie by Piſiſtratus the son of Hippocrates: vvhofinding the Citizens distracted into two factions, whereof Megacles and Lycurgus, two Citizens of noble Families, were become the heads, took occasion by their contention and insolency to raise a third faction more powerfull than the other two, and more plausible, for that he seemed a Protector of the Citizens in generall. Having by this means obtained love and credit, he wounded himself, and feigned that by malice of his enemies he had like to have been slain for his love to the good Citizens; he procured a guard for his defence, and with that band of men surprizing the State-houſe, or Cittadell of Athens, he made himself Lord of the town; Hegeſiſtratus being then Governor. But the Citizens, who in every change of government had sought to remove themselves further and further from the form of a Monarchie, could so ill brook this usurpation of Piſiſtratus, that he was driven for lack of help, to fly the town, as soon as Megacles and Lycurgus (joyning their forces) attempted his expulsion. Yet as the building of his tyranny, founded upon the dissention of the Citizens, was ruined by their good agreement; so was it soon after well reedified by the new breaking out of the old factions. For when Megacles found the power of Lycurgus to grow greater than his own; he did (as is the usuall practice of the weaker side) call in the common enemy Piſiſtratus, to whom he gave his Daughter in marriage; by which alliance the Family of the Alcæmonida, whereof Megacles was chief, became very powerfull, yet so, that Piſiſtratus by their power was made Master both of them and all the rest. But this agreement held not long; the Alcæmonida, and especially Megacles being incensed against Piſiſtratus for his misdeemeanour towards his Wife, Wherefore they practised with the Souldiers of the Town, proceeding in their treason so secretly, and so farre, that Piſiſtratus upon the first discovery of their intent, perceived no other remedy for his affaires, than to with-draw himself to Eretria, where he remained eleven years. Which time being expired; having hired Souldiers out of many parts of Greece, he againe recovered the principality of Athens: after which third obtaining his estate, he governed Athens seventeen years, according to Aristotle, and reigned in all thirty and three years, saith Elianus, but as Justin hath it, four and thirty, according to the time belike as well before as after his severall expulsions. Herodotus gives the Father and the Son six and thirty years; Aristotle five and thirty. But Thucydides affirmeth, that he died very old, leaving for his Successors, his two Sons, Hippias and Hipparchus, who governed the Athenians with such moderation; as they rather seemed the Lineall successors of a naturall Prince than of a Tyrant. But in the end, & some three years before Hippias was expelled out of Athens, his brother Hipparchus was murdered by Harmodius and Ariſtogiton. The cause why, and the manner how performed, Thucydides hath written at large. And though Hipparchus were charged with unnaturall lust, after Harmodius, yet Plato in his Dialogue, intituled Hipparchus, doth greatly magnifie him, affirming that he was a Prince of as many eminent vertues as that Age had any, altogether condemning the murderers, & authors of that scandall. Hippias fearing that this enterprise upon his brother had more and deeper roots than were apparent, first sought to discover the further intents of Harmodius and Ariſtogiton, by a Harlot of theirs called Lemnia: who because she would not reveale her Companions, did cut out her own tongue. Then did Hippias, the better to strengthen himself, enter into a strait amity with Antides, Tyrant of the City Lampsacus, whom he knew to be greatly favoured by Darius, to whose son Hypoclus he gave one of his Daughters in marriage. But some three years after the death of his brother, doubting I know not what strong practice against himself; he began to use the Citizens with great severity, which neither Piſiſtratus the Father, nor Hippias himself had ever exercised, during their usurpation till this time. And therefore the Athenians fearing lest that this disease might rather increase, than diminish in Hippias, they stirred up Clistines one of the noblest and best able of their City, to practise their delivery: who calling to his assistance the banished Alcæmonida, together with an Army of the Lacedæmonians led by Cleomenes their King, so affrighted Hippias, as by composition he gave over his estate, and the possession of Athens; and from thence embarking himself, took land at Sigæum, whence he went to Lampsacus in Myſia governed by Antides, who presented him to Darius. He was deprived of his estate, as Herodotus and Thucydides agree, twenty years before the battell of Marathon: all which time he continued, partly with Antides, at other times with Artaphernes Lieutenant for Darius.

Darius in Sardis, the Metropolis of Lydia; perswading and practising the enterprize upon Athens, which Darius in the end to his great dishonour undertook, twenty years after Hippias had resigned his estate.

Thus farre I have digressed from Darius, to the end the Reader may conceive the better the causes and motives of this warre: whereof the hope that Hippias had to be restored to Athens by the help of Darius, which made him sollicite and perswade the Persians to conquer Greece, was one, but not the most urgent.

Of the Ionian Rebellion, which was the principall cause of the wars ensuing between Greece and Persia.

ANother, and a strong motive to this expedition, was the Ionick war, breaking out in Asia about the same time. The Colonies transported out of Greece into Asia, which occupied the greatest part of the Sea-coast, having enjoyed their liberty about 500. years, even from the Ionick migration, to the time of Craesus, were by this Lydian King made Tributaries, and afterwards as parcell of his Dominions, were taken in by Cyrus, and left as hereditary Servants to the Crown of Persia.

But as it is the custome of Nations half conquered (witnesse Ireland) to rebel again upon every advantage and opportunity: so did the Ionians, and other Grecians, both in Cyrus his life, and after him, seek by all meanes possible to free themselves,

At this time they found such men ready to spurre them into Rebellion, as had by the Persian been given unto them for bridles to hold them in subjection. Every one of those Towns had a Lord to rule it, whom they (abhorring the government of one man) called their Tyrants. These Lords were very true to the Persian, by whose onely might they held the people in subjection. And this their dutifull affection they had well declared, when, Darius being in great extremity, they used all meanes to deliver him and his Armie (that otherwise had been lost) out of the Scythians hand. Of this great piece of service Hippias the tyrant of Miletus expected the chief thanks, as having been chief Author of their expecting Darius, when the rest, either perswaded by the Scythians, or carried away with their own desires, were ready to have abandoned him. But it came to passe, that Darius being more fearefull of the harm that Hippias (being powerful and crafty) might doe to him in the future, than mindfull of the good which he had already received at his hand, found meanes to carry him along to Susa, where he detained him with all kind usage of a friend, yet kept such good espiall upon him, as an enemy, he could not start away. Hippias had subtilty enough to discover the kings purpose, which he agreed with his own desires. For he thought it more pleasant, and more honourable to rule as Prince in one faire Citie, having a small Territory, than to sit and feast at the great Kings table, and hear the counsels by which a large Empire was managed; being himself an idle beholder, and enjoying with much restraint of liberty, none other pleasures than a private man might bestow upon himself.

Wherefore he bethought himself of raising of some tumults in the lower Asia, to pacifie which, if he might be sent, as one that had great experience and authority in those quarters, it would afterwards be in his power to stay at home, and either satisfie the King with excuses, or deal as occasion shall require. Resolving upon this course, he sent very secret instructions to Aristagoras his kinsman, whom he had left his Deputy at Miletus, advising him to stirre up some Rebellion. These directions came seasonably to Aristagoras, who having failed in an enterprize upon the Isle of Naxos, through the false dealing of a Persian his Associate, stood in fear of disgrace, if not of some further ill that might befall him, as one that had wasted the Kings treasures to no good purpose.

Therefore he readily embraced the counsell: and the better to draw the whole Country of Ionis into the same course which he determined to run, he abandoned his tyranny, and did set Miletus at liberty. This plausible beginning wan unto him the hearts of the Milesians: and his proceeding with other Ionian Tyrants (of whom some he took and sold as slaves to their Citizens, others he chased away) caused the whole Nation to be at his command. The Persian Fleet, whereof he lately had been Admirall in the enterprize of Naxos, he had surpris'd in his first breaking out, together with the principal

Officers,

Officers and Captains, so that now he thought himself able to deal with the great Kings forces, lying thereabout, either by Land or Sea. But likely it was that the power of all Asia would shortly be upon his neck, and crush both him and his assistants to pieces, unless he were able to raise an Armie that might hold the field, which the Ionians alone were insufficient to perform. Therefore he took a journey to Sparta, where having assayed in vain with many arguments, and the offer of fiftie Talents, to win to his partie Cleomenes King of the Lacedemonians: he went from thence to Athens, and with better successe besought the people to lend him their assistance. The Athenian Embassadors which had been sent to the Persian Kings Lieutenant in the lower Asia, desiring them not to give countenance to Hippias, now a banished man, and lately their Tyrant, were a while before this returned with ill answers, having found very churlish entertainment. So that the evill which they were to expect in all likelihood from the Persians, made them willing to begin with him. To which purpose, their consanguinitie with the Ionians, and the perswasions of Aristagoras, drew them on a pace, if perhaps his treasure were not helping. Twenty ships the Athenians furnished for this voyage; to which the Eretrians furnished five more, in regard of the ancient kinde of friendship that had passed between the Ionians and them. With these and their own forces joyned, the Ionians entered the River Caistrus, which falleth into the Sea by Ephesus: by which advantage they surpris'd Sardis when no enemy was heard of or suspected; inso much, as Artaphernes, who ruled as Vice-roy in those parts, had no other hope of safetie, than by betraying himself into the Castle, which the Grecians could not force: from whence he beheld the slaughter of the Citizens, and the Citie flaming.

The Persians, at length, mixt with the Burgers, began to encourage them to defence, and recovered the Market place, strengthened by the river Paeonius, which ran through it, and borrowing courage from desperation, they both defended themselves, and charged their enemies; who well advising themselves, made all the haste they could toward the sea side. But Artaphernes having gathered all the strength he could, pursued the Grecians, and found them neer Ephesus, where setting resolvedly upon them, he slaughtered a great part of their Armie, the rest saving themselves in Ephesus. In this fight Eualces, Captain of the Eretrians perished: but his fame and memorie was by that excellent Poet Simonides preserved. After this overthrow, the Athenians, which were before sent unto Aristagoras and to the Ionians, could by no arguments of theirs, no not by their tears, be perswaded to make any second triall of their fortunes on that side the Sea.

Yet the burning of Sardis made a greater noise in the world, than the late good successe which the Persians had in one or two skirmishes, could raise. Wherefore the Ionians bravely proceeded, won a great part of Caria; and sending their Fleet into the Hellespont, got Bizantium and other Towns into their hands. Yea, the Cyprians, lately subdued by Cambyses, began hereupon to take heart; and entering into confederacie with the Ionians, who were able to give them aide by Sea, rebelled against the Persians.

These newes comming to the ear of Darius, filled him with great indignation, and with an extreme hatred of the Athenians, upon whom he vowed to take sharp revenge. As for the Ionians, his contempt of them, and their knowledge of his power, made him to think, that they would not have dared to attempt such things, but by the instigation of those, to whom the ignorance of his great might had afforded the courage to provoke him. This was the main ground of the Warre commenced by Darius, and pursued by Xerxes against Athens: To which the sollicitation of Hippias, before remembered, gave onely some form and assistance: the businesse, when once it was thus far on foot, being like enough to have proceeded, though he had perished ere it were advanced any further.

Some other occurrents in this Ionian commotion extended the quarrell of Darius against many of the Ilanders, if not against the whole Nation of the Grecians; for all of them gave to his Rebels free harbour: the Ilanders moreover did help to furnish out a Navie of three hundred and sixty sail against him. These provocations did rather breed in him a desire to abate their pride, than any fear of harm that they were like to doe him. For what they had done at Sardis, was but by surprize. In every fight they were beaten by the Persians, who had not yet lost the fruits of their discipline, wherein wherein Cyrus had trained them, nor all their ancient Captains. In one Sea-fight by the Isle of Cyprus, the Ionians indeed had the upper hand; but they were Phoenicians, Egyptians, and Cilicians, whom they vanquished: neither was that victorie of any use to them; the Cyprians, in whose aide they came, being utterly beaten by the Persian Armie at Land, and reduced into their old subjection. So had the Persians likewise by open warre and fair force overthrown the Carians in two battels, and reclaimed that Nation; as also they had recovered the Towns upon Hellepont, with some Eolian and Ionian Cities, when Aristagoras with his friends quitting Miletus, fled into Thrace, desirous to seat himself in Amphipolis, a Colonie of the Athenians. But the Edonians, on whose Territorie belike he landed, overthrew him, and cut his troups in pieces.

About the same time, Histias, the first mover of this insurrection, came down into those quarters; who having undertaken the performance of great matters to Darius, was glad to flye from his Lieutenants, by whom his double dealing was detected.

But this evasion preserved him not long. And after many vain attempts that he made, he was taken in fight by the Persians, and hastily beheaded, lest the King should pardon him upon remembrance of old good turns; as it seems that he would have done, by the buriall which he commanded to be given to his dead body that was crucified, and by his heavie taking of his death.

Histias had sought to put himself into Miletus, but the Citizens doubting his conditions, chose rather to keep him out, and make shift for themselves, without his help. The strength of their Citie by land, which had in old time withstood the Lydian Kings, and their good Fleet, which promised unto them the liberty of an open Sea, emboldened them to trie the uttermost, when very few friends were left upon that Continent to take their part. But their Navie was broken as much by threatnings as by force; many of their companions and fellow-rebels forsaking them upon hope of pardon; and many being daunted with the causelesse flight of those that should have assisted them. Neither was it long before the Town it self, being assaulted both by Land and Sea, was taken by force, the Citizens slain, their wives and children made slaves, and their goods a bootie to the Persians, whom for six years space they had put to so much trouble.

The warre which Darius made upon Greece, with the battell of Marathon, and Darius his death.

His Warre with good successe finished by the Persians, and some attempts made on Europe side with variable successe; Darius obstinate in the enterprise and Conquest of Greece (though at first hee pretended to make the Warre but against the Athenians and Eretrians, who joyntly assisted the Ionians against him, and burnt Sardis in Lydia) did now by his Embassadours demand an acknowledgement from them all: among whom, some of them not so well resolved as the rest, submitted themselves; as the Aeginets and others. Against these, the Athenians being inflamed, (by the assistance of the Lacedemonians) after divers encounters forc'd them to give pledges, and to relinquish the partie of the Persians. Cleomenes led the Lacedemonians in this warre, and caused his companion-King Demantus to be deposed: who thereupon fled to Darius, farre the more confident of victorie, by reason of these discords, alienations, and civill warres among the Greekes. He therefore gave order to Hippagoras to prepare a Fleet of ships fit to transport his Armie over the Hellepont: the same consisting of an hundred thousand foot, and ten thousand horse. The charge in chief of his Armie he committed to Datis, accompanied and assisted by Hippias, the son of Pisistratus, expelled out of Athens twenty years before, and by Artaphernes his brother, Governour of Sardis, and the Sea-coast of Asia the lesse. These Commanders having their Companies brought down to the Sea-side, embarked embarked themselves in six hundred Gallies and other Vessels; and first of all, attempted the Islands called Cyclades, which lay in the mid-way between Asia the lesse, and Greece. For (obtaining those places) the Persians had then nothing to hinder the transportation of their forces over the Aegean Sea, but on the contrary they might alwaies both relieve themselves in their passage, and shroud themselves from all sudden tempests and out-rage.

To this end they first possessed themselves of Samos; secondly, they attempted Naxos: which Island, the inhabitants despairing of their own forces, abandoned. So did the people of Delos, of which Apollo was native: Which Island Darius did not only forbear to sack, but recalling the inhabitants, he gave order to beautifie the places and Altars of Apollo erected. And having recovered these and other Islands, the Persians directed their course for Eretria in Euboea: for that Citie (as already hath been shewed) had assisted the Ionians at the taking and firing of Sardis. In this Island the Persians took ground, and besieged Eretria very straitly, and after six daies assault, partly by force, and in part by the treason of Enphabius and Philagius, they took it, sacked it, and burnt it to the ground. Thus far the winds of prosperous fortune filled their sayls. From Euboea the Persians past their Armie into Attica, conducted and guided by Hippias, late Prince of Athens, and marching towards it, they encamped at Marathon, in the way from the Sea, where they landed, towards Athens.

The Athenians finding the time arrived, wherein they were to dispute with their own vertues against Fortune, and to cast lots for their libertie, for their wives, their children, and their lives, put themselves in the best order they could to make resistance, and withall sent away with speed to the Lacedemonians for succour, imploying in that Negotiation one Phidippides, who passing through Arcadia, encountered in the way a familiar Devill, which he supposed to be Pan, who willed him to assure the Athenians of victorie, promising that some one of the gods should be present at the battell, to assist them and defend them against the multitude of their enemies. Phidippides at his return seeing he could not bring with him any present succours from Spurta, yet he thought it greatly availing to bring news from the gods, and promise of assistance from Heaven, which no doubt (though the device was somewhat likely to be his own, yet) it greatly encouraged the multitude and common people, who in all ages have bin more stirred up with fond Prophecies and other like superstitious fooleries, than by any just cause or solide reason.

The Athenians being now left to themselves, with one thousand only of the Platians (who having been formerly defended by the Athenians against the Thebans, did in this extremitie witnesse their thankfulness and gratefull disposition), began to dispute, Whether it were most for their advantage to defend the walls of Athens, or to put themselves into the field with such forces as they had, the same consulting of ten thousand Athenians, and one thousand of the Platians. In the end, and after great diversitie of opinions, Miltiades, who perswaded the triall by battell, prevailed.

The Armies being now in view, and within a mile of each other, the Athenians disposed themselves into three troups: two wings or horns, as they terme them, and the bodie of a battell. The Persians when they perceived so small a troupe advancing towards them, thought the Athenians rather dispossessed of their understandings, than possessed with the resolution whereof they made shew. So invincible and resistlesse the Persians esteemed their own numbers to be, and that small troupe of their enemies then in view, rather to be despised than to be fought withall. But in conclusion, the victorie being doubtfully balanced for a while, sometime the vertue of the Grecians, and sometimes the number of the Persians prevailed, the Grecians fighting for all that they had, the Persians for that they needed not, these great forces of Darius were disordered and put in rout; the Athenians following their victorie even to the Sea-shore; where the Persians, so many of them as lost not their wits with their courage, saved themselves in their ships.

The Persian Armie consisted of an hundred thousand foot and ten thousand horse; of which there were slain in the place six thousand three hundred, and of the Grecians an hundred fourscore and twelve. For howsoever it came to passe, either by strange visions, which were afterward called Panics terrores, or by some other affright, it seemeth that the invading Armie, after the first encounter, fought with their backs towards their enemy, and lost that number, by Herodotus set down, in their disorderly retreat, or rather in their flat running away. As for Justinus report, That two hundred thousand of the Persian armie were slain, the same hath no appearance nor possibilitie of truth. In this fight Hippias the perwader of the enterprise was slain, saith Justinus and Cicero; but Suidas tells us, That he escaped, and died most miserably in Lemnos.

Ad. Alt.

The greatest honour of this victory was cast upon Mitriades, who both persuaded the triall by battell, and behaved himself therein answerably to the counsell which he gave. Themistocles had his first reputation in this fight, being but young and of the first beards. Those of the Grecians, of mark and commandement, that fell in the first encounter, were Callimachus and Stesileus. It is also said, That Cynegyrus following the Persians to their embarking, laid hands on one of their Gallies, to have held it from putting off the shore, and having his right hand cut off, he yet offered to arrest it with his left; of which also being deprived, he took hold of it with his teeth. This encounter happened in the first year of the threescore and twelfth Olympiad, about the time of the war made by Coriolanus against his fellow-Romans: Alexander the son of Amyntas being then King of Macedon, and Phanippus then Governour of Athens, according to Plutarch, or Hiblistides, after Halcarnassus.

In vna Arif.

This great fray thus parted, and the Persians returned back into the lesser Asia, Milriades sought and obtained an employment against the Islanders of Paros, one of the Cyclades, and passing over his Companies in threescore and ten Gallies, after six and twentie days assault he brake his thigh, in seeking to enter it by the Temple of Ceris,¹⁰ wherewith himself being made unable, and his companies discouraged, he returned to Athens; where those ungratefull Citizens forgetting all his services past, and that of all other the most renowned at the battell of Marathon, did by the perswasion of Xanthippus, the father of Pericles (who envied his fame) cast him into prison, and set on him a fine of fiftie Talents; where his weak and wounded body being not able to endure the one, nor his estate to pay the other, he after a few days ended his life.

Which envie of the better sort to each other, with their private Factions, assisted by the unthankfull and witlesse people, brought them, not many years after, from a victorious and famous Nation, to base subjection and slavery. Miltiades left behind him one son called Cymon begotten on Hegesipila, daughter of Olerus King of Thrace, who (saith Plutarch) was neither inferior to his father in valour, nor to Themistocles in understanding, but exceeded them both in justice and good government.

Now Darius taking greater care how to recover his honour, than sorrow for the losse received in Greece, gave order for new levies of men, and all other warlike provisions. But the Egyptians revolting from his obedience (a Kingdome of great strength and revenue) greatly distracted his resolution for the re-invasion of Greece. The dissention also among his sons, of whom the younger being born after he was king, and by so great a mother as Atossa, disdaining to give place to his elder brother, born before Darius obtained the Empire, greatly vexed him. And lastly, death, who hath no respect of any mans affairs, gave end to all his consultations and enterprises, and joynd him to the earth of his ancestors, about a year after the battell of Marathon, and after that he had reigned six and thirty years. He left behind him five sons, namely, Ariabasanes, born before he obtained the kingdom, Xerxes who succeeded him, Achamens Governour of Egypt, Masistes and Anabignes.

CHAP. VI.

Of Xerxes.

S. I.

The preparation of Xerxes against Greece.

to  Erxes received from his father, as hereditarie, a double Warre, one to be made against the Egyptians, which he finished so speedily, that there is nothing remaining in writing how the same was performed: the other against the Gracians, of which it is hard to judge, whether the preparations were more terrible, or the successe ridiculous. In the consultation for the prosecution of this Warre, which was chiefly Athenians, the Princes of Persia were divided in opinion. Mardanius, who had formerly commanded in Thrace and Macedon, under Darius, and had also Hippes for his grandfather, as Xerxes had; and married Xerxes his sister Artostafres, persuaded by many arguments the European warre. But Artabanus, brother to the late Darius, and uncle to Xerxes, maintained the contrary counsell, laying before Xerxes the lamentable and ridiculous successe of the two late invasions, which Darius had made contrary to his counsell: The one in person upon the Scythians, the other by his Lieutenants upon the Greeks; in each of which Darius left to his enemies both his Armie and his Honour.

He therefore be sought Xerxes to be right well advised before he did too far imbarke himself in this bufinesse. For whatsoever undertaking hath deliberate and sound counsell for conductor, though the successe doe not alwaies answer the probability, yet hath Fortune nothing else thereof to vaunt, than the variablenesse of his own nature, which only the divine Providence, and not any humane power, can constrain.

But so obstinate was the resolution of Xerxes in prosecution of his former intent, that Artabanne, whether terrified by Visions (as is written of him) or fearing the Kings hatred, which he made known to all those that opposed his desire to this Warre (changing opinion and counsell) assisted the Grecian Expedition with all the power hee had.

After the war of Egypt was ended, four years were consumed in describing and gathering an Army for this invasion : which being compounded of all Nations subject to the Persian Empire, consisted of seventeen hundred thousand foot, and eighty thousand horsemen, besides Chariots, Camels, and other Beasts of Carriage, if we may believe Herodotus : for of this multitude, Trogus finds the number less by seven hundred thousand footmen.

The Commanders of the severall Nations were the Princes of the bloud of Persia, either by marriage in the Kings house, or otherwise: for to these were all commandements of this nature given, some few people excepted, who had of their own Leaders.

The charge of the whole Armie was bestowed on Mardonius, the son of Gobrias by a sister of Darius, to whom were joyned some others of Xerxes his neereſt kinked, as Generalls over all; ſaving that the charge of ten thouſand ſelect Persians, called the immortal Regiment (becauſe if any one of the whole number died, or were ſlain, there was another preſently choſen in his ſtead) was given to Hydarnes, the eightie thouſand ſo horſemen were led by the ſons of Darius, who commanded the late Armie of Darius in Greece.

The Fleet of Gallies were 2200. and eight, furnished by the Phœnicians, who had Commanders of their own Nation, and by the Egyptians, Cilicians, Pamphilians, Lycians, Dorians, Carians, Ionians, Eolians, and Hellepontines, who were trusted with the furnishing of their own Vessels, though commanded by the Princes of Persia, as by Artabignes, the son of Darius, and others. The rest of the Vessels for transportation were three thousand. There were also certain Gallies furnished by Artabagnes, the daughter of Lygdames, Princess of Halycarnassæus, and the Islands adjoining, which her self commanded. Those Gallies by her prepared and furnished, exceeded all the rest of the Fleet, excepting those of Zidon, in which Xerxes himself was embarked.

S. II.

Xerxes Armie entertained by Pythius: his cutting off Mount Athos from the Continent: his bridge of Boats over the Hellespont: and the discourse between him and Artabanus upon the view of the Armie.

When this world of an Armie was thoroughly furnished, he caused all the nations of which it was compounded, to make their Rendez-vous, and repair at Sardis in Lydia. And when he had assembled to the number of seventeen hundred thousand foot, as he entred the body of Celanus, he was by one Pythius the Lydian entertained, who out of his Flocks and Herds of Cattel gave food to Xerxes and his whole Armie. The feast ended, he also presented him with two thousand Talents of silver, and in Gold four Millions, wanting seven thousand of the Persian Darics; which make so many of our Markes.

The King overcome with the exceeding liberalitie of Pythius, did not only refuse his treasure offered, but commanded that seven thousand Darics should be given him to make up his four Millions; of which, so many thousands were wanting when hee made the present. But soon after, when Pythius besought him to spare one of his five sons from his attendance into Greece (because himself was old, and had none whom he could so well trust as his own son) Xerxes most barbarously caused the young man, for whom his father sought exemption, to be fundered into two parts, commanding that the one half of his carcasse should be layed on the right, and the other half on the left hand of the common way by which the Armie marched.

Two things he commanded to be done before he came to the Sea-side. The one was a passage for Gallies to be cut behind Mount Athos, making the same (with the half Island or Headland, whereon it stood) to be an entire Island, sundring thereby from the Continent of Thrace five Cities, besides the Mountain and the Chersonesus or Neck of Land it self: a work of more ostentation than of use, and yet an enterprise of no great wonder, the Valley which held it to the Continent having but twelve furlongs (which make about a mile and a half) to cut through, and the ditch being broad enough only for two Gallies to passe in front. The Cities so severed from the main, were Dion, Olympus, Acrothoon, Thysus and Cleona.

He also gave order, that a Bridge upon Boats should be made over the Hellespont between Abidus and Sestos, the Sea there having a mile of breadth, wanting an eighth part; which after the finishing, was by a Tempest torn alunder and dislevered: wherewith Xerxes being more enraged than discouraged, commanded those to be slain that were masters of the work, and caused six hundred threescore and fourteen Gallies to be coupled together, thereon to frame a new Bridge; which by the art and industrie of the Phenicians was so well anchored to resist both winds blowing into and from the Euxine Sea, as the same being well boorded and rayled, the whole Army of seventeen hundred thousand foot, and fourscore thousand Horse, with all the Moyles and Carriages, past over it into Europe in seven dayes and seven nights, without intermission. This transportation of Xerxes his Bridge, did build the like.

The Bridge finished, and the Armie brought neer to the Sea-side, Xerxes took a view of all his Troupes, assembled in the Plains of Abidus, being carried up, and seated on a place over-topping the Land round about it, and the Sea adjoining; and after he had gloried in his own happinesse, to behold and command so many Nations, and so powerfull an Armie and Fleet, hee suddenly (notwithstanding) burst out into tears, moved with this contemplation, That in one hundred yeares there should not any one survive of that marvellous multitude: the cause of which sudden change of passion when he uttered to Artabanus his Uncle, Artabanus spake to the King to this effect: That which is more lamentable than the dissolution of this great Troup within that number of yeares by the King remembred, is, That the life it self which we enjoy is yet more miserable than the end thereof: for in those few dayes given us in the world, there is no man among all these, or elsewhere, that ever found himself so accompanied with happinesse, but that he oftentimes pleased himself better with the desire and hope of death, than of living; the incident calamities, diseases, and sorrows whereto mankind is subject, being so many and inevitable, that the shortest life doth oftentimes appear unto us over-long; to avoid all which, there is neither refuge nor rest, but in desired death alone.

With this melancholy discourse, Xerxes being not much pleased, prayed Artabanus not to overcast those joyes which they had now in pursuit with sad remembrances. And holding still a doubtfull conceit, that Artabanus utterly condemned the invasion of Greece, against which he had formerly given many strong reasons, desired him to deal freely with him, Whether he were returned to his first resolution, that the enterprise of Greece could not be prosperous; Or whether, according to the change of mind put into him by his late Vision, he was confident of good successe? Artabanus, notwithstanding that he assured himself of the Kings resolution to goe on, and dared not by any new arguments to batter the great purpose it self, yet he told the King, That there were two things which marvellously affrighted him, and which the King should find, as he feared, to be most adverse; to wit, the Sea and the Land: The Sea, because it had no where in that part of the world any Port capable of so great a Fleet, insomuch, as if any tempest should arise, all the Continent of Greece could hardly receive them, nor all the Havens thereof afford them any safety: and therefore when any such shelter shall be wanting unto them, he prayed him to understand, that in such a case of extremitie, men are left to the will and disposition of Fortune, and not Fortune to the will and disposition of men. The Land, besides other incommunities, will be found by so much the more an enemy, by how much the unsatiate desire of man to obtain more and more thereof, doth lead him forward: for were there no man found to give resistance, yet the want of means to feed such an Armie, and the Famine, which cannot be prevented, will, without any other violence offered, dis-inable and consume it. By these arguments Artabanus hoped to have diverted Xerxes, not daring perchance to utter what indeed he most feared, to wit, the overthrow of the Armie it self both by Sea and Land, which soon after followed. These cautions were exceeding weighty, if Xerxes his obstinacie had not mis-prised them. For, to invade by Sea upon a perillous Coast, being neither in possession of any Port, nor succoured by any party, may better fit a Prince presuming on his fortune, than enriched with understanding. Such was the enterprise of Philip the second upon England in the year 1588. who had belike never heard of this Counsell of Artabanus to Xerxes, or forgotten it.

Now concerning the second point, it is very likely, that Xerxes his Armie; which could not have in it lesse than two millions of Soules, besides his beasts for Service and Carriage, should after a few dayes suffer famine, and using Machiavels words, Mourir sans cause; die without a knife. For it was impossible for Greece, being a ragged, strait, and mountainous Countrey, to yeeld food (besides what served themselves) for twenty hundred thousand strangers, whom they never meant to entertain, but with the sharpened points of their weapons, destroying withall whatsoever they could not well inclose and defend. Nay, if we may believe Herodotus, the Army of Xerxes, being reviewed at Thermopyla, consisted of five millions, two hundred eighty three thousand, two hundred twenty men, besides Laundresses, Harlots, and Horses, and was therefore likely to endure a speedy famine.

The effect of Xerxes his answer was, That it was impossible to provide for all things; and that whosoever should enterprise any great matter, if he gave the hearing to all that could be objected of accidentall inconveniences, he should never pursue the same farther than the dispute and consultation: which if his Predecessors, the Persian Kings, had done, they had never grown to that greatnesse, or possesse so many Kingdomes and Nations as they now did; and therefore concluded, That great enterprises were never undertaken without great perils: Which resolution of Xerxes was not to be condemned, if any necessitie had enforced him to that warre. But seeing the many Nations newly conquered; which he already commanded, were more than could be constrained to obedience any longer than the powerfull prosperitie of the Persians endured; and that Greece was separated by the Sea from the rest of Xerxes his Dominions (of whose resolution his Father Darius had made a dear experience) the fruit of this Warre was answered.

answerable to the plantation, and the successe and end agreeable to the weak counsell whereon it was grounded. Furthermore, those millions of men which he transported and yet in his own judgement not sufficient, (for he gathered in marching on, all the strength of Thrace and Macedon) were an argument, that he rather hoped to fear the Greeks by the fame of his numbers, than that he had any confidence in their valour and resolution, whom he conducted. For it is wisely said of those uncountable multitudes: Non vires habent, sed pondus, & impedimenta potius sunt quam auxilium; They are great in bulk, but weak in forces, and rather a luggage than an aide.

Besides, as it was impossible to marshall such a world of men in one Army, so the divers Nations, speaking divers languages, bred the same confusion among the Persians as commanders when they came to fight, as it did to the builders of Babel, when they came to work. Whereas if Xerxes had of his five millions compounded ten Armies of fiftie thousand chosen Souldiers in each, and sent them yearly into Greece well victualled and furnished, he had either prevailed by the sword, or forced them to forsake their territory, or brought them into obedience by necessity and famine, which cannot be resisted. But while Xerxes resolved to cut down the banks of Greece, and to let in a sea of men upon them, he was deceived both of his own hopes, and in their hearts whom he employed, and beaten by the Greeks, both by Land and Sea; yea, he himself, conducted by his fear, fled shamefully into Asia. A great part of his Army was buried in Greece: the remainder whereof, which wintered in Thessaly, and led by Mardonius, who perswaded the enterprize, was in the summer following utterly defeated, and himself slain.

S. III.

Of the fights at Thermopylæ and Artemisium.

After such time as Xerxes had transported the Armie over the Hellespont, and landed in Thrace, (leaving the description of his passage alongst that Coast, and how the River of Lissus was drunk dry by his multitudes, and the lake near to Pisyrus by his cattell, with other accidents in his marches towards Greece) I will speak of the encounters he had, and the shamefull and incredible overthrowes which he received. As first at Thermopylæ, a narrow passage of half an acre of ground, lying between the Mountains which divide Thessalie from Greece, where sometime the Phocians had raised a wall with gates, which was then for the most part ruined. At this entrance Leonidas, one of the Kings of Sparta, with three hundred Lacedæmonians, assisted with one thousand Tegeate and Mantineans, one thousand Arcadians, and other Peloponnesians, to the number of three thousand one hundred in the whole; besides one thousand Phocians, four hundred Thebans, seven hundred Thespians, and all the forces (such as they were) of the bordering Locrians, defended the passage two whole dayes together against that huge Armie of the Persians. The valour of the Greeks appeared so excellent in this defence, that in the first dayes fight, Xerxes is said to have three times leaped out of his Throne, fearing the destruction of his Armie by one handfull of those men, whom not long before he had utterly despised: and when the second dayes attempt upon the Greeks had proved vain, he was altogether ignorant how to proceed further, and so might have continued, had not a runnagate Grecian taught him a secret way, by which part of his Armie might ascend the ledge of mountains, and set upon the backs of those who kept the Straits. But when the most valiant of the Persian Armie had almost inclosed the small forces of the Greeks, then did Leonidas, King of the Lacedæmonians, with his three hundred, and seven hundred Thespians, which were all that abode by him, refuse to quit the place which they had undertaken to make good, and with admirable courage not onely resist that world of men which charged them on all sides, but issuing out of their strength, made so great a slaughter of their enemies, that they might well be called vanquishers, though all of them were slain upon the place. Xerxes having lost in this last fight, together with twenty thousand other Souldiers and Captains, two of his own brethren, began to doubt what inconvenience might befall him by the vertue of such as had not been present at these battels, with whom he knew that he shortly was to deal. Especially of the Spartans he stood in great fear, whose manhood had appeared singular in this triall, which caused him very carefully to enquire what numbers they could bring bring into the field. It is reported of Dieneces the Spartan, that when one thought to have terrified him by saying, That the flight of the Persian arrows was so thick as would hide the sun: he answered thus; It is very good news: for then shall we fight in the cool shade.

Such notable resolution having as freely been expressed in deeds, as it was uttered in words, caused the Persian to stand in great doubt, when he heard that the Citie of Sparta could arm well-nigh eight thousand men of the like temper, and that the other Lacedæmonians, though inferior to those, were very valiant men. Wherefore he asked counsell of Demaratus, a banished King of the Spartans, who had alwaies well advised and instructed him in the things of Greece, what course were fittest to be taken in his further proceedings. The opinion of Demaratus was, That all the Land-forces should assemble together to defend the Isthmus, that streight neck of ground which joyneth Peloponnesus to the Continent. For which cause he advised, That three hundred ships well manned should be sent unto the Coast of Laconia, to spoile he country, and to hold the Lacedæmonians and their neighbours busied at home, whilst Xerxes at his leisure having subdued the rest, might afterward bring his whole power upon them, who remaining destitute of succour, would be too weak alone to make resistance. To this purpose also the same Demaratus further advised, That the said Fleet of three hundred ships should seize upon the Iland then called Cythera, now Cérigo, which lying near to the Coast of Laconia, might serve as a fit place of Rendezvous upon all occasions, either of their own defence, or endamaging the enemy: whereby that ancient speech of Chilon the Lacedæmonian should be verified, that it were better for his Countrymen to have that Ile drowned in the sea, than stand so inconveniently as for them it did. What effect this counsell might have taken, had it bin followed, it is not easie to ghesse. But a contrarie opinion of Achamenes brother to King Xerxes was preferred as the safer. For the Persian fleet had bin sorely vexed with a grievous tempest, which continued three whole days together, wherein were lost upon the Coast of Magnesia, four hundred ships of war, besides other vessels innumerable, accordingly as Artabanus had foreseen, that if any such calamitie should overtake them, there would not be found any Harbor wide enough to give them succour. Therefore Achamenes perswaded his brother not to disperse his fleet; for if (said he) after the losse of four hundred ships we shall send away other three hundred to seek adventures, then will the Greeks be strong enough by sea to encounter the rest of the Navie, which holding all together is invincible. To this counsell Xerxes yeilded, hoping that his Land-armie and fleet should each of them stand the other in good stead, whilst both held one course, and lay not far asunder. But herein he was far deceived; for about the same time that his armie had felt the valour of the Greeks by land, his Navie likewise made a sorrowfull proof of their skill and courage at sea. The Grecians fleet lay at that time at Artemisium in the straits of Eubœa, where the Persians thinking to incompasse them, sent two hundred sayl about the Iland to fall upon them behind, using a like stratagem to that which their King did practise against Leonidas in a case not unlike, but with far different successe. For that narrow channell of the sea which divideth Eubœa from the main, was in the same sort held by a Navie of two hundred threescore and eleven sail against the huge Persian Armado, as the straits of Thermopylæ had formerly bin maintained by Leonidas, till he was circumvented, as this Navie might have bin, but was not. The departure of those two hundred ships that were sent about the Iland, and the cause of their voyage, was too well known in the Persian fleet, and soon enough disclosed to the Greeks, who setting sail by night, met them with a counter-surprise, taking and sinking thirty vessels, inforcing the rest to take the Sea, where being over-taken with foul weather, they were driven upon the rocks and cast all away. Contrariwise, the Navie of the Greeks was increased by the arrivall of fiftie three Athenian ships, and one Lemnian, which came to their partie in the last fight. As these new forces encouraged the one side, so the fear of Xerxes his displeasure stirred up the other to redeem their losse with some notable exploit. Wherefore setting aside their unfortunate policie, they resolved in plain fight to repair their honour, and casting themselves into the form of a Crescent, thought so to inclose the Greeks, who readily did present them battell at Artemisium.

The fight endured from noon till night, and ended with equall losse to both parts. For though more of the Persian ships were sunk and taken, yet the lesser losse fell altogether gether as heave, upon the Greekish fleet, which being small could worse bear it. Herein only the Barbarians may seem to have had the worse, that they forsook the place of fight, leaving the wrack and spoils to the enemy, who nevertheless were faine to abandon presently even the passage which they had undertaken to defend, both for that many of their ships were sorely crushed in the battell, and especially because they had received advertisement of the death of Leonidas at Thermopylae. Before they wayed anchors, Themistocles, Generall of the Athenians, engraved upon stone at the watering place an exhortation to the Ionians, that either they should revolt unto the Greeks, or stand neutrell; which perswasion, he hoped would either take some place with them, or at the least make them suspected by the Persians.

S. IV.

VHen Xerxes had past the straits of Thermopylae, he wasted the country of the Phocians, and the regions adjoining: as for the inhabitants, they chose rather to flie, and reserve themselves to a day of battel, than to adventure their lives into his hands, upon hope of saving their wealth, by making proffer unto him of their service. Part of his armie he sent to spoil the Temple of Delphi, which was exceeding rich by means of many offerings that hath bin made by divers Kings and great personages; of all which riches it was thought that Xerxes had a better Inventory than of the goods left in his own Palace. To make relation of a great astonishment that fell upon the companies which arrived at the Temple to have sacked it, and of two Rocks that breaking from the Mount Parnassus, overwhelmed many of the Barbarians, it were peradventure somewhat superstitious. Yet Herodotus, who lived not long after, saith, That the broken Rocks remained even to his memory in the Temple of Misera, whither they rowled in their fall. And surely this attempt of Xerxes was impious; for seeing he beleeveth that Apollo was a god, he should not have dared to entertain a covetous desire of enriching himself by committing sacrilege upon his Temple. Wherefore it may possibly be true, that licence to chastise his impietie, in such manner as is reported, was granted unto the devill, by that Holy One, who saith, Will a man spoil his gods? and elsewhere; Hath any Nation changed their gods, which yet are no gods? Go to the Iles of Kittim, and behold, and send to Kedar, and take diligent heed, and see whether there be any such things. Now this impiety of Xerxes was the more inexcusable, for that the Persians alleged the burning of Cybeles Temple by the Athenians, when they set fire on the Citie of Sardis in Asia, to be the ground and cause of the waste which they made in burning of Cities and Temples in Greece. Whereas indeed, in the enterprise against Delphos, this vizzor of holy and zealous revenge falling off, discovered the face of covetousnesse so much the more ugly, by how much the more themselves had professed a detestation of the offence which the Athenians had committed in that kind by meer mischance.

The remainder of that which Xerxes did, may be expressed briefly thus: He came to Athens, which finding forsaken, he took and burnt the Cittadel and Temple which was therein. The Cittadel indeed was defended a while by some of more courage than wisdom, who literally interpreting Apollo's Oracle, that Athens should be safe in wooden walls, had fortified that place with Boords and Palisadoes: too weak to hold out long, though by their desperate valour so well maintained at the first assault, that they might have yeilded it upon tolerable conditions, had they not vainly relied upon the prophetic: whereof (being somewhat obscure) it was wisely done of Themistocles, to make discretion the interpreter, applying rather the words to the present need, than fashioning the business to words.

How Themistocles the Athenian drew the Greeks to fight at Salamis.

THe Athenians had before the coming of Xerxes removed their wives and children into Trazenez, Agina, and Salamis, not so highly prizing their houses and lands, as their freedom, and the common libertie of Greece. Nevertheless, great great zeal, which the Athenians did shew for the generall good of their Countrey, was ill requited by the other Greeks, who with much labour were hardly intreated to stay for them at Salamis, whilst they removed their wives and children out of the Citie. But when the Citie of Athens was taken, it was presently resolved upon, that they should forsake the Isle of Salamis, and withdraw the fleet to Isthmus: which neck of land they did purpose to fortifie against the Persians, and so to defend Peloponnesus by land and sea, leaving the rest of Greece as indefensible, to the furie of the enemy. So should the Ilands of Salamis and Agina have been abandoned, and the Families of the Athenians, which were there bestowed as in places of securitie, have been given over into mercilesse bondage. Against his resolution Themistocles, Admirall of the Athenian Fleet, very strongly made opposition; but in vain. For the Peloponnesians were so possessed with fear of losing their own, which they would not hazard, that no perswasions could obtain of them to regard the estate of their distressed Friends and Allies. Many remonstrances Themistocles made unto them, to allure them to abide the enemy at Salamis; As first in private unto Eurybiades the Lacedemonian; Admirall of the whole fleet; That the self same fear which made them forsake those coasts of Greece, upon which they then anchored, would afterward (if it found no check at the first) cause them also to disserve the Fleet, and every one of the Confederates to withdraw himself to the defence of his own Citie and Estate: Then to the Councell of War, which Eurybiades upon this motion did call together (forbearing to object what want of courage might work in them hereafter;) he shewed that the fight at Isthmus would be in an open Sea, whereas it was more expedient for them, having the fewer ships, to determine the matter in the streights; and that, besides the safeguard of Agina, Megara and Salamis, they should by abiding where they then were, sufficiently defend Isthmus; which the Barbarians should not so much as once look upon, if the Greeks obtained victory by sea; which they could not so well hope for elsewhere, as in that present place which gave him so good advantage. All this would not serve to retain the Peloponnesians, of whom one, unworthy of memorie, upbraided Themistocles with the losse of Athens, blaming Eurybiades for suffering one to speak in the Councell, that had no Countrey of his own to inhabit. A base and shamefull objection it was, to lay as a reproach that losse, which being voluntarily sustained for the common good, was in true estimation by so much the more honourable, by how much it was the greater. But this indignitie did exasperate Themistocles, and put into his mouth a replie so sharp, as availed more than all his former perswasions. He told them all plainly, That the Athenians wanted not a fairer Citie than any Nation of Greece could boast of; having well-neer two hundred good ships of Warre, the better part of the Grecian Fleet, with which it was easie for them to transport their Families and substance into any part of the World, and settle themselves in a more secure habitation, leaving those to shift as well as they might, who in their extremity had refused to stand by them. Herewithall he mentioned a Town in Italie belonging of old to the State of Athens, of which Town he said an Oracle had foretold, That the Athenians in processe of time should build it a-new, and there (quoth he) will we plant our selves, leaving unto you a sorrowfull remembrance of my words, and of your own unthankfulnesse. The Peloponnesians hearing thus much, began to enter into better consideration of the Athenians, whose affairs depended not, as they well perceived, upon so weak termes, that they should be driven to crouch to others; but rather were such, as might enforce the rest to yeeld to them, and condescend even to the uttermost of their own demands.

For the Athenians, when they first embraced that Heroicall resolution of leaving their grounds and houses to fire and ruine, if necessitie should enforce them so farre, for the preservation of their liberty, did employ the most of their private wealth; and all the common treasure, in building a great Navie. By these means they hoped (which accordingly fell out) that no such calamity should befall them by Land, as might not well be counterpoised by great advantages at Sea: Knowing well that a strong fleet would either procure victory at home, or a secure passage to any other Countrey. The other States of Greece held it sufficient, if building a few new ships, they did somewhat amend their Navie. Whereby it came to pass, that, had they bin vanquished, they could not have expected any other fortune than either present death, or perpetuall slavery; neither could they hope to be victorious without the assistance of the Athenians, whose forces by sea did equall all theirs together; the whole consisting of more than three hundred and fourscore bottomes. Wherefore these Peloponnesians beginning to suspect their own condition, which would have stood upon desperate points, if the Fleet of Athens had forsaken them, were soon perswaded, by the greater fear of such a bad event, to forget the lesser, which they had conceived of the Persians: and laying aside their insolent braverie, they yielded to that most profitable counsell of abiding at Salamis.

§. VI.

How the Persians consulted about giving battell: and how Themistocles by policie held the Greeks to their resolution; with the victorie at Salamis thereupon ensuing.

IN the mean season the Persians had entred into consultation, whether it were convenient to offer battell to the Greekes, or no. The rest of the Captains giving such advice as they thought would best please the King their Master, had soon agreed upon the fight; but Artemisia Queen of Halicarnassus, who followed Xerxes to this warre in person, was of contrary opinion: Her counsell was, that the King himself directly should march toward Peloponnesus, whereby it would come to passe, that the Greek Navie (unable otherwise to continue long at Salamis for want of provision) should presently be dissevered, and every one seeking to preserve his own Citie and goods, they should, being divided, prove unable to resist him, who had won so far upon them when they held together. And as the profit will be great in forbearing to give battell; so on the other side, the danger will be more (said she) which we shall undergoe, than any need requireth us to adventure upon; and the losse in case it fall upon us, greater than the profit of the victorie which we desire. For if we compell the enemies to flie, it is more than they would have done, we sitting still: but if they, as better Sea-men than ours, put us to the worst, the journey to Peloponnesus is utterly dashed, and many that now declare for us, will soon revolt unto the Greekes. Mardonius, whom Xerxes had sent for that purpose to the Fleet, related unto his Master the common consent of the other Captains, and withall this disagreeing opinion of Artemisia. The King well pleased with her advice, yet resolved upon following the more generall, but far-worse counsell of the rest; which would questionlesse have been the same which Artemisia gave, had not fear and flatterie made all the Captains utter that, as out of their own judgement, which they thought to be most conformable to their Princes determination. So it was indeed that Xerxes had entertained a vain perswasion of much good, that his own presence upon the shore to behold the conflict, would work among the Souldiers. Therefore he encamped upon the Sea-side, pitching his own Tent on the Mount Aegaleus, which is opposite unto the Isle of Salamis, whence at ease he might safely view all which might happen in that action, having Scribes about him to write down the acts and behaviour of every Captain. The neer approach of the Barbarians, together with the newes of that timorous diligence which their Countrymen shewed in fortifying the Isthmus, and of a Persian Armie, marching a pace thither, did now again so terrifie and amaze the Peloponnesians, that no intreatie nor contestation would suffice to hold them together. For they thought it meer madnesse to fight for a Country already lost, when they rather should endeavour to save that which remained unconquered; propounding chiefly to themselves what miserie would befall them, if losing the victorie, they should be driven into Salamis, there to be shut up, and besieged round in a poor desolate Island.

Hereupon they resolved forth-with to set sail for Isthmus: which had presently been done, if the wisdome of Themistocles had not prevented it. For he perceiving what a violent fear had stopp'd up their ears against all good counsell, did practise another course, and forth-with labour to prevent the execution of this unwholsome decree; not suffering the very hour of performance to find him busie in wrangling alteration. As soon as the Councell brake up, he dispatched secretly a trustie Gentleman to the Persian Captains, informing them truly of the intended flight, and exhorting them to send part of their Navie about the Island, which encompassing the Greekes, might prevent their escape; giving them withall false hope of his assistance. The Persians no sooner heard than beleaved these good newes, well knowing that the victorie was their own assured, assured, if the Athenian fleet joyned with them; which they might easily hope, considering what ability their Master had to recompence for so doing, both the Captains with rich rewards, and the People with restitution of their City, and Territories. By these means in fell out, that when the Greekes very early in the morning were about to weigh Anchor, they found themselves inclosed round with Persians, who had laboured hard all that night, sending many of their ships about the Isle of Salamis, to charge the enemy in rear, and landing many of their men in the Isle of Psittalea, which lyeth over against Salamis, to save such of their own, and kill such of the Grecian party, as by any misfortune should be cast upon the shore. Thus did meer necessitie enforce the Greekes to undertake the battell in the straights of Salamis, where they obtained a memorable victory, stemming the foremost of their enemies, and chasing the rest, who falling foul one upon another, could neither conveniently fight nor flie. I doe not find any particular occurrences in this great battell to be much remarkable. Sure it is, that the Scribes of Xerxes had a wearisome task of writing down many disasters that befell the Persian Fleet, which ill acquitted it self that day, doing no one piece of service worthy the presence of their King, or the registering of his Notaries. As for the Greekes, they might well seem to have wrought out that victory with equall courage, were it not that the principal honour of that day was ascribed to those of Agina, and to the Athenians, of whom it is recorded, That when the Barbarians did flie towards Phalerus, where the Land-army of Xerxes lay, the ships of Agina having possessed the Straights, did sinke or take them, whilst the Athenians did valiantly give charge upon those that kept the Sea, and made any countenance of resisting.

of things following after the battell of Salamis: and of the flight of Xerxes.

AFTER the victory, this Greekes intending by way of Scrutinie, to determine which of the Captains had best merited of them, in all this great service; every Captain, being ambitious of that honour, did in the first place write down his own name, but in the second place, as best deserving next unto himself, almost every Suffrage did concur upon Themistocles. Thus private affection yielded unto vertue, as soon as her own turn was served. The Persian King, as not amazed with this calamity, began to make new preparation for continuance of warre; but in such fashion, that they which were best acquainted with his temper, might easily discern his faint heart through his painted looks. Especially Mardonius, Author of the warre, began to cast a wary eye upon his Master, fearing lest his counsell should be rewarded according to the event. Wherefore purposing rather to adventure his life in pursuit of the victorie, than to cast it away by undergoing his Princes indignation, hee advised the King to leave unto him three hundred thousand men, with which forces hee promised to reduce all Greece under the subjection of the Persian Scepter. Herewithall hee forgot not to sooth Xerxes with many fair words, telling him, That the cowardise of those Egyptians, Phenicians, and Cilicians, with others of the like metall, nothing better than slaves, who had so ill behaved themselves in the late Sea-service, did not concern his honour, who had alwayes been victorious, and had already subdued the better part of Greece, yea taken Athens it self, against which the War was principally intended. These words found very good acceptance in the Kings ear, who presently betook himself to his journey homewards, making the more haste, for that he understood, how the Greekes had a purpose to saile to Hellespont, and there to break down his bridge, and intercept his passage. True it was that the Greekes had no such intent, but rather wished his hasty departure, knowing that hee would leave his Armie not so strong, as it should have been, had he in person remained with it. And for this cause did Eurybiades give counsell, that by no means they should attempt the breaking of that bridge, lest necessity should inforce the Persians to take more courage; and rather to fight like men, than die like beasts. Wherefore Themistocles did, under pretence of friendship, send a false advertisement unto this timorous Prince, advising him to convey himself into Asia with all speed, before his bridge were dissolved: which counsell Xerxes took very kindly, and hastily followed; as before is shewed. Whether it were so that he found the bridge whole, and thereby repassed into Asia; or whether it were torn in sunder by tempests, and he thereby driven to imbarke himself in some obscure vessell, it is not greatly matteriall; though the Greeks did most willingly imbrace the latter of these reports. Howsoever it were, this flight of his did well ease the Country, that was thereby disburdened of that huge throng of people, which, as Locusts, had before overwhelmed it.

5. VIII.

The negotiations between Mardonius and the Athenians, as also between the Athenians and the Lacedæmonians, after the flight of Xerxes.

Mardonius with his three hundred thousand had withdrawn himself into Thessalie, whence he sent Alexander, the son of Amyntas King of Macedon, as Embassador to the Athenians, with promise of large amends for all their losses received; and of extending their Territories as farre as their own desires; allowing them to retain their libertie and lawes, if they would make peace with Xerxes, and assist him in that warre.

The Athenians had now re-entred their City, but not as yet brought back their wives and children; for as much as they well perceived that the place could not be secure, till the Army of Mardonius was broken and defeated. Wherefore the Lacedæmonians, understanding what fair conditions this Embassadour would propound, were perplexed with very great fear, lest he should find good and ready acceptance. Hereupon, they likewise very speedily dispatched their Embassadors for Athens, who arriving before the Macedonian had audience, used the best of their perswasion to retain the Athenians firm. They alleged, that neither Xerxes nor Darius had any pretence of Warre against the rest of Greece, but had onely threatned the subversion of Athens, till they and all their Confederates arming themselves in defence of that City, were drawn into the quarrell, wherein the Athenians without much crueltie of injustice could not leave them. Wee know, said they, that yee have endured great calamities, losing the fruit of the grounds, and being driven to forsake the Town, the houses thereof be ruined, and unfit for your habitation; in regard whereof, wee undertake to maintain as our own, your wives and children amongst us, as long as the warre shall continue, hoping that yee, who have alwaies procured libertie to others, will not now goe about to bring all Greece into slavery and bondage. As for the Barbarians, their promises are large, but their words and oathes are of no assurance. It was needlesse to use many arguments to the Athenians, who gave answer to Alexander in presence of the Spartan Embassadors; That whilst the Sunne continued his course, they would be enemies to Xerxes, regarding neither Gold nor any riches, with which hee might seek to make purchase of their libertie. Concerning the maintenance of their wives and children, it was a burden which they promised to sustain themselves, only desiring the Lacedæmonians, that with all speed they would cause their Armie to march, forasmuch as it was not likely, that Mardonius would long sit still in Thessalie, having once received such a peremptorie answer. In this their opinion of Mardonius his readinesse to invade Attica, they found themselves nothing deceived. For hee, as soon as Alexander had returned their obstinate purpose of resistance, did forthwith lead his Army towards them, and their City: they having now the second time quitted it, and conveyed themselves into places of more security abroad in the Countrey, where they expected the arrivall of their confederates. From Athens he sent his Agent unto them, with instructions, not only to perswade them to acceptance of the conditions before to them propounded, but with great promises to allure the principall of them to his party. His hope was, that either the people, wearied with forsaking their houses so often, would be desirous to preserve them from fire, and to have those which were already laid waste, re-edified at the Kings charges: Or if this affection took no place with them, but that needs they would rely upon their old confederates, whose succors did very slowly advance forwards, yet perhaps the leaders might be wonne with great rewards, to draw them to this purpose; all which projects, if they should fail, the destruction of Athens would be a good mean to please his Master, King Xerxes, who must thereby needs understand, that Mardonius kept his ground, and feared not to confront the whole power of Greece, in the strongest part of their own Countrey. But his expectation was beguiled in all these. For the Athenians so little regarded his offers, that when one Lyeidus, or (as Demosthenes calls him)

Cyrcilus, advised the Senate to accept the conditions, and propounded them to the people; all the Senators, &c as many as abiding without the Counsaile-house, heard what he had said, immediatly set upon him, and stoned him to death; not examining whether it were fear or money, that had moved him to utter such a vile sentence. Yea, the women of Athens, and in the Ile of Salamis, hearing of his bad counsaile, and bad end, assembling together did enter his house there, and put his wife and children to the like execution. All this bravery notwithstanding, when they perceived the slacknesse of the Peloponnesians in giving them aid, they were faine to betake themselves to Salamis again, the old place of their security. Remaining there, and seeing little forwardnes in those whom it most concerned to assist them, they sent very severe messages to Sparta, complaining of their slacknes, and threatning withall, to take such course as might stand best with their own good, seeing that the common estate of all was so little regarded. These messengers were at the first entertained with dilatory answers, which every day grew colder, when as the Peloponnesian Wall, builded athwart the Isthmus, was almost finished. But as the Lacedæmonians waxed careless and dull, so the Athenians hotly pressed them to a quick resolution, giving them plainly to understand, that if they should hold on in those dilatory courses, it would not be long ere the City of Athens took a new course, that should little please them. All this while the Persian fleet lay upon the coast of Asia, not daring to draw nearer unto Greece, as being now too weak at Sea. Likewise the Greekish Navie contained it self within the Harbours upon Europe side; both to doe service where need should require at home; and withall to shun the danger which might have befallen any part of it, that (being distracted from the rest) had adventured over-far. So mutuall fear preserved in quiet the Islands lying in the midst of the Aegean Seas. But it was well and seasonably observed by a Counsellor of Sparta, that the Wall upon Isthmus would serve to little purpose for the defence of Peloponnesus, if once the Athenians gave ear to Mardonius: considering that many doors would be opened into that Demie-Island, as soon as the Enemy should by winning the friendship of Athens, become the Master of the Seas about it. The Lacedæmonians upon this admonition, making better perusall of their own dangers, were very careful to give satisfaction to the Athenian Embassadors, who not brooking their delaies, were upon point of taking leave, yea, as it seemed, of renouncing their alliance. Wherefore dispatching away five thousand Spartans in the evening, under conduct of Pausanias, they gave audience the next day to the Embassadors, whose complaints they answered with vehement protestations of their readinesse; deeply swearing that the Army of Sparta was already far upon the journey, and giving them leave to take up other five thousand Lacedæmonians, out of the Region adjoining, to follow after them.

The Athenians, though distasting such want of gravity, in a matter so important, were nevertheless contented with the finall conclusion; and levying the number appointed of Lacedæmonian Souldiers, made what haste they could to incamp in Attica. The other Greeks were nothing slack in sending forth Companies, whose near approach caused Mardonius to forsake Attica as a rough Country, and therefore of much disadvantage to Horse, wherein consisted the best of his power. Before his departure he burnt the City of Athens, beating down the Walls of it, and ruining all that had formerly escaped the fury of War.

It were too long a rehearsal to shew all that happened in many skirmishes between the Greeks and him, in the Country of Boeotia, which Mardonius had chosen to be the seat of that War. Much time was spent before the quarrell was decided by the trial of one main battail: for both parties did stand upon their guard, each expecting when the other should assaile them.

The army of Mardonius contained about three hundred thousand, which were by him chosen out of Xerxes his Army, to whom were adjoynted the forces of Thebes, Macedony, Thessaly, and other parts of Greece, that now siding with the Persian, furnished his Camp with fifty thousand men. Against these the Lacedæmonians, Athenians, and their Confederates, had leaved an Army of one hundred and ten thousand, of which forty thousand land were weightily armed, the rest were only assistants to these forty thousand, being armed more slightly, as rather to make excursions and give chase, than to sustain any strong charges.

These two armies having eleven daies confronted one the other, without performing any memorable piece of service, Mardonius, whose victuals began to faile, resolved to begin the fray. The Greeks were promised victory by an Oracle, if they fought in the Land of the Athenians, and in the plain of Ceres and Proserpina, making prayers unto certain gods, Demi-gods, and Nymphs. But it was hard to find the certain place which the Oracle designed. For the plain of Ceres was indeed in the Territory of Athens; but there was also an old Temple of Ceres and Proserpina, near unto the place where they lay at that time encamped, as likewise the memorials of those Nymphs and Demi-gods, were in the same place, upon Mount Citharon, and the ground served well for foot-men against horse; only the Land belonged unto the Plateans, and not unto the Athenians.

Whilst the Greeks were perplexed about the interpretation of this doubtful Oracle, the Plateans to make all clear, did freely bestow their land on that side the Town upon the Athenians.

This magnificence of the Plateans caused Alexander the Great, many ages after, to re-edifie their City, which was ruined in the Peloponnesian wars.

All things being ready for battaile, the Lacedemonian Generall thought it most meet, that the Athenians should stand opposite that day to the Medes and Persians, whom they had formerly vanquished at Marathon; and that he, with his Spartans, should entertain the Thebans and other Greeks which followed Mardonius, as better acquainted with their fight, and having beaten them often-times before. This being agreed upon, the Athenians changed place with the Lacedemonians: which Mardonius understanding (whether fearing the Athenians, of whose valour the Medes & Persians had felt heave proof, or desiring to encounter the Spartans, as thinking them the bravest Souldiers in Greece) he did also change the order of his battaile, and oppose himself to Pausanias. All the Greeks might well perceive how the Enemy did shift his wings, and Pausanias thereupon returned to his former Station; which Mardonius noting, did also the like. So one whole day was spent in changing to and fro. Some attempt the Persians made that day with their Archers on horse-back, who did so molest the Greeks at their watering place, that they were faine to enter into consultation of retiring; because they could not without much losse to themselves, and none to the enemy, lye near to that fountain which did serve all the Camp. Having therefore concluded among themselves to dislodge; and part of the Army being sent away before day-light: Mardonius perceived their departure in the morning, and thereupon being encouraged by their flight, (which to him seemed to proceed out of meer cowardise) he charged them in the reare with great violence. It may well be recorded as a notable example of patient valour, That the Lacedemonians being over-taken by the enemies horse, and over-whelmed with great flights of Arrows, did quietly sit still, not making any resistance or defence, till the Sacrifices for victory were happily ended, though many of them were hurt and slain, and some of especial mark lost, before any sign of good successe appeared in the entrailes.

But as soon as Pausanias had found in the Sacrifice those tokens, which the superstition of that Age and Country accounted fortunate; he gave the Signall of battaile: and thereupon the Souldiers, who till then did sit upon the ground, as was their manner, arose altogether, and with excellent courage received the charge of the Barbarians, that came thronging upon them without any fear of such notable resistance. The rest of the Greek Army that was in march, being revoked by Pausanias, came in a-pace to succour the Lacedemonians: only that part of the Army which was led by the Athenians, could not arrive unto the place of the great battaile, because the Thebans, and others Greeks confederated with the Persians, gave them check by the way. Nevertheless, the Spartans with other their assistants, did so well acquit themselves, that the Persians were vanquished, and Mardonius with many thousands more slain in the field; the rest fled into the Camp, which they had fortified with wooden Walls, and there defended themselves with such courage as desperate necessity enforced them unto, holding out the longer, because the Lacedemonians were not acquainted with the manner of assaulting Fortresses, and Walls. In the mean time the Athenians having found strong opposition of the Thebans and Thessalians, did with much labour and courage obtain victory, which having not long pursued, they came to help the Lacedemonians, whom they found wearily busied in assaulting the Camp, with more valour than skill. Wherefore they themselves under-took it, and in short space forced a passage through the Wall; at which breach first, and then on all sides, the Greeks entred with such fury, and just desire of vengeance, that of three hundred thousand they are said not to have left three thousand alive, excepting those who fled away with Artabazus, when as the Persian Army first fell to rout.

If the execution were so great, as is reported, an especiall cause of it was the foolish retreat, or rather flight into the Camp. For though it were so, that the place was well fortified, and the number of those who cast themselves into it greater than any of the Assaultants; yet they being of severall Nations and Languages, and having lost their Generall with other principall Commanders, it was impossible that they in such a terror and astonishment should make good that piece of ground, lying in the heart of an Enemy Country, against an Army of men, farre more valiant than themselves, and enflamed with present victory. Therefore the same wall which for a few hours had preserved their lives, by holding out the enemy, did now impale them, and leave them to the slaughtering fury of unpitifull Victors. Artabazus fled into Thrace, telling the people of Thessaly, and other Countries in his way, that he was sent by Mardonius upon some piece of service: For he well knew, that had they understood any thing of that great discomfort, all places would have been hostile unto him, and fought with his ruine to purchase favour of the vanquishers. Therefore making so large marches, that many of his Souldiers being feeble were left behind and lost, he came to Byzantium, whence he shipped his men over into Asia. Such was the end of the vain-glorious expedition, undertaken by Xerxes against the Greeks, upon hope of Honour, and Conquest, though sorting otherwise, accordingly as Artabazus had fore-seen, and rather worse, for as much as it began the quarrell, which never ended before the ruine of the Persian Empire was effected by that Nation of the Greeks, despised and fought to have been brought into slavery. Hereby it may seem, that the vision appearing to Xerxes, was from God himself, who had formerly disposed of those things, ordaining the subversion of the Persian Monarchie by the Greeks, who thus provoked, entred into greater consideration of their own strength, and the weaknesse of their Enemies.

S. X.

The battell of Mycale, with a strange accident that fell out in the beginning: and examples of the like.

The same day on which the battell was fought at Platea, there was another battell fought at Mycale, a Promontory, or Head-land in Asia, where the Persian fleet rode.

Leutychides the Spartan, with Xantippus the Athenian, Admirals of the Greek Navie, at the request of some Ilanders and Ionians, did sail into those parts, to deliver the Sami-ans, and procure the Ionians to revolt from the Persian. Xerxes himself at this time lay at Sardis, a City in Lidia, not far from the Sea-side, having left threecore thousand under the command of Tigranes, for defence of Ionian and the Sea-coast. Therefore when Artaymas and Ithramitres, Admirals of the Persian fleet, understood that the Greeks bent their course towards them, they did forth-with draw their ships aground, fortifying with Palisadoes and otherwise, as much ground as was needful for the encamping of all their land and sea-forces. Leutychides at his arrivall, perceiving that they meant to keep within their strength, & resolving to force them out of it, rowed with his gally close aboard the shore, and called upon the Ionians (who more for fear than good will were encamped among the Persians) exhorting them in the Greek tongue to remember liberty, and use the fair occasion which they now had to recover it. Herein he did imitate Themistocles, who had done the like at Salamis, trusting that either these persuasions would prevail, or if the Persians did happen to understand them, that it would breed some jealousy in them, causing them to fight in fear of their own companions. It need not seem strange, that this very same stratagem, which little or nothing availed Themistocles, did now very happily succeed. For Xerxes being in his full strength, it was a matter of much difficulty, to perswade those inhabitants of Asia to revolt, who now in his declining estate, gave a willing ear to the sweet sound of liberty. The Persians likewise, who in their former bravery, little regarded, and lesse feared, any treason to be contrived by their subjects, were now so wary, that from the Samians which were amongst them, they took away their arms; the Milesians whom they did suspect, but would not seem to mistrust, they placed far from them, as it were for defence of the streight passages of Mycale; pretending that these Milesians did best of all others know those places. But these devices little availed them. For the Samians perceiving that they were held as Traitors, took courage in the heat of the fight, and laying hold upon such weapons as came to hand, assailed the Persians manfully within the Camp; which examples the Ionians presently followed, being very glad to have found some that durst begin. It is said that while the Greekes were yet in a march toward the Enemies Camp, a rumour suddenly ranne in the Army, that Mardonius was overthrown in Greece, which (though perhaps it was given out by the Captains to encourage the Soldiers) was very true. For the battell of Plataa was fought in the morning, and this of Mycale in the evening of the same day.

The like report of that great battell, wherein Paulus Amilius overthrew Perseus the last King of Macedon, was brought to Rome in four dayes, as Livie with others do record. And Plutarch hath many other examples of this kind. As that of the battell by the River Sagra in Italy, which was heard of the same day in Peloponnesus: That of the battell against the Tarquinians and the Latines, presently noised at Rome: And (which is most remarkable) the victory obtained against Lucius Antonius, who was Rebell to Domitian the Emperour. This Lucius Antonius being Lieutenant of the higher Germanie, had corrupted his Armie with gifts and promises, drawing the barbarous people to follow him, with great hope to make himself Emperour; which newes much troubling the City of Rome, with fear of a dangerous Warre, it was suddenly reported that Antonius was slain, and his Army defeated.

Hereupon many did offer sacrifice to the gods, and shew all manner of publique joy, as in such cases was accustomed. But when better inquiry was made, and the Authour of these tydings could not be found, the Emperour Domitian betook himself to his journey against the Rebell: and being now with his Army in march, he received advertisement by Post, of the Victory obtained, and the death of Antonius: whereupon remembring the rumour noised before in Rome, of the self-same victory, he found that the report and victory were born upon one day, though twenty thousand furlongs (which make above five and twenty hundred miles) a-funder. It is truly said of Plutarch, that this last example gives credit unto many the like. And indeed it were very strange, if among so many rumours, begotten by forgery or mistakings, and fostered by credulous imagination, there should not be found (as happens in dreams among many thousand vain and frivolous) a few precisely true. Howbeit wee may find, that God himself doth sometimes use to terrifie those who presume upon their own strength, by these light means of tumultuous noises, as he raised the siege of Samaria, by causing a sound of Horses and Chariots to affright the Aramites; and as he threatened Senacherib, saying, Behold, I will send a blast upon him, and he shall hear a noise, and return to his own land. Wherefore it may well have been true, that God was pleased by such means as this, to animate the Greekes; who (as Herodotus notes) went towards the Enemies with heave hearts, being in great fear, lest their own adventure should by no means fall out well; considering in what danger they had left their own Countrey of Greece, which was ready to be subdued by Mardonius whilest they went wandring to seek out enemies a-farre-off, upon the coast of Asia. But the same of the battell fought at Plataa being noised among them, every man desired that his own valour in the present fight, might be some help to work out the full deliverance of Greece. In this alacrity of spirit, they divided themselves into two Battalions, whereof the Athenians led the one, by the way of the plain, directly towards the enemies Camp; the Lacedamonians conducted the other, by the Mountains and streight passages, to winne the higher ground. The Athenians did first set upon the Campe (ere the Lacedamonians could arrive on the other part) and being desirous to get all the honour of the day to themselves, did so forcibly assault it, that they brake way through the Palissadoes and Gabions; and made themselves Masters of the place, slaying all that could not save themselves by flight. In this fight the Samians did good service, as is formerly mentioned.

But the Milesians, who upon the like jealousie, were placed by the Persians on the tops of Mycale, to defend the passages, did now (as if they had bin set of purpose to keep them from running away) put as many to the sword as fell into their hands, letting none escape, except very few, that fled through by-paths. The Lacedamonians that day did little service, for the businesse was dispatched ere they came in: Onely they broke such companies as retired in whole troops; making them flee dispersed in very much disorder, whereby the Milesians were enabled to doe the greater execution upon them. This was the last fight of that huge Army leaved against Greece, which was now utterly broken, and had no means left to make offensive Warre.

§. XI.

Of the barbarous qualities of Xerxes: with a transition from the Persian affairs to matters of Greece, which from this time grew more worthy of regard.

X Erxes lay at Sardis, not farre from the place of this battell; but little mind had he to revenge either this or other his great losses, being wholly given over to the love of his Brothers Wife: with whom hee could not prevail by intreaty, nor would obtain his desire by force, because he respected much his Brother her husband: hee thought it best to make a match between his own Son Darius, and the Daughter of this Woman; hoping by that means to find occasion of such familiarity as might work out his desire. But whether it were so, that the chastity of the Mother did still reject him, or the beauty of the Daughter allure him, hee soon after fell in love with his own sonnes wife, being a vicious Prince, and as ill able to govern himself in peace, as to guide his Army in warre. This young Lady having once desired the King to give her the Garment which hee then wore, being wrought by his own Wife; shee caused the Queen thereby to perceive her husbands conversation with her, which shee imputed not so much to the beauty of her Daughter-in-law, as to the cunning of the Mother, against whom thereupon she conceived extreme hatred. Therefore at a Royall feast, wherein the custome was that the King should grant their request, she craved that the Wife of Masistes, her husbands brother, the young Ladies Mother, might be given into her disposition. The barbarous King, who might either have reformed the abuse of such a custome, or have deluded the importunate cruelty of his Wife, by threatening her self with the like, to whatsoev she should inflict upon the innocent Lady, granted the request; and sending for his brother, perswaded him to put away the Wife which he had, and take one of his Daughters in her stead. Hereby it seems; that he understood how villainously that poor Lady should be intreated, whom hee knew to be vertuous, and whom himself had loved. Masistes refused to put her away; alleging his own love, her deserving, and their common Children, one of which was married to the Kings Sonne, as reasons important to move him to keep her. But in most wicked manner Xerxes reviled him, saying, That hee now should neither keep the Wife which he had, nor have his Daughter whom he had promised unto him. Masistes was much grieved with these words, but much more, when he returned home, hee found his Wife most butcherly mangled by the Queen Amestris, who had caused her Nose, Lips, Ears, and Tongue to be cut off, and her Breasts in like manner, which were cast unto Dogs. Masistes enraged with this villany, took his way with his children, and some Friends, towards Babaria, of which Province he was Governour, intending to rebell and avenge himself: But Xerxes understanding his purpose, caused an army to be levied, which cut him off by the way, putting him and all his Company to the sword. Such was the Tyrannicall condition of the Persian Government; and such are generally the effects of Luxury, when it is joyned with absolute power.

Yet of Xerxes it is noted, that hee was a Prince of much vertue. And therefore Alexander the Great, finding an image of his over-thrown, and lying upon the ground, said, That hee doubted, whether in regard of his vertue, hee should again erect it, or, for the mischief done by him to Greece, should let it lye. But surely whatsoever his other other good qualities were, he was foolish, and was a coward, and consequently mercileffe.

Therefore we may firmly believe, that the vertue of Cyrus was very great, upon which the foundation of the Persian Empire was so surely laid, that all the wickednesse and vanities of Xerxes, and other worse Princes, could not overthrow it, untill it was broken by a vertue almost equall to that which did establish it. In wars against the Egyptians, the fortune of Xerxes did continue, as at the first it had been, very good; but against the generall estate of Greece, neither he, or any of his posterity, did ever make offensive warre, but received many losses in Asia, to which the last at Mycale served but as an introduction; teaching the Greeks, and especially the Athenians, that the Persian was no better Souldier at his own doors, than in a forraign Country: whereof good triall was made forth-with, and much better proof as soon as the affairs of Athens were quietly settled and assured.

From this time forward I will therefore pursue the Historie of Greece, taking in the matters of Persia, as also the estate of other Countries, collaterally, when the order of time shall present them. True it is, that the Persian estate continued in her greatnesse, many ages following, in such wise that the known parts of the world had no other Kingdome, representing the Majesty of a great Empire.

But this greatnesse depended onely upon the riches and power that had formerly bin acquired, yeelding few actions or none that were worthy of remembrance, excepting some Tragedies of the Court, and examples of that excessive Luxury, where-with both it, and all, or the most of Empires that ever were, have been enervated, made unwieldy, and (as it were) fattened for the hungry swords of poor and hardy Enemies. Herebyt came to passe, that Xerxes and his successours were faine to defend their Crowns with money and base policies; very seldome or never (unlesse it were with great advantage) daring to adventure the triall of plain battell with that little Nation of Greece; which would soon have ruined the foundations laid by Cyrus, had not private malice and jealousie urged every City to envie the height of her neighbours wals, and thereby diverted the swords of the Greeks into their own bowels, which after the departure of Xerxes began very well, and might better have continued, to hew out the way of conquest, on the side of Asia.

CHAP. VII.

Of things that passed in Greece from the end of the Persian Warre, to the beginning of the Peloponnesian.

S. I.

How Athens was rebuilt and fortified.

THAT the Medes and Persians had received their last blow, and were utterly beaten at Mycale: Leutyobides, who then commanded the Grecian Army, leaving the pursuit of the warre to the Athenians, assisted by the revolted Iones, returned with the Lacedemonians and other Peloponnesians to Sparta and other places, out of which they had been leaved. The Athenians in the mean while besieged Sestos, a City on the strait of the Hellepont, between which and Sibydis, Xerxes had lately fastned his Bridge of Boats: where the Inhabitants, desperate of succour, did not long dispute the defence thereof, but quitted it to the Greeks, who entertained themselves the Winter following on that side the Hellepont. In the Spring they drew homeward, and having left their wives and children, since the invasion of Attica, and the abandoning of Athens, in divers Islands, and at Troezen, they now found them out, and returned with them to their own places.

And though the most part of all their houses in Athens were burnt and broken down, and

and the walls of the City over-turned, yet they resolved first on their common defence, and to fortifie their City, before they cared to cover themselves, their wives and children, with any private buildings. Whereof the Lacedemonians being advertised, and misliking the fortifying of Athens, both in respect that their own City of Sparta was unwall'd, as also because the Athenians were grown more powerfull by Sea, than either themselves, or any other State of Greece, they dispatched messengers to the Athenians to dissuade them, not acknowledging any private mislike or jealousie, but pretending, that if the Persians should return to invade Greece a third time, the Athenians being in no better state to defend themselves than heretofore, the same would serve to receive their enemies, and to be made a Seat for the War, as Thebes had lately bin. To this the Athenians promised to give them satisfaction by their own Embassadors very speedily. But being resolved to goe on with their works by the advice of Themistocles, they held the Lacedemonians in hope of the contrary, till they had raised their walls to that height, as they cared not for their mislikes, nor doubted their disturbance; and therefore (to gain time) they dispatched Themistocles towards Lacedemon, giving him for excuse, that he could not deliver the Athenians resolutions, till the arrival of his fellow-Commissioners, who were of purpose retarded. But after a while, the Lacedemonians expectation being converted into jealousie (for by the arrivall of divers persons out of Attica, they were told for certain, That the walls of Athens were speedily grown up beyond expectation) Themistocles prayed them not to beleieve reports and vain rumors, but that they would be pleased to send some of their own trusty Citizens to Athens, from whose relation they might resolve themselves, and determine accordingly. Which request being granted, and Commissioners sent, Themistocles dispatched one of his own, by whom he advised the Athenians, first to entertain the Lacedemonians with some such discourse as might retain them a few daies, and in conclusion to hold them among them, till himself, & the other Athenian Embassadors, then at Sparta, had their liberty also to return. Which done, and being also assured by his associates and Aristides, that Athens was already defensible on all parts, Themistocles demanding audience, made the Lacedemonians know, That it was true that the walls of Athens were now raised to that height, as the Athenians doubted not the defence of their City; praying the Lacedemonians to beleieve, That whosoever it pleased them to treat with the Athenians they would know them for such as might well understood what appertained to a Common-weale and their own safety, without direction & advice from any other: That they had in the war of Xerxes abandoned their City, and committed themselves to the wooden Walls of their ships, from the resolution of their own counsels and courage, and not thereto taught or persuaded by others: and finally, in all that perillous war against the Persians they found their own judgements and the execution thereof in nothing inferiour, or lesse fortunate, than that of any other Nation, State, or Common-weale among the Greeks. And therefore concluded, that they determined to be Masters and Judges of their own affairs, and thought it good reason, that either all the Cities confederated within Greece should be left open, or else that the Walls of Athens should be finished and maintained.

The Lacedemonians finding the time unfit for quarrell, dissembled their mislike, both of the fortifying of Athens, and of the division; and so suffered the Athenians to depart, and received back from them their own Embassadors.

The Walls of Athens finished, they also fortified the Port Pyrens, by which they might under covert imbarke themselves upon all occasions.

S. II.

The beginning of the Athenian greatnesse, and prosperous war made by that State upon the Persian.

THE Athenians having settled things in good order at home, prepared thirty Gallies for the pursuit of the war against the Persians, to which the Lacedemonians added other twenty, and with this Fleet, strengthened by the rest of the Cities of Greece confederated, they set sail for Cyprus, under the conduct of Pausanias the Lacedemonian, where, after their landing having possessed themselves of many principal places, they imbarked the Army again, and took land in Thrace, recovering from the the Persians by force the City Bizantium, now Constantinople: from whence Pausanias, behaving himself more like a Tyrant than a Captain, especially towards the Ionians, lately revolted from Xerxes, was called back by the Councell of Lacedemon, and not only accused of many insolent behaviours, but of Intelligence with the Medes, and Treason against his Country. In his stead they employed Dacres, who either gave the same cause of offence, or else the Athenians, who affected the first commandement in that war, practised the Souldiers to complain; though indeed the wise and vertuous behaviour of Aristides, Generall of the Athenian forces, a man of rare & incomparable sincerity, had been able to make a good Commander seem ill in comparison of himself; & therefore was much more available, in rendering those detested, whose vices afforded to little matter of excuse. Howsoever it were, the Lacedemonians being no lesse wearied of the war, than the Athenians were eager to pursue it, the one obtained their ease, and the other the execution and honour which they desired: for all the Greeks (those of Peloponnesus excepted) willingly subjected themselves to the commandement of the Athenians, which was both the beginning of their greatnesse in that present age, and of their ruin in the next succeeding. For the charge of the war being now committed unto them, they began to rate the confederated Cities; they appointed Receivers and Treasurers, and began to levie mony, according to their discretion, for the maintenance of the generall defence of Greece, & for the recovering of those places on Europe side, in Asia the lesse, and the Islands, from the Persians. This tribute (the first that was ever payed by the Greeks) amounted to four hundred and threescore Talents; which was raised easily by the honest care of that just man Aristides, to whose discretion all the confederates referred themselves, and no one man found occasion to complain of him. But as the vertue of Aristides, & other worthy Citizens, brought unto the Athenians great commodity, so the desire which they conceived of encreasing their commodity, corrupted their vertue, and robbing them of the generall love, which had made them powerfull, abandoned their City to the defence of her treasure, which with her in the next age perished. For it was not long ere these four hundred and threescore Talents were raised to six hundred, nor long after that, ere their covetous tyranny had converted their followers into slaves, and extorted from them yearly thirteen hundred Talents. The Isle of Delos was at 30 the first appointed for the Treasure-house wherein these sums were laid up, and where, at the generall Assembly, the Captains of those forces, sent by the confederates, were for form sake called to consultation. But the Athenians, who were stronger by sea than all Greece besides, had lockt up the common treasure in an Island, under their own protection, from whence they might transport it at their pleasure, as afterward they did.

The generall Commander in this War was Cimon, the son of Miltiades, who first took Eion, upon the River Strimon; then the Isle of Sciros, inhabited by the Dolopes: they mastered the Caristii, and brought into servitude the Naxii, contrary to the form of the confederacy: So did the other the inhabitants of Greece, if at any time they failed of their contribution, or disobeyed their commandements, taking upon them & usurping a kind of sovereign authority over the rest: which they exercised the more assuredly, 40 because they were now become Lords of the Sea, and could not be resisted. For many of the confederated Cities and Nations, weary of the war in their own persons, and given up altogether to their ease, made choice rather to pay their parts in mony, than either in men of war, or in ships; leaving the provision of both to the Athenians. Hereby the one grew weak in all their Sea-defences, and in the exercise of the Wars; the other greatly strengthened their Navie and their experiences, being always armed and employed in honorable Services, at the cost of those, who having lifted them into their Saddles, were now enforced to become their footmen. Yet was the Tribute-mony, levied upon these their confederates, employed so well by the Athenians at the first (as ill proceedings are often founded upon good beginnings) that no great cause of repining was given. For they rigged out a great Fleet of Gallies, very well manned, wherewith Cimon the Admirall scouring the Asiatick Seas, took in the City of Phaselis, which having formerly pretended neutrality, and refused to relieve, or any way assist the Greeks, were enforced to pay ten Talents for a fine, and so to become followers of the Athenians, paying yearly contribution.

From thence he set sail for the River Eurymedon in Pamphylia, where the Persian Fleet

Fleet rode, being of six hundred sayl, or (according to the most sparing report) three hundred and fifty, and having a great Land-Army, encamped upon the shoar; all which forces having been provided for advancing the Kings affairs in Greece, where utterly defeated in one day, and two hundred ships taken by the Athenians, the rest being broken to pieces, or sunk, ere ever they had swom in the Greekish Seas, Cimon having in one day obtained two great victories, the one by Sea, and the other by Land, was very soon presented with a third. For fourscore sayl of Phanicians (who were the best of all Sea-men, under the Persian command) thinking to have joyned themselves with the Fleet before destroyed, arrived upon the same Coast, ignorant of what had passed, and 10 fearing nothing lesse than what ensued. Upon the first notice of their approach, Cimon weighed anchor, and meeting them at an head-land, called Hydra, did to amaze them, that they onely sought to run themselves on ground; by which mean preserving few of their men, they lost all their ships. These losses did so break the courage of the Persians, that omitting all hope of prevailing upon Greece, he condescended to whatsoever Articles it pleased the Athenians to propound, granting liberty unto all the Greeks inhabiting Asia; and further covenanting, That none of his ships of War should sayl to the Westward of the Isles, called Cyaneæ and Chelidonia.

This was the most honourable peace that ever the Greeks made; neither did they in effect, after this time, make any war that redounded to the profit or glory of the whole 15 Nation, till such time as under Alexander, they overthrew the Empire of Persia; in which war, few, or perhaps none of them, had any place of great command, but served altogether under the Macedonians.

§. III.

The death of Xerxes by the treason of Artabanus.

Besides these losses, which could not easily have been repaired, the troubles of the Empire were at this time such, as gave just cause to the Persian of seeking peace upon any termes not altogether intollerable. For Artabanus, the Uncle of Xerxes, perceiving, that the King his Master did easily take small occasions to shed the blood of 20 such, as in kindred or place were near unto him, began to repose lesse hope of a safetie in remaining faithfull, than of obtaining the Sovereigntie, by destroying a Prince that was so hated for his cruelty, and despised for his cowardise and misfortunes. Having conceived this Treason, he found means to execute it by Mithridates an Eunuch, in such close manner, that (as if he himself had been innocent) he accused Darius the son of Xerxes, and caused him to suffer death as a Parricide. Whether it be true, that by this great wickednesse hee got the Kingdome, and held it seven moneths; or whether intending the like evill to Artaxerxes the son of Xerxes, he was by him prevented and surprised, were hard to affirm any certainty. But all Writers agree upon this, That taken 40 hee was, and with his whole family put to death by extreme torments, according to the sentence whereof the truth is more ancient than the Verse;

Raro antecedentem scelestum

Deservit pede poena claudo.

Seldome the villain, though much haste he make,
Lame-footed Vengeance fails to over take.

§. IV.

The banishment of Themistocles: his flight to Artaxerxes newly reigning in Persia; and his death.

Artaxerxes being established in his Kingdome, and having so compounded with the Athenians, as the present necessity of his affairs required, began to conceive new hopes of better fortune against the Greeks, than hee or his predecessors had ever hitherto found. For the people of Athenis, when the Persians were chased out of Greece, did so highly value their own merits in that service, that they not onely thought it fit for themselves to become the Commanders over many Towns and Islands of the Greeks, but even within their own walls, they would admit none other forme of Government than merely Democratick. Herein they were so insolent, that no integritie nor nor good desert was able to preserve the estate of any such as had born great office, longer than by flattering the rascall multitude, he was contented to frame all his words and deeds to their good liking.

This their intolerable demeanour much offended Themistocles; who, though in former times he had layed the foundations of his greatnesse upon popularity, yet now presuming upon his good services done to the State, he thought that with great reason they might grant him the liberty to check their inordinate proceedings. But contrariwise, they were so highly offended with his often rehearsing the benefites which they had received from him, that they laid upon him the punishment of Ostracisme, whereby hee was banished for ten years, as a man over-burthened to the Common-wealth.

Before the time of his return was half expired, a new accusation was brought against him by the Lacedamonians, who charged him of consulting with Pausanias, about betraying the whole Countrey of Greece unto Xerxes. Hereupon Themistocles, finding no place of security against the malice of two such mighty cities, was driven, after many troublesome flights, and dangerous removings, to adventure himself into Persia, where he found Artaxerxes newly settled, & was by him very honourably entertained. But the great hope which Artaxerxes had conceived of advancing his affairs by the counsell and assistance of Themistocles, proved altogether fruitlesse. For when the Athenians, in favour of Inarm the Lybian, (who infested Egypt, causing it to rebell against the Persian) had sent a Fleet to Sea, landing an Army in Egypt, and scouring those Eastern Seas, to the great hindrance of Artaxerxes, and (for ought that I can understand) to the manifest breach of that peace, which to their great honour they had concluded with Xerxes; then did the King send his Letters to Themistocles, requiring him to make good the hopes which he had given, of assuring the Persian estate against the Greeks.

But whether Themistocles perceived much unlikeliness of good successe, in leading a great army of dastardly Persians against the warlike people of Greece; or else (as in favour of his vertue it is more commonly reported) the love of his Countrey would not permit him to seek honour by the ruine of it, sure it is, that being appointed by Artaxerxes to undertake the conduct of great forces against the Athenians, he decided the great conflict between thankfulness to his well-deserving Prince, and naturall affection to his own ill-deserving people, by finishing his life with a cup of poyson.

Now the Athenians, breaking the peace, which to their great honour they had made with the Persian, were shamefully beaten in Egypt.

Then was Artaxerxes driven to use the service of his own Captains in the Egyptian warre, wherein it appeared well, That a just cause is a good defence against a strong enemy. An Athenian Fleet of two hundred saile strong was sent forth under Cimon, to take in the Isle of Cyprus: which conquest seemed easie both to make and to maintain, the Persian being utterly broken at Sea, and thereby unable to relieve the Island. Now although it were so, that a peace had been concluded, which was likely to have been kept sincerely by the Persian, who had made so good proofe of the Gracian valour, that he was nothing desirous to build any ships of Warre (without which the Greeks could receive no harm from him) whereof if any one should be found sayling towards Greece, the peace was immediatly broken, and if not, his whole estate; yet all the Sea-coast (no small part of his Dominions) exposed to the waste of an enemy too far over-marching him. Yet whether the Athenians were in doubt, lest the league which in his own worser fortunes he had made with them, he would break in theirs; and therefore sought to get such assurance into their hands, as might utterly disable him from attempting ought against them; or whether the increase of their revenues and power, by adding that rich and great Island to their Empire, caused them to measure honour by profit; they thought it the wisest way, to take whilest they might, whatsoever they were able to get and hold, and he unable to defend.

The Isle of Cyprus lying in the bottome of the streights between Cilicia, Syria and Egypt, is very fitly seated for any Prince of State, that being mighty at Sea, doth either seek to enrich himself by trade with those Countreies, or to infest one or more of them when they are his enemies. And this being the purpose of the Athenians, their Ambition which had already devoured, in conceit, this Island, was on the sudden well-nigh choaked with a greater morsell; to snatch at which, they let Cyprus alone, which they might easily have swallowed and digested. For Inarm King of the Lybian, confining Egypt, having found how greatly the Countrey was exhauisted by the late Warres, and how weakly defended by very slender Persian Garrisons, conceived rightly, that if such small forces as the Satrapa or Viceroy could make on the sudden of his own Guards, or levie out of the ordinary Garrisons, were by him defeated, the naturalls of the Countrey not long since oppressed by Cambyses, and after a revolt very lately subdued by Xerxes, would soon break faith with him, who had no other way to that Kingdom than a good sword. Further, he perswaded himself that the people, unable to defend themselves against the Persian without his assistance, would easily be drawn to accept him, the author of their deliverance, for King. Neither did he hope to deceive him. For having taken and cruelly slain Schamates the Viceroy, who Cities forthwith declared themselves for him, and proclaiming him King, he was the most of their endeavour for prosecution of the Warre. But hee considering his own weakness, and that the means of the Egyptians his adherents, were not answerable to their desires, perceived well, that to resist the power of Artaxerxes, farre greater forces than his and theirs were to be procured; at what price soever hee obtained them. Therefore hearing of the great Athenian fleet, and knowing well the vertue of the Souldiers therein embarked; he invited the Commanders to shake with him the Kingdom of Egypt, as a farre greater reward of their adventure, than such an addition as that of Cyprus could be to their estate. Whether he or they (if things had wholly sorted according to their expectation) would have been contented with an equall share, and not have fallen out in the partition, were perhaps a divination unnecessary. He was possessed of the peoples love, they were of most power. But the issue of those affairs was such as left them nothing to communicate but misfortunes, which they shared somewhat equally.

Yet had the beginnings of their enterprise very good and hopeful successe. For they counted the Land as farre as to Memphis, the principall Citie, and of the Citie it self they took two parts: to the third part, which was called the White wall, they laid such hard siege, that neither those forces of the Persians, which then were in Egypt, were strong enough to remove them; neither could Artaxerxes well advise what means to use for the recovery of that which was lost, or for the preservation of the remainder. The best of his hope was by setting the Lacedamonians upon Athen, to enforce the Athenians to look homewards to their own defence. This was the first time that the Persian sought to procure the assistance of the Greeks one against the other, by stirring them up with gold, to the entertainment of private quarrels, for the good of their common enemy. To this purpose he sent Megabazus to Sparta with much Treasure, who after great expence, finding that the Lacedamonians were nothing forward in employing their whole force against the Athenians; whom in many consists of great importance they had found to be their matches; notwithstanding the absence of their Army in Egypt, he thought it his wisest way to employ the rest of his money and means to their relief, who had now the space of six years defended his masters right in Egypt. Therefore he hastily dispatched another of his name, the son of Zopyrus, who arriving in Egypt, was first encountered by the revolted people, over whom hee obtained victory, which made him master of the Countrey, whilest the Athenians lay busied about Memphis the great Citie.

It cannot be doubted, that long abode in a strange ayre, and want of supply, had much enfeebled the Athenians: sure it is, that when Megabazus, having reduced the Countrey to obedience, attempted the Citie it self, whether his former successe had amended the courage of the Persians, or want of necessities made the Athenians inferior to themselves, he chased them out of Memphis, and pursued them so neer, as they were forc'd to fortifie themselves in the Isle of Prosopites, where Megabazus, after eighteen moneths siege, turning away one part of the River by divers Trenches, assaulted the Athenians without impediment of waters, took their Gallies, and put all to the sword, save a few that saved themselves by flight into Lybia; the same entertainment had fiftie other Gallies which they sent to the succour of the first two hundred hundred. For those Athenians having heard nothing that their Fleet and Armie was consumed, entred by the branch of Nilus, called Mendesium, and fell unawares among the Phenician Gallies, and the Persian Armie; so as the Persians recovered all Egypt, but that part held by Amyrteus, and Inarus the King of Lybia, being by them taken and hanged. This was the end of the Athenians six years Warre in Egypt, and the reward of their vanity and indiscretion to undertake many enterprises at once.

5. V.

Of other Warres made by the Athenians for the most part with good successe, about the same time.

Notwithstanding these overthrowes in Egypt, yet the Athenians in their home-warres waded through many difficulties, and held the reputation of their forces against the Lacedemonians, Corinthians, and others, rather to their advantage than otherwise. For as they were beaten neer unto Halia by the Corinthians and Epidaurians, so they obtained two great Victories soon after; the one over the Peloponnesians, neer unto Cecryphalia; the other over the Aeginets, neer unto Agina; where they sunk and carried away threescore and ten Gallies of their enemies. Furthermore, they landed their forces on the sudden, and besieged Agina, from whence they could not be moved, notwithstanding that the Corinthians, to divert them, invaded Megara; where, after a great fight, with equall losse, the Corinthians, when they returned again to set up their Trophie, as Victors in the former battell, were utterly broken and slaughtered by the Athenian Garrisons and Megarians, to their great losse and dishonour.

Again, as the Athenians were discomfited neer to Tangra, by the Lacedemonians, who returned from the succour of the Dorians against the Phocians (at which time the Thessalian horse-men turned from their Allies the Athenians, and fought against them) so about threescore daies after, the Athenians entred Boeotia under the conduct of Myr-nides, where beating that Nation, they won Phocis on the gulfe of Oetens, and evened the walls of Tangra to the ground. Finally, they enforced Agina to render upon most base conditions; as to beat down the walls of their City, and to give them hostages for Tribute; the siege whereof they had continued, notwithstanding all their other brabbles and attempts elsewhere. Besides these victories, they sackt and spoiled many places upon the Sea-coast of Peloponnesus, belonging to the Lacedemonians, wan upon the Corinthians, and overthrew the Sicyonians that came to their succour. These were the undertakings of the Athenians, and their Allies, during the time of those six years that a part of their forces made war in Egypt. In the end whereof they attempted Thessalie, perswaded thereunto by Orestes, but were resisted by the king Pharsalus, who had chased Orestes out of his Dominions. They also landed in Sicyonia, and had victory over those that resisted, after which they made truce with the Peloponnesians for five years, and sent Cimon into Cyprus with two hundred ships; but they were again allured by Amyrteus one of the race of their former Kings, who held the Marsh and Wooddy parts of Egypt from the Persians, to whom they sent sixty of their ships. The rest of their Armie failing in their enterprize at Cyprus, and their fortunate and victorious Leader Cimon dying there, as they coasted the Island, incountred a fleet of the Phanicians and Cilicians, over both which Nations they returned victorious into Greece: as also those returned safe which were sent into Egypt.

5. VI.

Of Artaxerxes Longimanus, that he was Ahashuerosh the husband of Queen Hester.

These Egyptian troubles being ended, the reign of Artaxerxes continued peaceable; whereof the length is by some restrained unto twenty years, but the more and better Authors give him forty, some allow unto him four and forty.

He was a Prince of much humanity, and noted for many examples of gentleness. His favour was exceeding great to the Jews; as appeareth by the Histories of Esdraus and Nehemias, which fell in his time.

To prove that this was the King who gave countenance and ayd to that great work of building the Temple, it were a needlesse travell, considering that all the late Divines have taken very much pains to shew that those two Prophets were licensed by him, and succoured in that building, in such sort as appears in their writings.

This was likewise that King Ahashuerosh who married Hester. Whereof if it be needfull to give proof, it may suffice, That Ahashuerosh lived in Susa, reigning from India to Aethiopia, and therefore must have been a Persian; That he lived in peace, as appears by the circumstances of the Historie, and used the counsell of the seven Princes, the authority of which Princes began under Darius the son of Hystaspes; wheteof he could be neither Cyrus nor Cambyses.

The continuall Wars which exercised King Darius the Son of Hystaspes, together with the certainty of his marriages with sundry wives, from none of whom he was divorced, but left his first wife Xerxes, the daughter of Cyrus, alive in great honour, she being mother to Xerxes the succeeding King, do manifestly prove that Hester was not his. Whereunto is added by Philo the Jew, That at the perswasion of Mardochaius, Fojachim the high Priest the son of Jesua, caused the feast of Purim to be instituted in memory of that deliverance. Now the time of Fojachim was in the reign of Artaxerxes, at the coming of Esdraus and Nehemias: Jesua his father dying about the end of Darius.

The same continuance of wars, with other his furious and tragicall loves wherewith Xerxes did consume such little time as he had free from war, are enough to prove, that the story of Hester pertained not unto the time of Xerxes, who lived but one and twenty years, whereas the two and thirtieth of Ahashuerus or Artaxastha is expressed by Nehemias. Again, it is well known that Xerxes in the seventh year of his reign (wherein this marriage must have bin celebrated) came not neer to Susa. Of the Princes that succeeded Artaxerxes Longimanus, to prove that none of them could be Ahashuerosh, it is enough to say, that Mardochaius having been carried from Hierusalem captive, with Fethenia, by Itabuchadnezzar, was unlikely to have lived untill their times.

But of this Artaxerxes it is true, that he lived in Susa, reigned from India to Aethiopia, lived in peace, was contemporary with Fojachim the high Priest, and further he had happily by his Lieutenants reclaimed the rebellious Egyptians in that seventh year of his reign; which good fortune might well give occasion to such a Royall Feast, as is described in the beginning of Hester. This is the sum of the arguments, brought to prove the age of Hesters storie by the learned and diligent Krentzhemius, who adds the authorities of Josephus, affirming the same; and of Philo giving to Mardochaius eighteen years more than Isaac the Patriarch lived, namely, one hundred four-score and eighteen years in all, which expire in the five and thirtieth year of this Artaxerxes, if we suppose him to have been carried away captive, being a Boy of ten years old.

Of the troubles in Greece, foregoing the Peloponnesian War.

But it is fit that we now return to the affairs of the Greeks, who from this time forward, more vehemently prosecuting their civill wars, suffered the Persians for many ages to rest in peace: this Egyptian expedition being come to nought. Soon after this, the Lacedemonians undertook the war called Sacred, recovered the Temple and Ile of Delphos, and delivered both to the inhabitants; but the Athenians regained the same, and gave it in charge to the Phocians. In the mean while the banished Boeotians re-entred their own Land, and mastered two of their own Towns posselt by the Athenians, which they soon recovered again from them; but in their return towards Athens, the Boeotians, Eubaeans, and Locrians, (Nations oppressed by the Athenians) set upon them with such resolution, as the Athenians were in that fight all slain or taken, taken, whereby the Bœotians recovered their former liberty, restoring to the Athenians their prisoners. The Islanders of Eubœa took such courage upon this, that they revolted wholly from the Athenians, whom when Pericles intended to reconquer, he was advertised that the Megarians (who first left the Lacedæmonians, and submitted themselves to Athens) being now weary of their yoke, had slain the Athenians Garrisons, and joyned themselves with the Corinthians, Sicyonians, and Epidaurians. These news hastened Pericles homeward with all possible speed; but ere he could recover Attica, the Peloponnesians, led by Plisfoanax the son of Pausanias, had invaded it, pillaged and burnt many parts thereof, after whose return Pericles went on with his first intent, and recovered Eubœa. Finally, the Athenians began to treat of peace with the Peloponnesians, and yeelded to deliver up all the places which they held in the Country of Peloponnesus:¹⁰ and this truce was made for thirty years.

After six of these years were expired, the Athenians (favouring the Mylefians against the Samians) invaded Samos by Pericles, and after many repulses, and some great losses, both by Sea and Land, the Citizens were forc'd to yeeld themselves upon most lamentable conditions; Namely, to deliver up all their ships, to break down their own walls, to pay the charge of the war, and to restore whatsoever had been taken by themselves, or by their practice from the Athenians. In the neck of which followed that long and cruell Peloponnesian War, whereof I have gathered this brief following: the same contention taking beginning fiftie years after the flight of Xerxes out of Greece. But because there²⁰ was no Citie thereof, which either in the beginning of this war, or in the continuance of it, was not drawn into the quarrell; I hold it convenient now at the first to shew briefly the estate of the Country at that time, and especially the condition of those two great Cities, Athens and Sparta, upon which all the rest had most dependance.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Peloponnesian War.

§. I.

Upon what terms the two principall Cities of Greece, Athens and Sparta, stood at the beginning of the Peloponnesian War.

Greece was never united under the government of any one Prince or Estate, untill Philip of Macedon, and after him Alexander, brought them rather to a Union and League against the Persians, whereof they were Captains, than into any absolute subjection. For every Estate held their own, and were governed by Laws, far different, and by their own Magi-⁴⁰ strates, notwithstanding the power of the Macedonians, to whom they did yeeld obedience no otherwise than as to such, who were (perforce) their leaders in the Persian war (deemed the Generall quarrel of Greece) and took the profit and honour of the victory, to their own use and increase of greatnesse. But the Kings which afterward reigned in Macedonia, did so far enlarge their authority, that all Greece was by them brought under such obedience, as differed little from servitude; very few excepted, who could hardly, sometimes with arms, and sometimes with gifts, preserve their liberty, of whom the Lacedæmonians and Athenians were chief: which two people deserved best the plague of tyranny, having first given occasion thereunto by their great ambition, which wearied and weakned all the Country by perpetuall War. For untill these two Cities of Athens and Sparta distracted all Greece, drawing every State into the quarrell, on the one or other side, and so gave beginning to the Peloponnesian War (the effects whereof in true estimation ceased not, before the time that Philip had over-mastered all; forasmuch as every⁵⁰ conclusion conclusion of one war afforded henceforth matter of some new distraction of the whole Country) the wars, commenced between one Citie of Greece and another, were neither great, nor of long continuance. All controversies were soon decided, either by the authority of the Amphictiones, who were the generall Councell of Greece, or by the power of the Lacedæmonians, whose aid was commonly held as good as the assurance of victory.

These Lacedæmonians had lived about four hundred years under one forme of Government, when the Peloponnesian War began. Their education was only to practise feats of Arms; wherein they so excelled, that a very few of them were thought equall to very great numbers of any other people. They were poor, and cared not much for wealth; every one had an equall portion of the common field, which sufficed to maintain him in such manner as they used. For bravery they had none, and curious building or apparell they regarded not. Their diet was simple, their feasts and ordinary meals being in common Halls, where all fared alike. They used money of yron, whereof they could not be covetous nor great hoarders. Briefly, they lived Utopian-like, save that they used no other occupation than War, placing all their felicity in the glory of their valour. Hereby it came to passe that in all enterprises, whereof they were partakers, the leading and high command was granted to them, and all Greece followed their conduct. But the Athenians were in all points contrary to this. For they sought wealth, and measured the honours of their victories by the profit; they used mercenary Souldiers in their wars, and exacted great tribute of their Subjects, which were for the most part Islanders, compelled to obey them, because the Athenian fleet was great.

As in form of policy, and in course of life, so in conditions naturall, the difference between these two people was very much. The Athenians were eager and violent, sudden in their conclusions, and as hasty in the execution. The Lacedæmonians very slow in their deliberations, full of gravity, but very resolute, and such as would in cold blood perform what the Athenians did usually in flagrant. Whereby it came to passe, that the Lacedæmonians had all the Estates of Greece depending upon them, as on men firm and assured; that sought honour and not riches; whereas the Athenians were followed by such as obeyed them perforce, being held in streight subjection. But the Signory of the Athenians was nothing large, untill such time as the Persian Xerxes had invaded Greece, pretending only a quarrell to Athens: For then the Citizens perceiving well, that the Town of Athens could not be defended against his great Army of seventeen hundred thousand men, bestowed all their wealth upon a Navie, and (assisted by the other Grecians) overthrew the fleet of Xerxes, whose Land-forces were soon after discomfited by them, and the Greeks, who all served under conduct of the Spartans. After these victories, the Athenians being now very mighty in fleet, reduced all the Islands of the Greekish Seas under their obedience; imposing upon them a hard tribute, for maintenance (as they pretended) of War against the Persians, though indeed they employed their forces chiefly, to the conquest of such Islands and haven-Towns of their Country-men, as stood out against them. All which was easily suffered by the Lacedæmonians, who were In-landers, and men that delighted not in expeditions to be made far from home. But afterwards perceiving the power of the Athenians to grow great, they held them in much jealousy, and were very apt to quarrell with them; but much more willing to breed contention between them and other Estates. Wherefore at such time as the Thebans would have oppressed the Plataeans, when they of Platae repaired to Sparta for succour, they found there no other aid, than this advice, That they should seek help at Athens. Hereby it was thought, that the Athenians should be intangled in a long and tedious War with their neighbours of Thebes. But it proved otherwise; for their force was now so great, that all such occasions did onely serve to increase their honour and puissance.

§. II.

How Sparta and Athens entred into Warre.

NEvertheless many Estates of Greece were very ill-affected to Athens, because that Citie grew very insolent upon sudden prosperitie, and maintaining the weaker Towns against the stronger, incroached apace upon their Neighbours, taking their⁰⁰⁰³ their dependants from them. Especially the Corinthians were much enraged, because the people of the Iland Corcyra, their Colonie which had rebelled against them, and given them a great overthrow by Sea, was by the Athenians (who desired to increase their fleet by adjoyning that of Corcyra unto it) taken into protection, and the Corinthians thereby impeached of that revenge which else they would have taken. Now howsoever it were so that these dealings of the Athenians were not directly against the conditions of peace agreed upon among the Greeks, yet were the complaints made at Sparta so vehement, that (though with much ado) they concluded to redresse by war the injuries done to their Allies.

First therefore, seeking religious pretences, they required the Athenians to expiate certain offences committed against the gods; whereto having for answer, That they themselves should expiate other the like offences, committed in Sparta, they began to deal plainly, and required that the people of some Towns, oppressed by the State of Athens, should be set at liberty; and that a decree made against those of Megara, whereby they were forbidden to enter any Port of the Athenians, should be reversed. This last point they so earnestly presse, that if they might obtain it, they promised to abstain from their purpose of making War.

This they desired, not as a matter of any great importance (for it was a trifle) but only that by seeming to have obtained somewhat, they might preserve their reputation without entering into a war, which threatened them with greater difficulties apparent, than they were very willing to undergoe.

But the Athenians would yeeld to nothing; for it was their whole desire that all Greece should take notice how farre they were from fear of any other Citie. Hereupon they prepared on both sides very strongly, all that was needfull to the War, wherein the Lacedemonians were Superiour, both in number and quality, being assisted by most of the Cities in Greece, and having the generall favour, as men that pretended to set at liberty such as were oppressed: but the Athenians did as far exceed them in all provisions of money, shipping, engines, and absolute power of command among their Subjects; which they held, and afterward found of greater use in such need, than the willing readinesse of friends, who soon grow weary, and are not easily assembled.

S. III.

The beginning of the Peloponnesian Warre.

The first and second years expedition was very grievous to the Citie of Athens. For the Fields were wasted, the Trees cut down, the Countrey people driven to flye, with Wives, Children, and Cattell, into the Town; whereby a most furious pestilence grew in the City, such as before they had never felt, nor heard of. Hereunto was added the revolt of the Mytilenians, in the Isle of Lesbos, and the siege of Plataea their confederated City, which they durst not adventure to raise; besides some small overthrowes received. The Lacedemonians assembling as great forces as they could raise out of Peloponnesus, did in the beginning of Summer enter the Countrey of Attica, and therein abide, untill victuals began to fail, wasting and destroying all things round about. The Governours of the Athenians would not suffer the people to issue into the field against them, for they knew the valour of their enemies: but used to send a fleet into Peloponnesus, which wasted as fast all the Sea-coast of their enemies, whilst they were making war in Attica. So the Peloponnesians being the stronger by Land, wanted the Town of Plataea, which wanted rescue; the Athenians likewise being more mighty by Sea, did subdue Mytilene which had rebelled, but could not be succoured from Sparta. By these proceedings in that Warre, the Lacedemonians began to perceive how unfit they were to deal with such enemies. For after that Attica was thoroughly wasted, it lay not greatly in their power to doe any offence equall to such harm as they themselves might, and did receive. The Confederates began to set forward very slowly in their expeditions into Attica, perceiving well that Athens was plentifully relieved with all necessaries, which came by the Sea from the Ilands that were subject unto that Estate; and therefore these invaders took but small pleasure in beholding the Walls of that mighty City, or in wasting a forsaken field, which was to them a pattern of the calamities with which their own Territorie was the whilst afflicted. Wherefore they began began to set their care to build a strong Navie, wherein they had little good success, being easily vanquished by the Athenians, who both had more and better ships, and were skilfull in Sea-fights, that a few Vessels of theirs durst undertake a great number of the Peloponnesians.

S. IIII.

Of the great losse which the Spartans received at Pylus.

Among other losses which the Spartans had felt by Sea, they received at Pylus a very fore blow, that compelled them to sue for peace. A fleet of Athenian ships bound for Corcyra, waiting in that passage, as their manner was, the coast of Laconia, and all the half-Ile of Peloponnesus, was by contrary windes detained at Pylus, which is a ragged Promontory, joyning to the Main, by a strange neck of Land. Before it there lies a small barren Iland of lesse than two miles compasse, and within that a creek, which is a good harbour for ships, the force of weather being born off by the head-Land and Isle. This Promontorie the Athenians fortified as well as in haste they might; and what was wanting in their artificiall fortification, was supplied by the naturall strength and site of the place. By holding this piece of ground, and haven, they in reason expected many advantages against their enemies. For the Countrey adjoyning was inhabited by the Messenians, who in ancient times had held very strong and cruell waite with Sparta; and (though quite subdued) they were held in streight subjection; yet was not the old hatred so extinguished, that by the neer neighbourhood and assistance of the Athenians, it might not be revived. Furthermore it was thought, that many ill-willers to the Lacedemonians, and as many of their bond-slaves as could escape from them, would repair to Pylus, and from thence make daily incursions into Laconia, which was not far off. Or if other hopes failed, yet would the benefit of this haven, lying almost in the mid-way between them and Corcyra, make them able to surround all Peloponnesus, and waste it at their pleasure. The newes of these doings at Pylus drew the Peloponnesians thither in all haste out of Attica, which they had entered a few dayes before, with their whole Army: but now they brought not only their Land-forces, but all their Navie to recover this piece, which how bad a neighbour it might prove in time, they well foresaw, little fearing the grievous losse at hand, which they there in few daies received. For when they in vain made a generall assault on all sides, both by Sea and Land, finding that small Garrison which the Athenians had left, very resolute in the defence, they occupied the haven, placing four hundred and twenty choyce men, all of them Citizens of Sparta, in the Iland before mentioned, at each end whereof is a channell that leads into the Port; but so narrow, that onely two ships in front could enter between the Isle and Pylus, likewise but seven or eight ships could enter at once by the further channell, between the Iland and the Main. Having thus taken order to shut up this new Town by Sea, they sent part of their fleet to fetch wood, and other stuffe, wherewith to fortifie round about, and block up the piece on all sides. But in the mean season the Athenian fleet hearing of their danger that were left at Pylus, returned thither, and with great courage entering the haven, did break and sink many of their enemies vessels; took five, and so enforced the residue to run themselves a-ground.

Now was the Town secure, and the Spartans abiding in the Iland as good as lost. Wherefore the Magistrates were sent from Sparta to the camp (as was their custome in great dangers) to advise what were best for the publike safety; who when they did perceive that there was no other way to rescue their Citizens out of the Isle, than by composition with their enemies, they agreed to entreat with the Athenians about peace, taking truce in the mean while with the Captains at Pylus. The conditions of the truce were, That the Lacedemonians should deliver up all the ships which were in the coast, and that they should attempt nothing against the town, nor the Athenians against the camp: That a certain quantitie of Bread, Wine, and Flesh, should be daily carried into the Isle, but that no ships should passe into the Iland secretly: That the Athenians should carry the Lacedemonian Embassadors to Athens, there to treat of peace, and should bring them back, at whose return the truce should end, which if in the mean time it were broken in any one point, should be held utterly voyd in all; That when the truce was expired, the Athenians should restore the Peloponnesian ships, in as good case as they received them. The Embassadors coming to Athens, were of opinion, that as they themselves had begun the warre, so might they end it when they pleased. Wherefore they told the Athenians how great an honour it was that the Lacedemonians did sue to them for peace, advising them to make an end of War, whilst with such reputation they might. But they found all contrary to their expectation: For instead of concluding upon even termes, or desiring of meet recompence for losse sustained, the Athenians demanded certain Cities to be restored to them, which had bin taken from them by the Lacedemonians long before this warre began, refusing likewise to continue the treaty of peace, unless the Spartans which were in the Isle, were first rendred unto them as prisoners. Thus were the Embassadors returned without effect; at which time the truce being ended, it was desired from the Athenian Captains, that they should, according to their Covenant, restore the ships which had been put into their hands. Whereunto answer was made, that the condition of the truce was, that if any one article were broken, all should be held void; now (said the Athenians) ye have assaulted our Garrisons, and thereby are we acquitted of our promise to restore the ships. This and the like frivolous allegations which they made, were but meer shifts; yet profit so far overweighed honour, that better answer none could be got. Then were the Lacedemonians driven to use many hard means, for conveyance of victuals into the Isle; which finally was taken by force, and the men that were in it carried prisoners to Athens, where it was decreed that when the Peloponnesians next invaded Attica, these prisoners should all be slain. Whether fearing the death of these men, or with-held by the troubles, which (according to the Athenians hope) fell upon them, the Lacedemonians were so far from wasting Attica, that they suffered their own Country to be continually over-run, both by the Athenians, who landed on all parts of their coast, and by those which issued out of Pylus; which became the Rendevous of all that were ill-affected unto them.

S. V.

How the Lacedemonians hardly, and to their great disadvantage, obtained a peace that was not well kept.

Therefore they endeavoured greatly to obtain peace, which the Athenians would not hearken unto. For they were so puffed up with continuance of good success, that having sent a few bands of men into Sicilie, to hold up a faction there, and make what profit they might of the Sicilians quarrels; when afterward they heard that the differences in that Isle were taken away, and their bands returned without either gain or losse, they banished the Captains, as if it had been merely through their default, that the Ile of Sicilie was not conquered; which (besides the longer distance) was in power to offend others, or defend it self, no whit inferiour unto Peloponnesus. Yet was this their over-weening much abated shortly after, by some disasters received, especially in Thrace, where in a battell which they lost at Amphipolis, Cleon and Brasidas, Generals of the Athenian and Lacedemonian forces, were both slain; which two had most bin adversaries to the peace. As the Athenians by their losses were taught moderation; so the Lacedemonians, who not only felt the like wounds, but through the great Navie which they had received at Pylus, were faine to proceed lamely in the war, against such as, through commodity of their good fleet, had all advantage that could be found in expedition, were fervently desirous to conclude the business, ere Fortune by any new favour should revive the insolence, which was at this time well mortified in their Enemies. Neither was it only a consideration of their present estate, that urged them to bring the treaty of peace to a good and speedy effect; but other dangers hanging over their heads, and ready to fall on them, which unless they compounded with the Athenians, they knew not how to avoyd. The estate of Argos, which had antient enmity with them, was now after a truce of thirty years well-nigh expired, ready to take the benefit of their present troubles, by joyning with those who alone found them work enough. Argos was a rich and strong Citie, which though inferiour to Sparta in valour, yet was not so unwarlike, nor held such ill correspondence with the neighbouring Estates, that the Lacedemonians could ever farre prevail upon it, when they had little else to doe.

This

This was a thing that in the beginning of this War had not been regarded. For it was then thought that by wasting the Territory of Athens with sword and fire, the quarrell should easily and in short time have been ended, whereby not only the Athenians should have bin brought to good order, but the Corinthians, and others, for whose sake the war was undertaken, have bin so firmly knit to the Lacedemonians, that they should for love of them have abandoned the Argives to their own fortunes. But now the vanity of those hopes appeared, in that the Athenians abounding in ready mony, & means to raise more, were able to secure themselves by a strong fleet, from any great harme that the Peloponnesians, wanting wherewith to maintain a Navie, could doe unto them; yea, as Masters of the Sea, to weary them out, as in effect already they had done. As for the Confederates of Sparta, they could now endure neither war nor peace; their daily travels, and many losses had so wearied and incensed them. Wherefore the Lacedemonians were glad to use the occasion, which the inclination of their enemies did then afford, of making a small peace, which with much ado they procured, as seemed equall and easie; but was indeed impossible to be performed, and therefore all their travell was little effectuall. The restitution of prisoners and places taken being agreed upon, it fell out by lot, that the Lacedemonians should restore first. These had won more Towns upon the continent from the Athenians, than the Athenians had from them; but what they had won, they had not won absolutely. For they had restored some Towns to such of their Allies, from whom the State of Athens had taken them; some, and those the most, they had set at liberty (as reason required) which had opened their gates unto them as to their friends and deliverers, and not compelled them to break in as enemies. Now concerning the Towns which were not in their own hands, but had bin rendred unto their Confederates, the Spartans found means to give some satisfaction, by permitting the Athenians to retain others, which they had gotten in the War; as for the rest, they promised more than afterwards they could performe. The Cities which they had taken into protection, could not endure to hear of being abandoned, neither would they by any means yeeld themselves into the hands of their old Lords the Athenians, whom they had offended by revolting, notwithstanding whatsoever articles were drawn, and so concluded, for their security, and betterance in time to come. This dull performance of conditions on the side of the Spartans, made the Athenians become as backward in doing those things which on their part were required; so that restoring only the prisoners which they had, they deferred the rest, untill such time as they might receive the full satisfaction, according to the agreement. But before such time as these difficulties brake out into matter of open quarrell, the Lacedemonians entred into a more straight alliance with the Athenians, making a league offensive and defensive with them. Hereunto they were moved by the backwardness of the Argives, who being (as they thought) likely to have sued for peace at their hands, as soon as things were once compounded between Athens and Sparta, did shew themselves plainly unwilling to give eare to any such motion. Thinking therefore, that by cutting from Argos all hope of Athenian succour, they should make sure work, the Spartans regarded not the affections of other States, whom they had either bound unto them by well-deserving in the late war, or found so troublesome, that their enmity (if perhaps they durst let it appear) was little worse than friendship. It bred great jealousy in all the Cities of Greece, to perceive such a conjunction between two so powerfull Signiories: especially one claufe threatening every one, that was any thing apt to fear; with a secret intent that might be harboured in their proud conceits, of subduing the whole Country, and taking each what they could lay hold on. For besides the other articles, it was agreed, That they might by mutuall consent adde new conditions, or alter the old at their own pleasures. This impression wrought so strongly in the Corinthians, Thebanes, and other ancient Confederates of Sparta, that the hate which they had born to the Athenians their professed enemies, was violently thrown upon the Lacedemonians their unjust friends: whereby it came to passe, that they who lately had borne chief sway in Greece, might have been abandoned to the discretion of their enemies; as already in effect they were, had the enemies wisely used the advantage.

S. VI.

Of the negotiations and practices held between many States of Greece, by occasion of the Peace that was concluded.

THe admiration wherein all Greece held the valour of Sparta as irresistible, and able to make way through all impediments, had bin so excessive, that when by some sinister accidents, that Citie was compelled to take and seek peace, upon terms not founding very honourable, this common opinion was not only abated, but (as happens usually in things extreme) was changed into much contempt. For it was never thought that any Lacedæmonian would have endured to lay down his weapons, and yeeld himself prisoner, nor that any misfortune should have bin so great, as should have drawn that Citie to relieve it self otherwise than by force of Armes. But when once it had appeared that many of their Citizens, among whom were some of especial mark, being overlaid by enemies, in the Iland before Pylus, had rather chosen to live in captivity, than to die in fight; and that Pylus it self, sticking as a thorne in the foot of Læconia, had bred such anguish in that Estate, as utterly wearying the accustomed Spartan resolution, had made it sit down, and seek to refresh it self by dishonourable ease: then did not only the Corinthians and Thebans begin to conceive basely of those men which were vertuous, though unfortunate; but other lesse Cities joyning with these in the same opinion, did cast their eyes upon the rich and great Citie of Argos, of whose ability to doe much, they conceived a strong belief, because of long time it had done nothing. Such is the base condition, which through foolish envie is become almost naturall in the greater part of mankind. We curiously search into their vices, in whom, had they kept some distance, we should have discerned only the virtues; and comparing injuriously our best parts with their worst, are justly plagued with a false opinion of that good in strangers, which we know to be wanting in our selves.

The first that published their dislike of Sparta were the Corinthians, at whose vehement entreaty (though moved rather by envie at the greatnesse of Athens daily encreasing) the Lacedæmonians had entred into the present War. But these Corinthians did only mur-³⁰ mure at the peace, alleging as grievances, that some towns of theirs were left in the Athenians hands. The Mantineaes, who during the time of War, had procured some part of the Arcadians to become their followers, and forsake their dependancy upon the State of Sparta, did more freely and readily discover themselves; fear of revenge to come, working more effectually than indignation at things already past. The Argives feeling the gale of prosperous fortune that began to fill their sails, prepared themselves to take as much of it as they could stand under; giving for that purpose unto twelve of their Citizens a full and absolute commission to make alliance between them and any free Cities of Greece (Athens & Sparta excepted) without any further trouble of propounding every particular businesse to the multitude. When the gates of Argos were set thus open⁴⁰ to all commers, the Mantineaes began to lead the way, and many Cities of Peloponnesus following them, entred into this new confederacy; some incited by private respects, others thinking it the wisest way to doe as the most did. What inconvenience might arise unto them by these courses, the Lacedæmonians easily discerned; & therefore sent Embassadors to stop the matter at Corinth, where they well perceived that the mischief had bin hatched. These Embassadors found in the Corinthians a very rough disposition, with a gravity expressing the opinion which they had conceived of their present advantage over Sparta. They had caused all Cities which had not entred yet into alliance with Argos, to send their Agents to them, in whose presence they gave audience to the Lacedæmonians; the purport of whose Embasie was this: That the Corinthians, without breach of their oath, could not forsake the alliance which they had long since made with Sparta; and that reason did as well bind them to hold themselves contented with the peace lately made, as religion enforced them to continue in their ancient confederacy, forasmuch as it had bin agreed between the Spartans and their associates, that the consent of the greater part (which had yeilded unto peace with Athens) should bind the lesser number to performe what was concluded, if no divine impediment withstood them. Hereunto the Corinthians made answer, that the Spartans had first begun to doe them open wrong, in concluding the War wherein they had lost many places, without provision of restitution; and that the very clause alleged by the Embassadors, did acquit them from any necessity of subscribing to the late peace, forasmuch as they had sworn unto those people whom they perswaded to rebell against Athens, that they would never abandon them, nor willingly suffer them to fall again into the tyrannous hands of the Athenians. Wherefore they held themselves bound both in reason and religion to use all means of upholding those, whom by common consent they had taken into protection; for that an oath was no lesse to be accounted a divine impediment, than were pestilence, tempest, or any the like accident, hindring the performance of things undertaken. As for the alliance with Argos, they said that they would do as they should find cause. Having dismissed the Embassadors with this answer, they made haste to joyn¹⁰ themselves with Argos, and caused other States to do the like; so that Sparta and Athens were in a manner left to themselves, the Thebans and Megarians being also upon the point to have entred into this new confederacy. But as the affections were divers which caused this hasty confluence of sudden friends to Argos, it so likewise came to passe that the friendship it self, such as it was, had much diversity both of sincerity and of continuance. For some there were that hated or feared the Lacedæmonians, as the Mantineaes and Eleans; these did firmly betake themselves to the Argives, in whom they knew the same affection to be inveterate; others did only hate the peace concluded; and these would rather have followed the Spartans than the Argives in war, yet rather the Argives in war than the Lacedæmonians in peace. Of this number were the Corinthians, who knowing that the Thebans were affected like unto themselves, dealt with them to enter into the society of the Argives, as they had done: but the different formes of government, used in Thebes and Argos, caused the Thebans to hold rather with Sparta, that was ruled by the principall men, than to incur the danger of innovation, by joyning with such as committed the whole rule to the multitude.

This businesse having ill succeeded, the Corinthians began to bethink themselves of their own danger, who had not so much as any truce with Athens, and yet were unprepared for War. They sought therefore to come to some temporary agreement with the Athenians, and hardly obtained it. For the Athenians, who had dealt with all Greece at one time, did not greatly care to come to any appointment with one Citie that had shewed against them more stomach than force; but gave them to understand, that they might³⁰ be safe enough from them, if they would claim the benefit of that alliance, which Athens had lately made with Sparta and her dependants; yet finally they granted unto these Corinthians (which were loth to acknowledge themselves dependants of Sparta) the truce that they desired; but into private confederacie they would not admit them, being an article of the league between them and the Spartans, That the one should not make peace nor war without the other.

Herein, as in many other passages, may clearly be seen the great advantage which absolute Lords have, as well in Peace as in War, over such as are served by voluntaries. Wee shall hardly find any Signiorie, that hath been so constantly followed as Sparta was by so many States, and some of them little inferiour to it self, being all as free: whereas contrariwise, the Athenians had lately, and by compulsive means gotten their Dominion, wherein they demeaned themselves as Tyrants. But in performance of conditions agreed upon, the Athenians were able to make their words good, by excluding any State out of their Confederacie, and giving up such places as were agreed upon: of which the Lacedæmonians could do neither the one nor the other. For such Towns as their old Allies had gotten by their means in the late War, could not be restored without their consent, which had them in present possession; and particularly the Town of Panæse, which the Thebans held, could by no means be obtained from them by the Lacedæmonians (who earnestly desired it, that by restitution thereof unto the Athenians, as earnestly demanding it, themselves might recover Pylus) unless that they would⁵⁰ agree to make a private alliance with Thebes; which thereupon they were constrained to doe, though knowing it to be contrary to the last agreement between them and Athens.

The Lacedæmonians having broken one article of the league made between them and the Athenians, that by so doing they might enable themselves to the performance of another, were shamefully disappointed of their hopes by the Thebans, who did not give up the town of Panæse, till first they had utterly demolished it, and made it of no worth to the Athenians. This was sought to have been excused by the Lacedæmonian Embassadors, who coming to Athens (whither they had sent home all prisoners that had been detained at Thebes) hoping with gentle words to save the matter, saying, That from henceforth no enemy of Athens should nestle in Panaſſe, for it was destroyed. But these Embassadors had not to deal with tame fools. For the Athenians told them in plain termes, That of three principall conditions agreed upon in their late League, they had not performed any one, but used such base conclusions as stood not with their honour: having made private alliance with the Thebans; having destroyed a Town that they should have restored; and not having forced their dependants by Warre, to make good the Covenants of the late concluded peace. Hereupon they dismissed the Embassadors with rough words, meaning with as rough deeds to anger those that sent them.

There were at that time both in Athens and Sparta, many that were ill-contented with the peace: among whom were the Ephori, chosen for that year, in Sparta; and Alcibiades, a powerfull young Gentleman in Athens. But the Ephori, though desiring to renew the War, yet wished that first they might get from the Athenians as much as was to be redred to them by Covenant, especially Pylus that had so sorely troubled them. Alcibiades, whose Nobility, riches and favour with the people, made him desire War, as the mean whereby himself might procure some honourable employment; used all means to stir the quarrel on foot, whilst the Athenians had yet both advantage enough, as not having rendered ought save their prisoners, and pretence enough to use that advantage of breaking the peace, by reason that the Lacedæmonians (though indeed against their wills) had broken all Covenants with them. Now the State of Athens had fully determined to retain Pylus, and to perform nothing that the Lacedæmonians should, and might requit, untill they had first, without any longer halting, fulfilled all articles whereto they were bound, even to the utmost point. This was enough to make them swear, who having already done the most that they could, had as yet got nothing in recompence, except the delivery of their Citizens, which were prisoners. But Alcibiades wishing a speedy beginning of open war, sent privily to the Argives, and gave them to understand how fitly the time served for them to associate themselves with Athens, which was enough to give them security against all enemies.

The Argives, upon the first confluence of many Estates unto their society, had embraced great hopes of working wonders, as if they should have had the conduct of all Greece against the Athenians, robbing Sparta of that honour, as having ill used it, and thereby leaving their old enemies in case of much contempt and disability. But these sudden apprehensions of vain joy, were suddenly changed into as vain fear; which ill agreed with the great opinion that had lately bin conceived of Argos. For when the Thebans had refused their alliance; when the Corinthians had sought security from Athens; and when a false rumour was noysed abroad, Athens, Thebes and Sparta, were come to a full agreement upon all points of difference; then began the Argives to let fall their crests, and sue for peace unto the Lacedæmonians, who needing it as much as they, or more, yet held their gravity, and were not over-hasty to accept it. At this time, and in this perturbation, the message of Alcibiades came very welcome to the Argives, which were now consulting how to become the chief of all others, but how to save themselves. Wherefore they sent away presently to Athens, their own Embassadors, accompanied with the Mantineans and Eleans, to make a league offensive and defensive between their Estates and the Athenians.

Of this business the Lacedæmonians knew not what to think: for well they saw, that such a combination tended to their great hurt, and therefore were desirous to prevent it, but to keep the love of the Athenians, the new Ephori thought that more was already done, than stood with their honour or profit; others held it the wisest way, having done so much, not to stick upon a little more, but rather by giving full satisfaction, to retain the friendship of that State, which was more to be valued than all the rest of Greece. This resolution prevailing, they sent away such of their Citizens as were best affected to the peace, who coming to Athens, with full commission to make an end of all controversies, did earnestly labour in the Councell-house, to make the truth of things appear, saying, That their Confederacy with the Thebans had tended to none other end than the recovery of Panaſſe: concerning which Town, or any other business, that it much grieved ved the Lacedæmonians, to see things fall out in such wise as might give to the Athenians cause of displeasure; but that all should be done which in reason might be required for making matters even between them; to which purpose they shewed that themselves had absolute commission. Wherefore they desired that Pylus might be restored to them, and especially for the present, that the negotiation with the Argives might be called aside. Favourable audience was given to this proposition, the rather, because they which promised amends, had power to make their words good. But all this fair likelihood of good agreement was dashed on the sudden, by the practice of Alcibiades, who, secretly dealing with the Lacedæmonian Embassadors, perswaded them well of his friendship towards their Citie, and advised them to take all care that their absolute power to conclude what they pleased in the name of Sparta, might not be known to the Communitie of Athens, lest the insolent multitude should thereupon grow peremptorie and yeeld to nothing, unless they could draw them to unreasonable conditions. The Embassadors beleevied him, and fashioned their tale in the assemblie of the people, as he had advised them. Hereupon the same Alcibiades taking presently the advantage, which their double dealing afforded, inveighed openly against them, as men of no sinceritie, that were come to Athens for no other purpose, than to hinder the people from strengthening themselves with friends, meaning to draw the Argives and their Adherents to their own alliance, as (contrary to their own Oath) already they had the Thebans. The people of Athens, whom a pleasing errand would very hardly have satisfied, or brought into a good opinion of the Lacedæmonians; (whose honest meanings had so ill been seconded, with good performance) were now so much incensed with the double dealing of the Embassadors, and the strong perswasions of Alcibiades, that little wanted of concluding the league with Argos. Yet for the present so farre did Nicias, an honourable Citizen, and great friend to the peace, prevail with them, that the business was put off, untill he himself, with other Embassadors, might fetch a better answer from Sparta.

It may also seem a great wonder, how so poor a trick of Alcibiades was able to carry a matter of so great importance, when the Spartan Embassadors might have cast the load upon his own shoulders, by discovering the truth. But the gravitie which was usually found in the Lacedæmonians, hindered them (perhaps) from playing their game handsomely against so nimble a wit; and they might well have been thought untrusty men, had they professed themselves such as would say and un-say for their most advantage.

Nicias and his Companions had a sov're message to deliver at Sparta, being peremptorily to require performance of all conditions, and among the rest, that the Lacedæmonians should take the pains to re-build Panaſſe, and should immediately renounce their Alliance made with the Thebans; letting them understand, that otherwise the Athenians, without further delay, would enter into confederacie with the Argives, and their adherents. The Ephori at Sparta had no mind to forsake the Thebans, assured friends to their State; but wrought so hard, that the anger of the Athenians was suffered to break out what way it could, which to mitigate, they would doe no more, than only (at the request of Nicias their honourable friend, who would not seem to have needed nothing) swear a new to keep the Articles of the league between him and Athens. Immediately therefore upon return of the Embassadors, a new league was made between the Athenians, Argives, Mantineans, and Eleans, with very ample provision for holding the same common friends and enemies; wherein, though the Lacedæmonians were passed over with silence, yet was it manifest that the whole intent of this confederacie did bend it self chiefly against them, as in short while after was proved by effect.

At this time the Lacedæmonians were in ill case, who having restored all that they could unto the Athenians, and procured others to doe the like, had themselves recovered nothing of their own (prisoners excepted) for default of restoring all that they should. But that which did most of all disable them, was the losse of reputation, which they had not more impaired in the late Warre by misfortunes, than in sundry passages between them and the Athenians: to procure and keep whose Amicitie, they had left sundry of their own friends to shift for themselves. Contrariwise, the Athenians by the treatie of peace, had recovered the most part of that which they lost in warre;

all their gettings they had retained; and were strengthened by the access of new Confederates.

How the peace between Athens and Sparta was ill kept, though not openly broken.

IT was not long ere the Argives and their fellowes had found businesse wherewith to set the Athenians on work, and make use of this conjunction. For, presuming upon the strength of their side, they began to meddle with the Epidaurians whom it concerned the State of Sparta to defend. So, many acts of hostilitie were committed, wherein Athens and Sparta did (as principals) infest each the other; but came in collaterally, as to the aid of their severall friends.

By these occasions the Corinthians, Boeotians, Phocians, Locrians, and other people of Greece, began a-new to range themselves under the Lacedemonians, and follow their ensignes. One victorie which the Lacedemonians obtained by their meere valour in a set battell, neer to Mantineæ, against the Argive-side, helped well to repair their decayed reputation; though otherwise it yielded them no great profit. The civill dissention arising shortly after within Argos it self, between the principall Citizens and the Commonions, had almost thrown down the whole frame of the new combination. For the chief Citizens getting the upper hand, made a league with Sparta, wherein they proceeded so farre as to renounce the amitie of the Athenians in expresse words; and forced the Mantineans to the like. But in short space of time the multitude prevailing, reversed all this, and having chased away their ambitious Nobilitie applied themselves to the Athenians as closely as before.

Besides these uprores in Peloponnesus, many affaies were made to raise up troubles in all parts of Greece, and likewise in Macedon, to the Athenians, whose forces and readines for execution, prevented some things, revenged other, and requited all with some prosperous attempts. Finally, the Athenians wanting matter of quarrell, and the Lacedemonians growing wearie, they began to be quiet; retaining still that enmitie in their hearts, which they had sufficiently discovered in effects, though not yet breaking out into terms of open Warre.

S. VIII.

The Athenians sending two Fleets to sack Siracuse, are put to flight, and utterly discomfited.

DURING this intermission of open War, the Athenians re-entertained their hopes of subduing Sicil, whither they sent a Fleet so mightie, as never was set forth by Greece in any Age before or after.

This Fleet was very well manned, and furnished with all necessaries to so great an expedition, All which came to nought, partly by the factions in Athens, whence Alcibiades, Author of that voyage, and one of the Generalls of their Fleet, was driven to banish himself, for fear of such judgement, as else he was like to have undergone among the incensed people; partly by the invasion which the Lacedemonians made upon Attica; whilest the forces of that State were so far from home. Hereunto was added the aid of the King of Persia, who supplied the Peloponnesians with money.

Neither was the successe of things in Sicilia such, as without help from Athens, could give any likelihood of a good end in that war. For although in the beginning, the enterprise had so well succeeded, that they besieged Siracuse, the chief Citie of all the Iland, and one of the fairest Towns which the Greeks inhabited, obtaining the better in sundrie battels by Land and Sea; yet when the Town was relieved with strong aid from Peloponnesus, it came to pass that the Athenians were put to the worse on all sides, in such wise that their Fleet was shut up into the haven of Siracuse, and could not issue out.

As the Athenian affairs went very ill in Sicil, so did they at home stand upon her terms, for that the Lacedemonians, who had been formerly accustomed to make wearisome yearly journeys into Attica, which having pilld and foraged, they returned home; did now by counsell of Alcibiades (who seeking revenge upon his own Citizens, was fled unto them) fortifie the Town of Decelia, which was near to Athens, whence they ceased not with daily excursions to harry all the Country round about, and sometimes give alarme unto the City it self. In these extremities, the perverse obstinacy of the Athenians was very strange, who leaving at their backs, and at their own doores, an enemy little lesse mighty than themselves, did yet send forth another fleet into Sicil, to invade a people no lesse puissant, which had never offended them.

It often happens, that a prosperous event makes foolish counsell seem wiser than it was, which came to passe many times among the Athenians, whose vain conceits Pallas was said to turn unto the best. But where unsound advice, finding bad proof, is obstinately pursued, neither Pallas nor Fortune can be justly blamed for a miserable issue. This second Fleet of the Athenians, which better might have served to convey home the former that was defeated, after some attempts made to small purpose against the Siracuzans, was finally (together with the other part of the Navie, which was there before) quite vanquished, and bard up into the haven of Siracuse, whereby the camp of the Athenians, utterly deprived of all benefit by Sea, either for succour or departure, was driven to break up, and flye away by land; in which flight they were over-taken, routed, and quite overthrown, in such wise that scarce any man escaped.

This mischiefe well deserved fell upon the Athenians, who had wickedly condemned to exile Sophocles and Pheidon Generals, formerly sent into that Ile, pretending that they had taken money for making peace in Sicil, whereas indeed there was not any means or possibility to have made War. Hereby it came to passe, that Nicias, who had the chief command in this unhappy enterprise, did rather choose to hazard the ruin of his Country by the losse of that Army, wherein consisted little lesse than all the power of Athens, than to adventure his own estate, his life, and his honour, upon the tongues of shamelesse accusers, and the sentence of Judges before his tryall resolved to condemn him, by retiring from Siracuse, when wisdom and necessity required it. For (said he) they shall give sentence upon us, who know not the reason of our doings; nor would give ear to any that would speak in our behalf; but altogether hearken to suspicious and vain rumors, so that shall be brought against us; yet these our Souldiers who now are so desirous to return in safety, will in our danger be well contented to frame their votes to the pleasure of the lewd and insolent multitude.

This resolution of Nicias, though it cannot be commended (for it is the part of an honest and valiant man to doe what reason willeth, not what opinion expecteth; and to measure honour or dishonour by the assurance of his well-informed conscience, rather than by the malicious report and censure of others) yet it may be excused; since he had before his eyes the injustice of his people, and had well understood that a wicked sentence is infinitely worse than a wicked fact; as being held a president and pattern whereby oppression beginning upon one, is extended as warrantable upon all. Therefore his fear of wrongfull condemnation was such, as a constant man could not easily have overcome; but when afterwards the Army, having no other expectation of safety than the faint hope of a secret flight, he was so terrified with an Eclipse of the Moon, happening when they were about to dislodge, that he would not consent to have the camp break up till seven and twenty daies were past. His timorousnesse was even as foolish and ridiculous, as the issue of it was lamentable. For he should not have thought that the power of the Heavens, and the course of Nature would be as unjust as his Athenians, or might pretend lesse evill to the slothfull, than to such as did their best. Neither doe I think that any Astrologer can allege this Eclipse, as either a cause or prognostication of that Armes destruction, otherwise than as the folly of men did, by application, turn it to their own confusion. Had C. Cassius the Roman, he who slew Julius Caesar, imitated this superstition of Nicias, he had surely found the same fortune in a case very like. But when, he retrying the broken remainder of Cassius his Army defeated by the Parthian Archers, was advised, upon such an accident as this, to continue where he then was, till the Sun were past the sign of Scorpio; he made answer, that he stood not in such fear of Scorpio, as of Sagittarius. So adventuring rather to abide the frowning of the Heavens, than the nearer danger of Enemies upon earth, he made such a safe and honourable retreat, as did both shew his noble resolution, and give a fair example to that good rule,

Thus we see that God, who ordinarily works by a concatenation of means, deprives the Governours of understanding, when he intends evil to the multitude; and that the wickedness of unjust men is the ready mean to weaken the virtue of those who might have done them good.

S. IX.

Of the troubles wherinto the State of Athens fell, after the great losse of the Fleet, and Armie in Sicilia.

THE losse of this Armie was the ruin of the Athenian Dominion, and may be well accounted a very little lesse calamitie to that Estate, than was the subversion of the walls, when the Citie about seaven years after was taken by Lysander. For now began the subjects of the Athenian Estate to rebel, of whom, some they reduced under their obedience, others held out; some for fear of greater inconvenience were set at libertie, promising only to be their good friends, as formerly they had been their Subjects; others having a kind of libertie offered by the Athenians, were not therewith contented, but obtained a true and perfect libertie by force. Among these troubles it fell out very unseasonably, that the principall men of Athens, being wearied with the peoples insolencie, took upon them to change the forme of that Estate; and bring the government into the hands of a few. To which purpose conspiring with the Captains which were abroad, they caused them to set up the forme of an Aristocracie in the Towns of their Confederates; and in the mean time, some that were most likely to withstand this innovation, being slain at Athens, the Commonaltie were so dismayed, that none durst speak against the Conspirators, whose number they knew not, but every man was afraid of his neighbour, lest he should be a member of the league. In this generall fear the Majestie of Athens was usurped by four hundred men, who observing in shew the ancient form of proceeding, did cause all matters to be propounded unto the people, and concluded upon by the greater part of voices: but the things propounded were only such as were first allowed in private among themselves; neither had the Commonaltie any other libertie, than only to approve and give consent: for whosoever presumed any further, was quickly dispatched out of the way, and no inquisition made of the murder. By these means were many Decrees made, all tending to the establishment of this new authoritie, which nevertheless endured not long. For the Fleet and Armie which then was in the Isle of Samos did altogether detest these dealings of the four hundred; usurpers, and held them as Enemies; whereupon they revoked Alcibiades out of banishment, and by his assistance procured that the supplies which the Persian King had promised to the Lacedemonians, were by Tissaphernes his Lieutenant, made unprofitable, through the slow and bad performance. Alcibiades had at the first been very well entertained in Sparta, whilest his service done unto that State was not grown to be the object of envie. But when it appeared that in Counsell and good performance he so far excelled all the Lacedemonians, that all their good success was attributed to his wit and valour, then were all the principall Citizens wearie of his virtue; especially Agis one of their Kings, whose wife had so far yeilded her self to the love of this Athenian, that among her inward friends she could not forbear to call her young child by his name. Hereupon order was taken, that Alcibiades should be killed out of the way. But he discovering the Spartan treacherie, conveyed himself unto Tissaphernes, whom he so bewitched with his great beautie, sweet conversation, and sound wit, that he soon became the Master of that barbarous Vice-roys affections, who had free power to dispose the great Kings Treasures and Forces in those parts. Then began he to advise Tissaphernes, not so far forth to assist the Lacedemonians, that they should quite overthrow the State of Athens, but rather to help the weaker side, and let them one consume another, whereby all should fall at length into the hands of the Persian. By this counsell he made way to other practices, wherein by strength of his reputation (as the only Favourite of so great a Potentate) he played his own game, procuring his restitution. At length his banishment being repealed by the Armie, but not by the Citizens (who then were oppressed by the four hundred) he laboured greatly to reconreconcile the Souldiers to the Governours; or at least to divert their heat another way, and turn it upon the common Enemy. Some of the four hundred approved his motion, as being wearie of the tyrannic whereof they were partakers, partly because they saw it could not long endure, and partly for that themselves, being lesse regarded by the rest of their companions, than stood with their good liking, sought to acquit themselves of it as honestly as they might. But the most of that Faction laboured to obtain peace of the Lacedemonians, desiring chiefly to maintain both their own authoritie, and the greatness of their City, if they might: but if this could not be, they did rather wish to preserve their own power, or safe at least, than the good Estate of the Common-wealth. Therefore they made sundry overtures of peace to the Lacedemonians, desiring to compound in as good termes as they might, and affirming that they were fitter to be trusted than the wavering multitude, especially considering that the City of Sparta was governed by an Aristocracie, to which form they had now reduced Athens. All these passages between the four hundred (or the most and chiefe of them) and the Lacedemonians, were kept as secret as might be. For the City of Athens, hoping, without any great cause, to repair their losses, was not inclined to make composition, from which upon juster ground the Enemy was much more averse, trusting well that the discord of the Athenians (not unknown abroad) might yeeld some fair opportunitie to the destruction of it self, which in effect (though not then presently) came to passe. And upon this hope King Agis did sometimes bring his forces from Decelea to Athens, where doing no good, he received some small losses. Likewise the Navie of Peloponnesus made shew of attempting the City, but seeing no likelihood of success, they bent their course from thence to other places, where they obtained victories, which in the better fortune of the Athenians might more lightly have bin regarded, than in this their decayed estate. Yet it seems, without any disparagement to their wisdom, they should rather have forborne to present unto the Citie, or to the countries neer adjoining, any terror of the war. For the dissention within the walls might soon have done more good than could be received from the fleet or army without, which indeed gave occasion to set the Citizens at unity, though it lasted not very long. The four hundred, by means of these troubles, were faine to resign their authority, which they could not now hold, when the people, having taken arms to repell foreign Enemies, would not lay them down, till they had freed themselves from such as oppressed the State at home. Yet was not this alteration of government a full restitution of the sovereign command unto the people, or whole body of the City; but only to five thousand; which company the four hundred (when their authoritie began) had pretended to take unto them as assistants: herein seeming to do little wrong or none to the commonalty, who seldom assembled in greater number. But now when the highest power was come indeed into the hands of so many, it was soon agreed, that Alcibiades and his companions should be recalled from exile, and that the army at Samos should be requested to undertake the government: which was forthwith reformed according to the Souldiers desire.

How Alcibiades won many important victories for the Athenians; was recalled from exile; made their General, and again deposed.

THIS establishment of things in the Citie, was accompanied with some good success in the wars. For the Lacedemonians were about the same time overthrown at Sea, in a great battell, by the Athenian Fleet, which had remained at Samos, to which Alcibiades afterwards joyning such forces as he could raise, obtained many victories. Before the Town of Abydos, his arrivall with eighteen ships, gave the honour of a great battell to the Athenians; he overthrew and utterly destroyed the fleet of the Lacedemonians, commanded by Mindarus; took the Towns of Cyzicus and Perinthus, made the Selymbrians ransome their Citie, and fortified Chrysopolis. Hereupon letters were sent to Sparta, which the Athenians intercepting, found to contain the distress of the Armie, in these few words: All is lost; Mindarus is slain; the Souldiers want victuals; we know not what to doe.

Shortly after this, Alcibiades overthrew the Lacedemonians in fight by land at Chalcedon, took Selymbria, besieged and won Byzantium, now called Constantinople, which even in those dayes was a goodly, rich, and very strong City. Hereupon he returned home with very great welcome, and was made high Admirall of all the Navie.

But this his honour continued not long, for it was taken from him, and he driven to banish himself again, only because his Lieutenant, contrary to the expresse command of Alcibiades, fighting with the enemies in his absence, had lost a great part of the Fleet.

The second banishment of Alcibiades was to the Athenians more harmful than the first, and the losse which thereupon they received, was (though more heavy to them, yet) lesse to be pittied of others, than that which ensued upon his former exile. For whereas at the first, he had sought revenge upon his own Citie; now, as injured to adverstie, he rather pittied their furie, who in time of such danger had cast out him that should have repaired to their weak estate, than sought by procuring or beholding the calamitie of his people, to comfort himself after injurie received. Before they, who were instituted in the place of Alcibiades, arrived at the Fleet, he presented battel to Lyfander the Lacedemonian Admirall, who was not so confident upon his former victorie, as to undertake Alcibiades himself, bringing ships more in number (notwithstanding the former losse of fifteen) than his enemies had, and better ordered than they had been under his Lieutenant. But when the decree of the people was published in the Navie, then did Alcibiades withdraw himself to a Town upon Hellefpont, called Bizante, where he had built a Castle.

The battell at Arginusæ, and condemnation of the victorious Athenian Captains by the people.

After this time, the Athenians receiving many losses and discomfitures, were driven to flye into the Haven of Mytelene, where they were straitly besieged both by Land and Sea. For the raising of this siege necessitie enforced them to man all their vessels, and to put the uttermost of their forces into the hazzard of one battel. This Battell was fought at Arginusæ, where Callicraditus, Admirall of the Lacedemonians, losing the honour of the day, preserved his own reputation by dying valiantly in the fight. It might well have bin expected, that the ten Captains, who joyntly had command in chief over the Athenian fleet, should for that good daies service, and so happy a victory, have received great honour of their Citizens. But contrariwise, they were forthwith called home, and accused, as if wilfully they had suffered many of the Citizens, whose ships were broken and sunk, to be cast away, when by appointing some Vessels to take them up, they might have saved them from being drowned. Hereto the Captains readily made a very just answer, That they pursuing the victorie, had left part of the fleet, under sufficient men, to save those that were wrackt; which if it were not well accomplished, it was, because a tempest arising about the end of the fight, had hindred the performance of that, and other their intentions. This excuse availed not: For a lewd fellow was brought forth, who said, That he himself escaping in a meal-tub, had bin intreated by those who were in perill of drowning, to desire of the people revenge of their deaths upon the Captains. It was very strange, that upon such an accusation maintained with so slender evidence, men that had well deserved of their Countrey should be overthrown. But their enemies had so incensed the rascall multitude, that no man durst absolve them, save onely Socrates the wise and vertuous Philosopher, whose voice in this judgement was not regarded. Six of them were put to death, of whom one had hardly escaped drowning, and was with much ado relieved by other vessels in the storm: but the Captains which were absent escaped; for when the furie of the people was overpast, this judgement was reversed, and the accusers called into question for having deceived and perverted the Citizens. Thus the Athenians went about to free themselves from the infamie of injustice, but the divine Justice was not asleep, nor would be so deluded.

The battell at Egos-Potamos, wherein the whole State of Athens was ruined, with the end of the Peloponnesian war.

The Peloponnesian fleet under Lyfander, the year next following, having scoured the Aegean Seas, entered Hellefpont, where (landing souldiers) it besieged and took the town of Lampsacus. Hereupon all the navie of Athens, being an hundred and fourscore sail, made thither in haste, but finding Lampsacus taken before their coming, they put in at Sestos, where having refreshed themselves, they sailed to the river called Egos-Potamos, which is (as we might name it) Goats-Brook, or the river of the Goat, being on the continent opposite to Lampsacus: and there they cast Anchors, not one whole league off from Lyfander, who rode at Lampsacus in the harbor. The next day after their arrival they presented fight unto the Peloponnesians, who refused it, whereupon the Athenians returned again to Egos-Potamos; and thus they continued five daies, braving every day the Enemy, and returning to their own harbor when it drew towards evening.

The Castle of Alcibiades was not far from the Navie, and his power in those places was such as might have greatly availed his countymen, if they could have made use of it. For he had waged mercenaries, and making war in his own name upon some people of the Thracians, had gathered much wealth, and obtained much reputation among them. Hee perceiving the disorderly course of the Athenian Commanders, repaired unto them, and shewed what great inconvenience might grow, if they did not soon fore-see and prevent it. For they lay in a rude subject to every weather; neither neer enough to any town where they might furnish themselves with necessaries, nor so far off as had bin more expedient. Sestos was the next Market-town; thither both Souldiers and Mariners resorted, flocking away from the Navie every day, as soon as they were returned from braving the Enemy. Therefore Alcibiades willed them either to lie at Sestos, which was not far off, or at least to consider how neer their Enemy was, whose fear proceeded rather from obedience to their Generall, than from any cowardise. This admonition was so far despised, that some of the Commanders willed him to meddle with his own matters, and to remember that his autoritie was out of date. Had it not bin for these opprobrious words, he could (as he told his familiars) have compelled the Lacedemonians, either to fight upon unequal terms, or utterly to quit their Fleet. And like enough it was that he might so have done by transporting the light-armed Thracians, his confederates, and others his Followers, over the Streights, who assaulking the Peloponnesians by Land, would either have compelled them to put to Sea, or else to leave their ships to the mercy of the Athenians. But finding their acceptance of his good counsell no better than hath bin rehearsed, he left them to their fortune, which how evill it would be he did prognosticate.

Lyfander all this while defending himself by the advantage of his Haven, was not carelesse in looking into the demeanour of the Athenians. When they departed, his manner was to send forth some of his swiftest Vessels after them, who observing their doings, related unto him what they had seen. Therefore understanding in what carelesse fashion they romed up and down the country; he kept all his men aboard after their departure, and the first day gave especiall charge to his Scouts, that when they perceived the Athenians dis-embarking, as their custome was, and walking towards Sestos, they should forthwith return, and hang up a brazen shield in the Prow, as a token for him to weigh Anchor.

The Scouts performed their charge, and Lyfander being in a readinesse, made all speed that strength of Oars could give, to Egos-Potamos, where he found very few of his enemies aboard their ships, nor many neer them, and all in great confusion upon the newes of his approach.

Insomuch that the greatest industrie which the Athenians then shewed, was in the escape of eight or nine ships, which knowing how much that losse imported, gave over Athens as desperate, and made a long flight into the Isle of Cyprus; all the rest were taken, and such of the Souldiers as came in to the rescue cut in pieces. Thus was the war which had lasted seven and twenty years, with variable successe, concluded in one hour, and the glory of Athens in such wise eclipsed, that she never afterward shone in her perfect light.

Immediately upon this victory, Lyfander, having taken such Towns as readily did yeeld yeeld upon the first fame of his exploit, set sail for Athens, and joyning his forces with those of Agis and Pausanias, Kings of Sparta, summoned the City; which finding too stubborn to yeeld, and too strong to be won on the sudden, he put forth again to Sea; and rather by terrour than violence, compelling all the Ilands, and such Towns of the Ionians as had formerly held of the Athenians, to submit themselves to Sparta, he did thereby cut off all provision of victuals, and other necessaries, from the City, & enforced the people by meer famine to yeeld to these conditions: That the long walls, leading from the Town to the Port, should be thrown down; That all Cities subject to their Emper, should be set at libertie; That the Athenians should be Masters only of their own Territories, and the fields adjoyning to their Town; And that they should keep no more than twelve Ships; That they should hold as Friends or Enemies, the same, whom the Lacedemonians did, and follow the Lacedemonians as Leaders in the wars.

These Articles being agreed upon, the walls were thrown down with great rejoycing of those who had born displeasure to Athens, and not without some consultation of destroying the City, and laying waste the Land about it. Which advice, although it was not entertained, yet were thirty Governours, or rather cruell Tyrants, appointed over the people, who recompenced their former insolencie and injustice over their Captains by oppressing them with all base and intolerable slavery.

The only small hope then remaining to the Athenians, was, that Alcibiades might perhaps repair what their own folly had ruined. But the thirtie Tyrants perceiving this, advertised the Lacedemonians thereof, who contrived, and (as now domineering in every quarter) soon effected his sudden death.

Such end had the Peloponnesian war. After which the Lacedemonians abusing the reputation, and great power, which therein they had obtained, grew very odious to Greece, and by combination of many Cities against them, were dispossessed of their high authority, even in that very age in which they had subdued Athens. The greatest foil that they took was of the Thebans led by Epaminondas, under whom Philip of Macedon, father to Alexander the Great, had the best of his education. By these Thebans, the City of Sparta (besides other great losses received) was sundrie times in danger of being taken. But these haughtie attempts of the Thebans came finally to nothing, for the severall Estates and Signories of Greece, were grown so jealous one of anothers greatness, that the Lacedemonians, Athenians, Argives, and Thebans, which were the mightiest, associating themselves with the weaker partie, did so counterpoize the stronger, that no one City could extend the limits of her jurisdiction so far as might make her terrible to her neighbours. And thus all parts of the Country remained rather evenly ballanced, than well agreeing, till such time as Philip, and after him Alexander, Kings of Macedon, (whose forefathers had been dependants, and followers, yea almost meer Vassals to the Estates of Athens and Sparta) found means, by making use of their factions, to bring them all into servitude, from which they never could be free, till the Romans presenting them with a shew of libertie, did themselves indeed become their Masters.

CHAP. IX.

Of matters concurring with the Peloponnesian Warre, or shortly following it.

S. I.

How the affaires of Perfia stood in those times.

During the times of this Peloponnesian War, and those other lesse expeditions foregoing it, Artaxerxes Longimanus, having peaceably enjoyed a long reign over the Perfians, left it by his death either to Darius, who was called Darius Nothus, or the Bastard, whom the Greek Historians (lightly passing over Xerxes the second, and Sogdianus, as usurpers, and for their short reign little to be regarded) place next unto them, or to Xerxes the second; who, and his brother Sogdianus after him (seeming to have have bin the sons of Hester) held the Kingdome but one year between them, the younger succeeding his elder brother. It is not my purpose (as I have said before) to pursue the historie of the Perfians from henceforth, by rehearfall of all the particulars, otherwise than as they shall be incident to the affairs of Greece. It may therefore suffice to say, That Sogdianus the second, being a vicious Prince, did perish after a month or two, if not by himself, then by the trecherie of his riotous brother Sogdianus. Likewise of Sogdianus it is found, that being as ill as his brother, and more cruell, he slew unjustly Bagoas a principall Eunuch, and would have done as much to his brother Darius the Bastard, had not he fore-seen it, and by raising a stronger army than this hated King Sogdianus could leave, seized at once upon the King and Kingdome. Darius having slain his brother, held the Empire nineteen years. Amyrtaeus of Sais an Egyptian rebelled against him, and having partly slain, partly chased out of the Land the Perfian Garrisons, allied himself firmly with the Greeks, that by their aid he maintained the Kingdome, and delivered it over to his posteritie, who (notwithstanding the fury of their civill Wars) maintained it against the Perfians, all the days of this Darius, and of his son Artaxerxes Mnemon. Likewise Amorges, a Subject of his own, and of the Royall blood, being Lieutenant of Caria, rebelled against him; confederating himself with the Athenians. But the great calamitie, before spoken of, which fell upon the Athenians in Sicily, having put new life into the Spartians, and given courage to the Ilanders and others, subject to the State of Athens, to shake off the yoke of their long continued bondage, It fell out well for Darius, that the Lacedemonians being destitute of money, wherewith to defray the charge of a great navie, without which it was impossible to advance the war against the State of Athens, that remained powerfull by sea, were driven to crave his assistance, which he granted unto them, first upon what conditions best pleased himself, though afterwards the Articles of the league between him and them were set down in more precise termes; wherein it was concluded, That he and they should make war jointly upon the Athenians, and upon all that should rebell from either of them, and (which was highly to the Kings honour and profit) that all the Cities of Asia, which had formerly bin his, or his predecessors, should returne to his obedience. By this Treatie, and the war ensuing (of which I have already spoken) he recovered all that his grandfather and father had lost in Asia. Likewise by assistance of the Lacedemonians, he got Amorges alive into his hands, who was taken in the citie of Jafus, the Athenians wanting either force or courage to succore him. Nevertheless Egypt still held out against him; the cause wherof cannot be the impeachment of the Perfian forces on the parts of Greece: for he abounded in men, of whom he had enough for all occasions, but they wanted manhood, which caused him to fight with gold; which effected for him by Souldiers of other nations, and his naturall enemies, what the valour of his own Subjects was insufficient to perform. Darius had in marriage Parysatis his own sister, who bare unto him (besides other children) Artaxerxes called Mnemon, that is to say, the Mindfull, or the Rememberer, who succeeded him in the Kingdom; and Cyrus the younger, a Prince of singular vertue, and accounted by all that knew him, the most excellent man that ever Perfia bred after Cyrus the Great. But the old King Darius, intending to leave unto his elder son Artaxerxes the inheritance of that great Empire, did cast a jealous eye upon the doings of young Cyrus, who being Lieutenant of the lower Asia, took more upon him than befitted a Subject: for which cause his father sent for him, with intent to have taken some very sharp course with him, had not his own death prevented the coming of his younger son, and placed the elder in his Throne. Of the war between these brethren, and summarily of Artaxerxes, we shall have occasion to speak somewhat in more convenient place.

S. II.

How the thirtie Tyrants got their Dominion in Athens.

Hold it in this place very convenient to shew the proceedings of the Greeks, after the subversion of the walls of Athens, which gave end to that war called the Peloponnesian war, but could not free the unhappy Country of Greece from civill broils. The thirtie Governours, commonly called the thirtie Tyrants of Athens, were chosen at the first by the people to compile a body of their law, and make a collection of such such ancient Statutes, as were meet to be put in practice: the condition of the Citie standing as it did in that so sudden alteration. To this charge was annexed the supreme authority, either as a recompence of their labours, or because the necessity of the times did so require it, wherein the Law being uncertain, it was fit that such men should give judgment in particular causes, to whose judgment the Laws themselves, by which the Citie was to be ordered, were become subject. But these thirtie, having so great power in their hands, were more carefull to hold it, than to deserve it by faithfull execution of that which was committed to them in trust.

Therefore apprehending such troublesome fellows as were odious to the Citie, though not punishable therefore by law, they condemned them to death; which proceeding was by all men highly approved, who considered their low conditions, but did not without bethink themselves, how easie a thing it would be unto these thirtie men, to take away the lives of Innocents, by calling them perturbors of the peace; or when they lifted, when condemnation without true trial and proof had been once well allowed. Having thus plausibly entred into a wicked course of government, they thought it best to fortifie themselves with a sure guard, ere they brake out into those disorders, which they must needs commit for the establishing of their authority. Wherefore dispatching two of their own companies to Sparta, they informed the Lacedemonians, that it was the full intent of the thirtie, to keep the Citie free from all rebellious motions: to which purpose it behoved them to cut off such as were seditious; and therefore desired the Lacedemonians to send them a Garrison, which they promised at their own cost to maintain. This motion was well approved, and a Guard sent, the Captain of which was so well entertained by the thirtie, that none of their misdeeds could want his high commendations at Sparta. Hereupon the Tyrants began to take heart, and looking no more after base and detested persons, invaded the principall men of the Citie, sending armed men from house to house, who drew out such as were of great reputation, and likely, or able to make any head against this wicked forme of government: whereby there was such effusion of blood, as to Theramenes (one of the thirtie) seemed very horrible, and unable to escape vengeance. His dislike of their proceedings being openly discovered, caused his fellows to bethink themselves, and provide for their own security; and his destruction, lest he should make himself a Captain of the discontented (which were almost the whole Citie) and redeem his own peace with their ruin. Wherefore they selected three thousand of the Citizens, whom they thought meetest, and gave unto them some part of publick authority, the rest they disarmed; and having thus increased their own strength, and weakened their opposites, they began a-fresh to shed the blood, not only of their private enemies, but of such whose money, or goods, might enrich them, and enable them for the payment of their guard. And to this purpose they concluded, that every one of them should name one man, upon whose goods he should sieze, putting the owner to death. But when Theramenes uttered his detestation of so wicked intent, then did Critias, who of all the thirtie was most tyrannical, accuse him to the Councell, as a treacherous man, & whereas one main privilege of the three thousand was, that none of them should suffer death at the appointment of the thirtie, but have the accustomed trial; he took upon him to strike out of that number the name of Theramenes, & so reduced him under the trial & sentence of that order. It was well alleged by Theramenes, that his name was not more easie to be blotted out of the catalogue, than any other mans; upon which consideration, he advised them all to conceive no otherwise of his case, than as of their own, who were liable to the same form of proceeding: but every man choosing rather to preserve his own life by silence, than presently to draw upon himself the danger, which as yet concerned him little, & perhaps would never come near him; the Tyrants interpreting silence as consent, condemned him forthwith, and compelled him to drink poyson.

§. III.

The Conspiracie against the thirtie Tyrants, and their deposing.

After the death of Theramenes, the thirtie began to use such out-rage, as excelled their former villanies. For, having three thousand (as they thought) firm unto them, they robbed all others without fear or shame, despoiling them of lands and and goods, & caused them to flie into banishment, for safeguard of their lives. This flight of the citizens procured their liberty, and the general good of the Citie. For the banished citizens, who were fled to Thebes, entred into consultation, and resolved to hazzard their lives in setting free the City of Athens. The very thought of such a practice had bin treason at home, which had no other danger abroad, than might be found in the execution. Seventie men, or thereabout, were the first undertakers, who with their Captain Thrasybulus took Phyla, a place of strength in the Territorie of Athens. No sooner did the thirtie hear of their exploit, than seek means to prevent further danger, assembling the three thousand, and their Lacedemonian guard, with which force they attempted Phyla, but were with some losse of their men repelled. Finding the place too strong to be taken by assault, they intended to besiege it; which purpose came to nought by means of snow that fell, and other stormie weather, against which they had not made provision. Retiring therefore to the City, which above all they were to make good, they left the most of their guard, and two companies of Horse, to wearie out them which lay in Phyla, with a lying siege. But it was not long ere the followers of Thrasybulus were increased from seventie to seven hundred, which adventured to give charge upon those guards, of whom they cut off above an hundred and twentie. These small, but prosperous beginnings, added more to the number of those in Phyla, who now with a thousand men got entrance into Piræus, the suburb of Athens, lying on the Port. Before their comming the thirtie had resolved to fortifie the Town of Eleusine, to their own use, whereinto they might make an easie retreat, and save themselves from any sudden perill. It may well seem strange, that whereas their barbarous manner of government had brought them into such danger, they were so far from seeking to obtain mens good will, that contrariwise, to assure themselves of Eleusine, they got all of the place who could bear arms into their hands by a train, and wickedly (though under form of Justice) murdered them all. But, Sceleribus tutum per scelera est iter, the mischiefs which they had already done were such, as left them no hope of going backward, nor any other apparent likelihood of safetie, than by extending their cruelty unto all, seeing few or none were left, whom they could trust. When Thrasybulus and his fellowes, who as yet were termed conspirators, had taken the Piræus, then were the three thousand armed again by the Tyrants, and brought to assault it; but in this enterprize Thrasybulus had the better, and repelled his enemies, of whom though there were slain to the number of seventie only, yet the victorie seemed the greater, because Critias, and one other of the thirtie, perished in that fight. The death of Critias, and the stout defence of Piræus, together with some exhortations used by Thrasybulus to the Citizens, wrought such effect, that the thirtie were deposed. Nevertheless there were so many of the three thousand, who having communicated with the thirtie in their misdeeds, feared to be called to a sharp account, that no peace, nor quiet form of government could be established. For Embassadors were sent to Sparta, who craving aid against Thrasybulus and his followers, had favourable audience, and a power lent to their assistance, both by land and sea, under the conduct of Lysander, and his Brother; whom Pausanias the Spartan King did follow, raising an Armie of the Cities confederate with the Lacedemonians. And here appeared first the jealousie, wherein some people held the State of Sparta. The Bœotians and Corinthians, who in the late wars had bin the most bitter enemies to Athens, refused to follow Pausanias in this expedition; alleging that it stood not with their oathes, to make war against that people, who had not hitherto broken any one article of the league; but fearing indeed, lest the Lacedemonians should annex the Territorie of Athens to their own Demains. It is not to be doubted, that Pausanias took this answer in good part. For it was not his purpose to destroy those against whom he went, but only to crosse the proceedings of Lysander, whom he detested. Therefore having in some small skirmishes against them of Thrasybulus his party, made a shew of war, finally wrought such means, that all things were compounded quietly: the thirtie men, and such others, as were like to give cause of tumults, being sent to Sparta. The remainder of that tyrannical faction, having withdrawn themselves to Eleusine, were shortly after found to attempt some innovation, whereupon the whole City rising against them, took their Captains, as they were comming to Parly, and slew them; which done, to avoid further inconvenience, a law was made, that all injuries past should be forgotten, and no man called into question for wrongs committed. By which order, wisely made, and carefully observed, the City returned to her former quietness.

Of the expedition of Cyrus the younger.

The grounds of Cyrus his attempts against his brother.

He matters of Greece standing upon such terms, that no one estate durst oppose it self against that of Lacedæmon; young Cyrus, Brother to Artaxerxes King of Persia, having in his fathers life-time very carefully prosecuted the war against Athens, did send his messengers to Sparta, requesting that their love might appear no less to him, than that which he had shewed towards them in their dangerous war against the Athensians. To this request, being generall, the Lacedæmonians gave a suitable answer, commending their Admirall to perform unto Cyrus all service that he should require of him. If Cyrus had plainly discovered himself, and the Lacedæmonians bent their whole power to his assistance, very like it is, that either the kingdom of Persia should have bin the recompence of his deserts; or that he perishing in battell, as after he did, the subversion of that Empire had forthwith ensued. But it pleased God, rather to shew unto the Greeks the waies, which under the Macedonian Ensigns, the victorious foot-steps of their posteritie should measure; and opening unto them the riches, and withall the weaknesse of the Persian, to kindle in them both desire and hope of that conquest, which he reserved to another generation, than to give into their hands that mighty kingdom, whose hour was not yet come. The love which Parysatis the Queen mother of Persia bare unto Cyrus her younger son, being seconded by the earnest favour of the people, & ready desires of many principall men, had moved this young Prince, in his fathers old age, to aspire after the succession. But being sent for by his Father (as hath before bin shewed) whose meaning was to curb this ambitious youth, he found his elder brother Artaxerxes established so surely by the old Kings favour, that it were not safe to attempt any means of displanting him, by whose disfavour himself might easily lose the place of a Vice-roy, which he held in Asia the lesse, and hardly be able to maintain his own life. The neereft neighbour to Cyrus of all the Kings Deputies in the lower Asia, was Tissaphernes, a man compounded of cowardise, treachery, craft, & all vices which accustomably branch out of these. This man accompanied Cyrus to his Father, using by the way all fair shewes of friendship, as to a Prince, for whom it might well be thought, that Queen Parysatis had obtained the inheritance of that mighty Empire. And it was very true, that Parysatis had used the best of her endeavour to that purpose, alleging that (which in former ages had bin much available to Xerxes, in the like disceparation with his elder brother) Artaxerxes was born whilst his father was a private man, but Cyrus, when he was crowned king. All which not sufficing, when the most that could be obtained for Cyrus, was the pardon of some presumptuous demeanour, and confirmation of his place in Lydia, and the parts adjoining: then did this Tissaphernes discover his nature, and accuse his friend Cyrus to the new King Artaxerxes, of a dangerous treason intended against his person. Upon this accusation, whether true or false, very easily beleaved, Cyrus was arrested, and by the most vehement intreatie of his Mother very hardly delivered, and sent back into his own Province.

§. II.

The preparations of Cyrus, and his first entrie into the War.

The form of government which the Persian Lieutenants used in their severall Provinces, was in many points almost Regall. For they made war and peace, as they thought it meet, not only for the Kings behoofe, but for their own reputation; usually indeed with the Kings enemies, yet sometimes one with another: which was the more easily tolerated, because their own heads were held only at the Kings pleasure, which caused them to frame all their doings to his wil, whatsoever it were, or they could conjecture it to be. Cyrus therefore being settled in Lydia, began to consider with himself, the interest that he had in the Kingdom; the small assurance of his brothers love, held only by his Mothers intercession; the disgrace endured by his late imprisonment; and the means which he had by love of his own people, and that good neighbourhood of the Lacedæmonians, whom he had bound unto him, to obtain the Crown for himself. Neither was it expedient that he should long sit idle, as waiting till occasion should present it self: but rather enterprise somewhat whilst yet his Mother lived, who could procure a good interpretation to all his actions, if they were no worse than only questionable. Hereupon he first began to quarrell with Tissaphernes, and seized upon many Towns of his jurisdiction, annexing them to his own Province, which displeased not Artaxerxes at all, who (besides that he was of condition somewhat simple) being truly paid by Cyrus the accustomed Tributes out of those places, was well contented to see his brothers hot spirit exercised in private quarrels. But Tissaphernes, whose base conditions were hated, & cowardize despised, although he durst not adventure to take armes against Cyrus, yet perceiving that the Milesians were about to give up themselves into the hands of that young Prince, as many other towns of the Ionians had done, thought by terrour to preserve his reputation, and keep the town in his own hands. Wherefore he slew many, and many he banished, who flying to Cyrus, were gently entertained, as bringing fair occasion to take armes, which was no small part of his desire. In levying Souldiers he used great policie; for he took not only the men of his own Province, or of the Countries adjoining, whose lives were ready at his will; but secretly he furnished some Grecian Captains with money, who being very good men of war, entertained Souldiers therewith, some of them warring in Thrace, others in Thessalie, others elsewhere in Greece; but all of them ready to crosse the Seas, at the first call of Cyrus, till which time they had secret instructions to prolong their severall wars, that the Souldiers might be held in continuall exercise, and ready in arms upon the sudden. Cyrus having sent a power of men to besiege Miletus, forthwith summoned these bands of the Greeks, who very readily came over to his assistance, being thirteen thousand very firm Souldiers, and able to make head (which is almost incredible) against the whole power of Artaxerxes. With this Army, and that which he had levied before, he could very easily have forced Miletus, and chased away Tissaphernes out of Asia the lesse: but his purpose was not so to lose time in small matters, that was to be employed in the accomplishment of higher designs. Pretending therefore that the Pisidians, a people of Asia the lesse, not subject to the Persian, had invaded his Territory, he raised the siege of Miletus, and with all speed marched Eastward, leaving Tissaphernes much amazed, who had no leisure to rejoyce that Cyrus had left him to himself, when he considered, that so great an Army, and so strong, was never levied against the Rovers of Pisidia, but rather against the great King his Master. For which cause taking a band of five hundred horse, he posted away to carry tidings to the Court, of this great preparation.

§. III.

How Cyrus took his journey into the higher Asia, and came up close to his Brother.

The tumult which his coming brought was very great, and great the exclamations of the Queen Statira, against Parysatis, the Queen-Mother, whom she called the Author and occasioner of the war. But whilst the King in great fear was arming the high Countries in his defence, the danger hastened upon him very fast. For Cyrus made great marches, having his number much increased by the repair of his Countrymen, though most strengthened by the access of seven hundred Greeks, and of other four hundred of the same Nation, who revolted unto him from the King. How terrible the Greeks were to the Barbarians, he found by triall in a Muster, which (to please the Queen of Cilicia, who had brought him aid) he made in Phrygia; where the Greeks by his direction making offer of a charge upon the rest of his Army, which contained a hundred thousand men, the whole Camp (not perceiving that this was but a bravery) fled amain, the victuallers and baggagers forsaking their cabbins, & running all away for very fear. This was to Cyrus a joyful spectacle, who knew very well, that his brother was followed by men of the same temper, and the more unlikely to make resistance, because they were preft to the war against their will and dispositions, whereas his Army was drawn along by meer affection and good will. Nevertheless he found it a very hard matter to persuade the Greeks to passe the River of Euphrates. For the very length of the way which they had troden, wearied them with the conceit of the tedious return. Therefore he was driven, being yet in Cilicia, to seek excuses, telling them, that Abrocomas, one of the Kings principall Captains, and his own great enemy, lay by the River, against whom he requested them to assist him. By such devices, and excessive promise of reward, he brought them to Euphrates, where some of the Greeks considering, That who so passed the River first, should have the most thanks, and might safely return if the rest should refuse to follow them; they entred the Foords, whereby were all finally persuaded to do as some had begun: and being allured by great hopes, they resolved to seek out Artaxerxes, wheresoever he was to be found. The King in the mean time having raised an army of nine hundred thousand men, was not so confident upon this huge multitude, as to adventure them in triall of a plain battail. Abrocomas, who with three hundred thousand men, had under-taken to make good the Streights of Syria, which were very narrow, and fortified with a strong wall, and other defences of nature and art, which made the place to seem impregnable, had quitted the passage, and retired himself toward the Kings forces, not daring to look Cyrus in the face, who despairing to find any way by Land, had procured the Lacedemonian fleet, by the benefit whereof to have transported his Army. I doe not find that this cowardise of Abrocomas, or his Souldiers, who arrived not at the Camp, till five dayes were past after the battail, received either punishment, or disgrace; for they, toward whom he withdrew himself, were all made of the same metall.

Therefore Artaxerxes was upon the point of retiring to the uttermost bounds of his Kingdom, untill by Teribazus, one of his Captains, he was persuaded not to abandon so many goodly Provinces to the enemy, who would thereby have gathered addition of strength, and (which in the sharp disputation of Title to a Kingdom is most available) would have grown superior in reputation. By such advice, the King resolved upon meeting with his brother, who now began to be secure, being fully persuaded that Artaxerxes would never dare to abide him in the field. For the King having cast up a Trench of almost fortie miles in length, about thirty foot broad, and eighteen foot deep, intended there to have encamped: but his courage failing him, he abandoned that place, thinking nothing so safe, as to be far distant from his enemies.

S. III.

The battail between Cyrus and Artaxerxes.

THE Armie of Cyrus having overcome many difficulties of evill wayes, and scarcity of victuals, was much encouraged by perceiving this great fear of Artaxerxes; and being past this trench, marched carelessly in great disorder, having bestowed their Arms in Carts, and upon Beasts of carriage; when on the sudden one of their Vaunt-currors, brought news of the Kings approach. Hereupon with great tumult they armed themselves, and had ranged their battails in good order upon the side of the river Euphrates, where they waited for the comming of their enemies, whom they saw not till it was after noon. But when they saw the cloud of dust raised by the feet of that huge multitude, which the King drew after him, and perceived by their neer approach how well they were marshalled, comming on very orderly in silence, whereas it had bin expected, that rushing violently with loud clamours, they should have spent all their force upon the first brunt; and when it appeared that the fronts of the two Armies were so unequall in distent, being all embattailed in one body and square, that Cyrus taking his place (as was the Persian manner) in the midst of his own, did not with the corner, and utmost point thereof, reach to the half breadth of Artaxerxes his battail, who carried a front proportionable to his number, exceeding nine times that of Cyrus: then did the Greeks begin to distrust their own manhood, which was not accustomed to make proof of it self, upon such excessive oddes. It was almost incredible, that so great an Armie should be so easily chased. Nevertheless, it quickly appeared, that these Persians, having learned (contrary to their custome) to give charge upon their their enemies with silence, had not learned (for it was contrary to their nature) to receive a strong charge with courage. Upon the very first offer of onsets, made by the Greeks, all that beastly rabble of cowards fled amain, without abiding the stroke, or staying till they were within reach of a Dart. The Chariots armed with hooks and fitches (whereof Artaxerxes had two hundred, and Cyrus not twenty) did small hurt that day, because the drivers of them leaping down, fled away on foot. This base demeanour of his enemies gave so much confidence to Cyrus and his Followers, that such as were about him forthwith adored him as King. And certainly, the Title had bin assured unto him that day, had not he sought how to declare himself worthy of it, ere yet he had obtained it. For, perceiving that Artaxerxes, who found that part of the field which lay before him void, was about to encompass the Greeks, and to set upon them in the rear, he advanced with six hundred Horse, and gave so valiant a charge upon a Squadron of six thousand, which lay before the King, that he brake it, slaying the Captain thereof Artaxerxes with his own hands, and putting all the rest to flight. Hereupon his whole company of six hundred, very few excepted, began to follow the chase, leaving Cyrus well attended, who perceiving where the King stood in troop, uncertain whether to fight, or leave the field, could not contain himself, but said, Behold the man: and presently with a small band full of men about him ran upon his brother, whom he strake through the Curace, and wounded in the breast. Having given this stroke, which was his last, he received immediately the fatal blow, which gave period at once to his ambition and life, being wounded under the eye with a dart, thrown by a base fellow, whereuntoastored, he fell dead from his horse, or so hurt, that it was impossible to have recovered him, though all which were with him, did their best for his safety, not caring afterwards for their own lives, when once they perceived that Cyrus their Master was slain. Artaxerxes caused the head and right hand of his brother to be forthwith stricken off, and shewed to his people, who now pursuing them, fled apace, calling upon the name of Cyrus, and desiring him to pardon them. But when this great accident had breathed new courage into the Kings troops, and utterly dismayed such Persian Captains, as were now, even in their own eyes, no better than rebels; it was not long ere the Camp of Cyrus was taken, being quite abandoned; from whence Artaxerxes making all speed, arrived quickly at the quarter of the Greeks, which was about three miles from the place where Cyrus fell. There he met with Tissaphernes, who having made way through the battail of the Greeks, was ready now to joyn with his Master in spoiling their Tents. Had not the news, which Artaxerxes brought with him of his brothers death, bin sufficient to countervaille all disasters received, the exploit of Tissaphernes in breaking through the Greeks would have yielded little comfort. For Tissaphernes had not slain any one man of the Greeks; but contrariwise, when he gave upon them, they opening their battail, drave him with great slaughter through them, in such wise, that he rather escaped as out of an hard passage, than forced his way through the Squadron of the Greeks. Hereof the King being informed by him, and that the Greeks, as Masters of the field, gave chase to all that came in their fight, they ranged their Companies into good order, and followed after these Greeks, intending to set upon them in the rear. But these good Souldiers perceiving the Kings approach, turned their faces, and made head against him; who not intending to seek honour with danger of his life, wheeled about and fled, being pursued unto a certain Village, that lay under a Hill, on the top whereof he made a stand, rather in a bravery, than with purpose to attempt upon these bold fellows any further. For he knew well that his brothers death had secured his estate, whom he would seem to have slain with his own hand, thinking that fact alone sufficient to give reputation to his valour; and this reputation so he thought that he might now preserve well enough, shewing a manly look half a mile off. On the top of this Hill therefore he advanced his Standard, a golden Eagle displayed on the top of a Spear. This ensign might have encouraged his people, had not some of the Greeks espied it, who not meaning that he should abide so neer them, with all their power marched toward him. The King discovering their approach, fled upon the spur, so that none remained in the place of battail, save only the Greeks, who had lost that day not one man, nor taken any other harme, than that one of them was hurt with an arrow. Much they wondred that they heard no news of Cyrus, but thinking that he was pursuing the Army, they thought it was fittest for them, having having that day done enough, to return to their quarter, and take their Supper, to which they had good appetite, because the expectation of the Kings comming had given them no leisure to dine.

S. V.

The hard estate of the Greeks after the fight, and how Artaxerxes in vain sought to have made them yeeld unto him.

IT was now about the setting of the Sun, and they bringing home darke night with them, found their Camp spoiled, little or nothing being left that might serve for food: so that wanting victuals to satiate their hunger, they refreshed their weary bodies with sleep. In the mean season Artaxerxes returning to his Camp, which he entered by Torch-light, could not enjoy the pleasure of his good fortune entire, because he perceived that the baseness of his people, and weaknesse of his Empire, was now plainly discovered to the Greeks: which gave him assurance, that if any of these who had beheld the shamefull demeanor of his Army, should live to carry tidings home, it would not be long ere with greater forces they dispersed with him for his whole Signory. Wherefore he resolved, to try all means, whereby he might bring them to destruction, and not let one escape to carry tidings of that which he had seen: to which purpose he sent them a brave message the next morning, charging them to deliver up their Arms, and come to his Gates, to await there upon his Meacie. It seems that he was in good hope to have found their high courages broken, upon report of his brothers death: but he was greatly deceived in that thought. For the Greeks being advertised that morning from Arius, a principall Commander under Cyrus, that his Master being slain, he had retired himself to the place of their last encamping, about eight miles from thence, whence intending to return into Ionis, his meaning was to dislodge the next day, awaiting for them so long if they would joyn with him, but resolving to stay no longer: they sent answer back to Arius, that having beaten the King out of the field, and finding none that durst resist them, they would place Arius himself in the Kings Throne, if he would joyn with them, and pursue the victory. Before they received any reply to this answer, the Messengers of Artaxerxes arrived at the Camp, whose errand seemed to the Captains very insolent: One told them, that it was not for the Vanquishers to yield their Weapons; another, that he would dye ere he yeelded to such a motion; a third asked, whether the King, as having the victory, required their Weapons; if so, why did he not fetch them? or, whether he desired them in way of friendship; for then would they first know, with what courtesie he meant to requite their kindnesse. To this question Phalimus a Grecian, waiting upon Tissaphernes, answered; That the King having slain Cyrus, knew no man that could pretend any Title to his Kingdom, in the midst whereof he held them fast enclosed with great Rivers, being able to bring against them such numbers of men, as they wanted strength to kill if they would hold up their throats; for which cause he accounted them his prisoners. These words, to them, who knew themselves to be free, were nothing pleasant. Therefore, one told Phalimus, that having nothing left, but their Arms and Valour, whilst they kept their Armes, their Valour would be serviceable; but should they yeeld them, it was to be doubted, that their bodies would not long remain their own. Hereat Phalimus laughed, saying; This young man did seem a Philosopher, and made a pretty speech; but that his deep speculation shewed his wits to be very shallow, if he thought with his Arms and Valour to prevail against the great King. It seems that Phalimus being a Courtier, and employed in a businesse of importance, thought himself too profound a States-man, to be checkt in his Embassage by a bookish discourser. But his wisdom herein failed him. For whatsoever he himself was (of whom no more is known than that he brought an unhoneest message to his own Countrymen, perswading them basely to surrender their Weapons, and Lives, to the mercilesse Barbarians) this young Scholar by him despised, was that great Xenophon, who, when all the principall Commanders were surpris'd by treachery of the Persians, being a private Gentleman, and having never seen the war before, undertook the conduct of the Army, which he brought safe into Greece, freeing it from all those, and from greater dangers than Phalimus could propound. Some there were who promised to be faithfull to the King, as they had bin to Cyrus, offering their their service in Egypt, where they thought Artaxerxes might have use of them. But the final answer was, That without Weapons they could neither doe the King good as Friends, nor defend themselves from him as Enemies. Hereupon Phalimus delivered the Kings further pleasure, which was to grant them Truce, whilst they abode where they then were, denouncing Warre if they stirred thence; Whereunto he required their answer. Clearchus the Generall told him, they liked it. How, (saith Phalimus) must I understand you? As choosing peace if we stay, or otherwise war, said Clearchus. But whether warre or peace, quoth this politike Embassadour: To whom Clearchus (nor willing to acquaint him with their purpose,) Let our doings tell you, and so dismissed him, as wiser than he came. All that day the Greeks were faine to feed upon their Horses, Asses, and other Beasts, which they rosted with Arrowes, darts, and wooden targets, thrown away by the Enemies.

How the Greeks began to return home-wards.

AT night they took their way towards Arius, to whom they came at mid-night; being forsaken by four hundred foot, and forty horse, all Thracians, who fled over to the King, by whom how they were entertained, I doe not find. Like enough it is that they were cut in pieces; for had they been kindly used, it may well be thought that some of them should have accompanied Tissaphernes, & served as Stales to draw in the rest. Arius being of too base a temper, and birth, to think upon seeking the Kingdom for himself, with such assistance as might have given it unto Cyrus, was very well pleased to make covenant with them for mutuall assistance unto the last: Whereunto both parts having sworn, he advised them to take another way homeward, which should be somewhat longer, yet safer and sitter to relieve them with victuals, than that by which they came. The next day, having made a wearisome march, and tyred the Soldiers, they found the Kings Army which had coasted them, lodged in certain Villages, where they purposed themselves to have encamped: towards which Clearchus made directly, because he would not seem by declining them to shew fear, or weaknesse. That the Kings men were contented to remove, and give place to their betters, it cannot be strange to any that hath considered their former behaviour; Nor strange, that the Grecians, being weary and hungry, and lying among enemies in an unknown Country, should be very fearfull: but it is almost past believe, that the noise which was heard of these poor men, calling one to another tumultuously, as the present condition enforced them to do, should make the Persians flie out of their Camp, and so affright the great King, that in stead of demanding their Arms, he should crave peace of them. The next day very early, came messengers from Artaxerxes, desiring free access for Embassadours, to treat of peace. Were it not that such particulars doe best open the quality of the persons, by whom things were managed, I should hold it fitter, to run over the generall passages of those times, than to dwell among circumstances. But surely it is a point very remarkable, That when Clearchus had willed the Messengers to bid the King prepare for battell, because the Greeks (as he said) wanting whereupon to dine, could not endure to hear of truce till their bellies were full; Artaxerxes dissembling the indignity, was contented sweetly to swallow down this pill, sending them guides, who conducted them to a place where was plenty of victuals to relieve them.

How Tissaphernes, under colour of peace, betrayed all the Captains of the Greeks.

Hitherto the Greeks, relying upon their own vertue, had rather advanced their affairs, than brought themselves into any straights or termes of disadvantage. But now came unto them the subtle Fox Tissaphernes, who circumventing the Chiefe Commanders by fine sleights, did mischievously entrap them, to the extreme danger of the Army. He told them, that his Province, lying neer unto Greece, had caused him greatly to desire, that their deliverance might be wrought by his procurement; knowing well that in time to come, both they, and their Countymen at home, would not be unthankfull for such a benefit. Herewithall hee forgot not to rehearse the great service that he had done to his Master, being the first that advertised him of Cyrus his intent, and having not onely brought him a good strength of men, but in the day of battell shewed his face to the Greeks, when all others turned their backs: that he, together with the King, did enter their Camp, and gave chase to the Barbarians that stood on the part of Cyrus. All this (quoth he) did I allege to the King, entreating that he would give me leave to conduct you safe into Greece, in which sure I have good hope to speed, if you will send a milde answer to him, who hath willed me to ask you, for what cause ye have borne Arms against him. The Captains hearing this, were contented to give gentle words, which Tissaphernes relating to the King, procured (though very hardly, as he said) that peace should be granted: the conditions whereof were, That they should passe freely through all the Kings Dominions, paying for that they took, and committing no spoil: yet that it should be lawfull for them to take victuals by force, in any place that refused to afford them an open Market. Hereupon both parties having sworn, the League was concluded, and Tissaphernes returning to the King to take leave, and end all businesse, came unto them again after twenty dayes, and then they set forward. This interim of twenty dayes, which Tissaphernes did spend at the Court, ministered great occasion of mistrust to his new Confederates. For besides his long absence, which alone sufficed to breed doubt, the Brethren, and Kindred of Arius, repairing daily to him, and other Persians to his Souldierr, did work him and them so with assurance of pardon, and other allurements, that he daily grew more strange to the Greeks than formerly he had bin. This caused many to advise Clearchus, rather to passe forward as well as he might, than to rely upon covenants; and sit still whilest the King layed snares to entrap them. But he on the contrary perswaded them, to rest contented whilest they were well, and not to cast themselves again into those difficulties, out of which they were newly freed by the late Treatie; reciting withall their own wants, and the Kings means, but especially the Oathes mutually given and taken, wherewith hee saw no reason why the enemy should have clogged himself if hee meant mischief, having power enough to do them harm by a fair and open Warre.

Tissaphernes was a very honourable man (if honour may be valued by greatnesse and place in Court) which caused his Oath to be the more esteemed; for as much as no enforcement, or base respect, was like to have drawn it from him. But his falshood was such, both in substance and in successe, as may fitly expound that saying, which proceeded from the fountain of Truth, I hate a rich man a lyer. A lyer may finde excuse when it grows out of fear: for that passion hath his originall from weaknesse. But when Power, which is a Character of the Almighty, shall be made the supporter of untruth, the falshood is most abominable; for the offender, like proud Lucifer, advancing his own strength against the divine Justice, doth commit that sinne with an high hand, which commonly produceth lamentable effects, and is followed with sure vengeance. It was not long ere Tissaphernes found means to destroy all the Captains, whom he subtilly got into his power by a train; making the Generall Clearchus himself the mean to draw in all the rest. The businesse was contrived thus: Having travelled some dayes together in such wise, that the Persians did not encamp with the Greeks, who were very jealous of the great familiarity appearing between Tissaphernes and Arius; Clearchus thought it convenient to root out of Tissaphernes his brains all causes of distrust, whereof many had grown in that short time. To which purpose obtaining private conference with him; he rehearsed the oath of Confederacie, which had past between them, shewing how religiously he would keep it; and repeating the benefits, which the Greeks did receive by the help of Tissaphernes, he promised that their love should appear to him not unfruitfull, if he would make use of their service against the Myrians or Pisidians, who were accustomed to infect his Provinces; or against the Egyptians, who were then Rebels to the great King. For which cause hee desired him, that whereas all divine and humane respects had linked them together, hee would not give place to any close accusation or suspicion, whereby might grow sudden inconvenience to either of them, upon no just ground. The faithlesse Persian was very much delighted with this speech, which ministered fair occasion to the execution of his purpose. Therefore hee told Clearchus, that all this was by him wisely considered, wishing him further to call to mind how many wayes hee could have used to bring them to confusion, without perill to himself, especially by burning the Country, through which they were to passe, whereby they must needs have perished by meer famine. For which cause he said that it had bin great folly, to seek by perjury, odious to God and Man; the destruction of such as were already in his hands. But the truth was, that his own love to them had moved him to work their safety, not onely for those ends which Clearchus had recounted, of pleasures that might redound to himself, and the King, by their assistance; but for that hee might by their friendship, hope to obtain what Cyrus had mist. Finally, he invited the credulous Gentleman to Supper, and sent him away so well assured of his good will, that he promised to bring all the Captains with him to the same place, where, in presence of them all, Tissaphernes likewise promised to tell openly, which of them had by secret information sought to raise dissention between them. Clearchus himself being thus deceived, with great importunity drew all the chief Commanders, and many of the inferiour Leaders, to repair with him to the Camp of Tissaphernes, whither followed them about two hundred of the common Souldiers, as it had been to some common Fair. But being there arrived, Clearchus with other the five principall Collonels, were called into the Tent, the rest staying without, where they had not waited long ere a signe was given, upon which they within were apprehended, and the residue slain. Forth-with certain bands of Persian Horsemen scoured the field, killing as many Greeks as they met, and riding up to the very Camp of the Gracians, who wondered much at the tumult; whereof they knew not the cause, till one, escaping sorely wounded, informed them of all that had been done. Hereupon the Greeks took Arms in haste, thinking that the enemy would forth-with have assailed their Camp. Anon they might perceive the Embassadors of Tissaphernes, among whom were his own brother, and Arius, followed with three hundred Horse, who called for the principall men in the Army, saying, that they brought a message from the King, which Arius delivered to this effect: That Clearchus having broken his faith, and the league made, was justly rewarded with death; that Menon and Proxenus, two other of the five Collonels; for detesting his treacherie, were highly honoured; and finally, that the King required them to surrender their Arms, which were due to him, as having belonged unto his servant Cyrus. When some altercation had followed upon this message, Xenophon told the Embassadors, that if Clearchus had in such sort offended, it was well that hee was in such sort punished: but he willed them to send back Menon and Proxenus, whom they had so greatly honoured, that by them, as by common friends to both Nations, the Greeks might be advised how to answer the Persian. Hereunto the Embassadors knew not how to frame any reply, and therefore departed without speaking one word more. Clearchus, and the other four, were sent to Artaxerxes, by whose commandement their heads were stricken off. I hold it not amisse to prevent the order of time, annexing to this perfidioufnesse of Tissaphernes, the reward which he afterward received. He saw his Province wasted by the Greeks, against whom receiving from his Master convenient aid of men and mony, he did so ill manage his affairs, that neither subtiltie, nor perjury (to which he failed not to have recourse) availed him; finally, the King was jealous of his cunning head, and sent a new Lieutenant into those parts; who took it from his shoulders. Such was the recompence of his treacherie, which made him so mistrusted at home, that the service which he could not doe, he was thought upon private ends to neglect; and so hated abroad, that he knew not which way to flee from the stroke, all the world being shut against him. But now let us return to the prosperity, wherein he triumphed without great cause, having betrayed braver men than himself, and intending to bring the like mischief upon the whole Armie.

How Xenophon heartened the Greeks, and in despite of Tissaphernes went off safely.

Great was the heaviness of the Souldiers, being now left destitute of Leaders; and no lesse their fear of the evill hanging over their heads, which they knew not well how to avoid. Among the rest, Xenophon, whose learning supplied his want of experience, finding the deep sadness of the whole Army to be such as hindered them from taking any course of preventing the danger at hand, began to advise the underunder-officers of Proxenus his companies, whose familiar friend he had been, to bethink themselves of some mean, whereby their safety might be wrought, and the Souldiers encouraged: setting before their eyes whatsoever might serve for to give them hope, and above all, perswading them in no wise to yeeld to the mercy of their barbarous enemies.

Hereupon they desired him to take upon him the charge of that Regiment; and so together with him, the same night calling up such as were remaining of any account, they made choice of the fittest men to succeed in the places of those who were slain, or taken. This being done, and order set down for disburdening the Armie of all superfluous impediments, they easily comforted themselves for the losse of Tissaphernes his assistance, hoping to take victuals by force better cheap than he had been wont to sell them; To which purpose they intended to take up their lodging two or three miles further, among some plentiful Villages, and so to proceed, marching towards the heads of those great Rivers, which lay in their way, and to passe them where they were foordable. Many attempts were made upon them by Tissaphernes, whom they, serving all on foot, were not able to requite for the harm which they received by the Persian Archers, who shot at a farther distance than the Greeks could reach. For this cause did Xenophon provide slings, wherewith he over-reached the enemy; and finding some Horses fit for service, that were employed among the carriages, he set men upon them; training likewise his Archers to shoot compasse, who had been accustomed to the point blank. By these means did he bear off the Persians who assailed him; and sometimes gave them chase with that band of fifty Horse, which being well backt with a firm body of footmen, and seconded with troupes of the light-armed-shot and slingers, compelled the enemy to lie aloof. Tissaphernes not daring to come to handy-gripes with these resolute men, did possess the tops of mountains, and places of advantage, by which they were to passe. But finally, when their valour made way through all such difficulties, he betook himself to that course, which was indeed the surest, of burning the Countrey. With great sorrow did the Greeks behold the Villages on fire, and thereby all hope of victuals cut off. Some advised to defend the Countrey, as granted by the enemy himself to be theirs; others to make more fires, if so perhaps the Persians might be ahamed to doe that which was the desire of such as made passage in hostile manner; But these were faint comforts. The best counsell was, that being neer unto the Carduchi, a people enemy to the Persian, they should enter into their Countrey, passing over some high mountains which lay between them. This course they followed, which could not have availed them, if Tissaphernes had begun sooner to cut off their victuals, rather than to seek to force, or to circumvent them by his fine wit.

The difficulties which the Greek Armie found in passing through the Land of the Carduchi.

ENTring upon the Land of the Carduchi, they were encountered with many difficulties of wayes, but much more afflicted by the fierce Inhabitants, who, accustomed by force to defend themselves against the huge Armies of the Persian, were no way inferior to the Greeks in daring, but onely in the Art of Warre. They were very light of foot, skilfull Archers, and used the Sling well; which weapons in that mountainous Countrey were of much use against these poor travellers, afflicting them in seven dayes which they spent in that passage, farre more than all the power of the great King had done. Between the Territorie of these Carduchi, and the parts of Armenia confining them, ran Centrites a great River, upon which the Greeks rested themselves one day, rejoycing that they had so well escaped these dangers, and hoping that the remainder would prove easie. But the next morning they saw certain troops of Horse, that lay to forbid their passage. These were levied by the Kings deputies in those parts; Tissaphernes and his Companies having taken their way towards Ionia. The River was broad and deep, so that it was not possible for such as would enter it, to make resistance against those which kept the opposite banks. To increase these dangers, the Carduchi, following upon them, lay on the side of a Mountain, within less than a mile of the water. But it was their good hap to discover a Foord, by which the greater number of them passing over, did easily chase away the Subjects of the Persian, and then sending back the most expedite men, gave succour to the Rear-ward, against which the Carduchi being slightly armed, could not on plain ground make resistance hand to hand. These Carduchi seem to have inhabited the Mountains of Niphates, which are not far from the Spring of Tygris, though Ptolomy place them far more to the East upon the River of Cyrus in Media; wherein he differs much from Xenophon, whose relation being grounded upon his own knowledge, doth best in this case deserve credit. Of the River Centrites (as of many other Rivers, Towns, and Places, mentioned by Xenophon) I will not labour to make a conjecture, which may endure the severity of a Critique. For Ptolomy, and the whole Nation of Geographers, adde small light to this expedition: only of this last, I think it the same which falleth into Tygris, not much above Artasigaria, springing out of Niphates, and running by the Town of Sardeva in Gordene, a Province of Armenia the Great, wherein the Greeks having passed Centrites did arrive.

How Teribazus Governour of Armenia, seeking to entrap the Greeks with termes of feined peace, was disappointed, and shamefully beaten.

THE Army finding in Armenia good provision, marched without any disturbance about fifty or threescore miles to the heads of the River Tygris, and passing over them, travailed as far further without resistance, till they were encountered by Teribazus at the River Teleboa, which Xenophon commends as a goodly water, though small, but Ptolomy and others omit it. Teribazus governed that Countrey for the Persian, and was in great favour with Ariaxerxes, whose Court may seem to have bin a School, where the Art of falshood was taught as wisdom. He desired peace of the Greeks, which was made upon this condition, That they should take what they pleased, but not burn down the Towns and Villages in their way. As soon as he had made this league, he leaved an Army, and besetting the Streights of certain Mountains which they were to passe, hoped well to make such benefit of their security, as might give him the commendation of being no lesse craftily dishonest than Tissaphernes. Yet his cunning failed of successe. For a great snow fell, which caused the Greeks to make many fires, and scatter themselves abroad in the Villages. Teribazus also made many fires, and some of his men wandered about seeking relief. By the fires he was discovered, and by a Souldier of his that was taken prisoner, the whole plot was revealed. Hereupon the Greeks, taking this captive with them for a guide, sought him out; and coming upon his Camp, did so affright him, that before the whole Army could arrive there, the shout which was raised by the Vaunt-currors, chased him away. They took his Pavilion, wherein (besides many slaves, that were Artificers of voluptuousnesse) very rich furniture was left by the treacherous coward, who returned no more to challenge it. From hence the Army went Northward, and passing Euphrates, nor far below the Springs thereof, travailed with much difficulty through deep snow, being followed aloof by the enemy, who durst not approach them, but did cut off such as they found straggling behind. The Inhabitants of the Countrey, through which they marched, had their wintering houses under ground, wherein was found great plenty of victuals, and of Cattail, which likewise did winter in the same Cellars with the owners. Having refreshed themselves in those parts, & taken sufficient ease after the miserable journey, which had consumed many of them with extreme cold, they departed, leading with them many bond-slaves, & taking away (besides other Horses and Cattail) some Colts that were bred up for the great King.

S. XI.

The passage of the Army to Trabyzonde, through the Countreies bordering upon the River of Phasis, and other obscure Nations.

SO without impediment they came to the River Phasis, neer whereunto the people called Phasians, Tacchi, and Chalybes were seated. These Nations joyned together, and occupying the tops of a ledge of Mountains, which the Greeks were were to passe, made countenance of war: but some companies being sent by night to seize upon a place of equall height to that whereon the enemies lay, making good the piece of ground which they had taken, secured the ascent of the rest, which caused those people to flye, every one retiring to the defence of his own. The first upon whose Countre the Greeks did enter were the Tacchi, who conveying all their provision of victuals into strong holds, brought the Army into much want, untill with hard labour one place was forced, wherein great store of Cattail were taken; the people, to avoid captivity, threw themselves head-long down the rocks, the very women throwing down first their own children, and then casting themselves upon them. Here was taken a great Bootie of Cattail, which served to feed them, travailling through the land of the Chalybes, of whom they got nothing but strokes. The Chalybes were a very stout Nation, on, well armed at all points, and exceeding fierce. They encountered the Greeks hand to hand, killing as many as they took prisoners, and cutting off their heads, which they carried away, singing and dancing, to the great grief of their companions living, who were glad, when after seven dayes journey they escaped from those continuall skirmishes, wherewith they had bin vexed by these Barbarians. Hence travailling through a good corn-Country, inhabited by an obscure Nation called the Scythini, they came to a rich Town, the Lord whereof, and of the Region adjoining, used them friendly, and promised to guide them to a Mountain, whence they might discover the Euxine Sea. From Gymnias (which was the name of his Town) he led them through the Territories of his enemies, desiring them to waste it with sword and fire. After five dayes march, they came to a Mountain called Teches, being (as I think) a part of the Mountains called Moschici, whence their guide shewed them the Sea; towards which they bent their course; and passing friendly through the Region of the Macrones, (with whom by means of an interpreter, found among themselves, who born in that place had bin sold into Greece, they made a good peace) they arrived in the Land of Colchos, wherein stands the Citie of Trabizond, called then Trapezus, a Colonie of the Greeks. The Colchi entertaining them with hostility, were requited with the like; for the Army having now good leisure to repose themselves among their friends the Trapezuntians, did spoyle the Country thirty dayes together, forbearing onely the Borders upon Trabizonde, at the Citizens request.

S. XI.

How the Army began at Trabizond to provide a Fleet, wherewith to return home by Sea: how it came into the Territories of Synope, and there prosecuted the same purpose.

Having now found an Haven Town, the Souldiers were desirous to take shipping, & change their tedious Land-journies into an easie Navigation. To which purpose Cherisophus a Lacedaemonian Admirall, who was his friend, that he promised by means of Anaxibus the Lacedaemonian Admirall, who was his friend, that he would provide Vessels to embark them. Having thus concluded, they likewise took order for the staying of such ships as should passe that way, meaning to use them for their navigation. Lest all this provision should be found insufficient for the transportation of the whole Army, Xenophon perswaded the Cities adjoining to clear the wayes, and make an easie passage for them by Land, wherunto the Souldiers were utterly unwilling to give eare, being desirous to return by Sea: but the Countre, fearing what inconvenience might grow by their long stay, did readily consent to Xenophons request. Two ships they borrowed of the Trapezuntians, which they manned and sent to Sea: the one of them sailed directly into Greece, forsaking their Companions, who had put them in trust to bring ships into the Port of Trabizonde: the other took Merchants and passengers, whose goods were safely kept for the owners, but the Vessels were stayed to increase the fleet. After long aboad, when victuals began to fail, by reason that all the Land of the Colchi, neer unto the Camp, was already quite wasted, they were faine to embark their sick men, with the women, children, and such of the baggage as might be spared, in those few ships which they had already provided. The rest of the Army took their way by Land to Cerastus, a Greek Town, where the fleet likewise arrived. Here the Army being mustered, was found to consist of eight thousand & six hundred men. From hence they passed through the Country of the Mosynaci, who were divided divided into factions. The stronger partie despising their friendship, caused them to joyn them with the weaker whom they left Masters of all.

The next place of their abode was Cotyora, a Greek Town likewise, and a Colonie of the Synopians, as Trapezus and Cerastus were; but the entertainment which here they found was very churlish, having neither an open Market afforded to them, nor the sick men that were among them admitted into any house. Hereupon the Souldiers entred the Town by force, and (committing no outrage) bestowed those which were sick in convenient lodgings, taking into their own hands the custody of the Gates. Provision for the Army they made by strong hand, partly out of the Territory of the Paphlagonians, partly out of the Lands belonging to the Town. These news were unwelcome to Synope, whence Embassadors were sent to the Camp, who complaining of these dealings, and threatening to joyn with the Paphlagonians, if redresse could not otherwise be had, were roundly answered by Xenophon, That meer necessity had enforced the Army to teach those of Cotyora good manners in so bad a method: letting them know, that he feared not to deal with them and the Paphlagonians at once; though perhaps the Paphlagonian would be glad to take Synope itself, to which, if cause were given, they would lend assistance. Upon this answer the Embassadors grew better advised, promising all friendship that the State of Synope could shew, and commanding the Town of Cotyora to relieve the Souldiers as well as they might. Further they promised to assist them with shipping, letting them understand how difficult the passage by Land would prove, in regard of the many and great Rivers, as Thermodon, Iris, Halys, and Parthenius, which crossed their way. This good counsaile, and the fair promises accompanying it, were kindly accepted by the Army, which well perceived, that the City of Synope would spare for no cost, to be freed from such a neighbourhood. It was therefore decreed that they would passe the rest of the way by Sea; provided that if there should want such number of Vessels as might serve to imbarke every one of them, then would they not put from the shore.

Of dissention which arose in the Army, and how it was embarked.

Hitherto the danger of enemies, and miseries of weather and wants, had kept the companie in firm unity, which now began to dissolve and to thaw, by the neighbouring air of Greece, warming their heads with private respects to their severall ends and purposes. Whilest they, who were sent as Agents from the Camp, remained at Synope, Xenophon considering the strength and valour of his men, & the opportunity of the coast whereon they lay, thought it would be an honourable work to build a City in those parts, which were soon like to prove great and wealthie, in regard both of their own puissance, and of the great repair of the Greeks into that quarter. For this cause he made sacrifice, according to the superstition of his time and Countre, divining of his success by the entrails of beasts. The Sooth-sayer whom he employed had received a great reward of Cyrus, for conjecturing aright, that Artaxerxes would not give battle in ten dayes: he therefore, having preserved his money carefully, was desirous to be soon at home, that he might freely enjoy his gettings. By him the purpose of Xenophon was divulged, which was interpreted according to the diversitie of mens opinions, some approving the motion, but the greater part rejecting it. They of Synope and Heraclea, being informed of this consultation, were sore afraid, lest the poverty of the Souldiers, who had not wherewith to maintain themselves at home, should give success to the project. Which to prevent, they promised to supply the Army with a sufficient fleet, and likewise offered money to some of the Captains, who thereupon undertook to give the Souldiers pay, if they would presently set sail for Greece. One of these Captains being a banished man, desired them to follow him into Troas; another offered to lead them into Cherronesus: Xenophon, who desired only the common good, was pleased greatly with these propositions, and professed openly that he would have them to set forward, & hold together in any case, punishing him as a traitor that should forsake the Armie, before such time as they were arrived at their journey's end. Silanius the Sooth-sayer, who had uttered Xenophons purpose, was hereby staied from outrunning his fellows, and driven to abide with his wealth among poor men, longer than stood stood with his good liking. Also the other Captains were much troubled and afraid, when they perceived, that ships were prepared sufficient for their Navigation, but that the money promised to them, and by them to the Souldiers, came not. For the people of Sinope, and Heraclea, knowing that the Armie was now resolved for the voyage, and that Xenophon, whom they feared, had perswaded them to this resolution, thought it the wisest way to furnish them with a Navie, whilest they were in good readinesse, to depart, but to keep the mony to themselves. The Captains therefore, who being disappointed by these towns, found themselves in great danger of their men, whom they had deceived with fair hopes, repented much of their fair offers, and signifying as much to Xenophon, prayed him to make proposition to the Armie, of taking the ships, & sayling to Phasis, where they might seize upon Lands, and plant themselves in such wise as should stand best with their good liking. But finding him cold in the businesse, they began to work the principall of their own followers, hoping by them to draw in all the rest. These news becomming publike, bred a suspition of Xenophon, as if he had won the rest of the Captains to his purpose, and meant now to carry the Army quite another way from their own home. Wherefore assembling the Companies, he gave them satisfaction, and withall complained of some disorders, which he caused them to redresse. A generall inquisition was likewise made of offences committed since the death of Cyrus, which being punished, all things were in quiet. Shortly after came Embassadors from Corylus, Lord of the Paphlagonians, who sending presents, desired peace of the Greeks: the Embassadors were friendly entertained, and peace concluded, which needed not to have bin sought, for that the Greeks, having now their fleet in a readinesse, did soon weigh Anchors, and set sail for Harmene the Port of Sinope, whither Cherisophus came, bringing with him a few Gallies from the Admiral Anaxibius, who promised to give the Army pay as soon as they came into the parts of Greece.

§. XIV.

Another great dissension and distraction of the Army. How the mutiners were beaten by the Barbarians, and rescued by Xenophon.

THe neerer that they approached to Greece, the greater was their desire to make provision for themselves, that they might not return home empty-handed. Wherefore trusting well that if the charge of the Armie were absolutely committed to one sufficient man, he might the more conveniently procure the good of them all, they determined to make Xenophon sole Commander of all; in whose favour as well the Captains as the common Souldiers were very earnest and violent. But he, either fearing to displease the Lacedemonians, who were jealous of him already (being incensed by that fugitive who forsook the army at Trabizond, flying with one of their two ships) or moved by some tokens appearing to him in the entrails that threatned ill successe to his government, procured vvith vehement contention, that this honour vv as laid upon Cherisophus, a Lacedemonian. It seems that Xenophon, considering the vexation incident to the conduct of a voluntary Army, wanting pay, did wisely in yeelding to such tokens as forbad him to accept it: especially, knowing so well their desire, which was, by right or by wrong, to get wealth whersoever it might be found, without all regard of friend or foe. Cherisophus had bin Generall but six or seven dayes, when he was deposed, for having bin unwilling to rob the Town of Heraclea, which had sent presents to the Camp, and bin very beneficiall unto them in lending ships for their transportation. Two dayes they had sailed by the coast of Asia, when being past those great rivers, which would have given impediment to their journey by Land, they touched at Heraclea, where consulting how to take their way onwards, whether by Land or Sea, one seditious man began to put them in mind of seeking to get somewhat for themselves; telling them that all their provision would be spent in three dayes, and that being now come out of the enemies Country, victuals and other necessaries could not be had without money; for which cause he gave advice to send messengers into the Town of Heraclea, giving the Citizens to understand what their wants were, and demanding of them three thousand pieces of money, called Cyzicens, which sum amounteth to two thousand and five hundred pound sterling, or thereabout. This motion was greatly applauded, and the sum raised to ten thousand Cyzicens at least: which to require, they thought Cherisophus, as being General, the fittest man; others had more desire to send Xenophon: but in vain, for they both refused it, and renounced the action as dishonest. Lest therefore either of them should fail in managing the businesse which agreed not with his disposition, others of more impudency and lesse discretion were sent, who in such wise delivered their insolent message, that the Citizens taking time to deliberate upon their requests, brought what they could out of the fields into the Town, and shutting the Gates, did forthwith man the Walls. When the Souldiers perceived themselves to be disappointed of their rayenous purpose, they fell to mutiny, saying; That their Leaders had betrayed them; and being for the greater part of them Arcadians and Achaens, they forsook immediately Cherisophus and Xenophon, chusing new Leaders out of their own number. Above ten thousand and five hundred they were; all heavily armed; who electing ten Captains, sailed into the Port of Calphas, which is in the mid-way between Heraclea and Byzantium; with purpose to assault the Byzantians on the sudden. With Cherisophus there were two thousand and one hundred, of whom one thousand and four hundred were armed weightily: Xenophon had two thousand foot, three hundred whereof were lightly armed, and forty horse; which small band had done good service already, and could not have bin spared now. Cherisophus had agreed with Cleander Governour of Byzantium, to meet him at the mouth of the River Calphas, whither Cleander promised to bring some Gallies to convey him over into Greece; for which cause he took his way thither by Land, leaving to Xenophon such shipping as he had; who passing some part of the way by Sea, landed upon the confines of Heraclea, and Thracia Asiatica, intending to make a cut through the mid-land Country to the Propont. The Mutiners who had landed at Calphas by night, with purpose to take spoiles in Rybinia, divided themselves into ten Companies, every Capitaine leading his own Regiment into some Village, five or six miles from the Sea; in the greater Towns were two Regiments quartered; and to was this part of the Country surpris'd on the sudden, and sacked all at one time. The place of Road was an high piece of Ground, where some of them arrived, finding no disturbance; others, not without much trouble and danger: two Companies were broken and defeated, only eight men escaped, the rest were all put to the sword. For the Thracians, which had slipt at first out of the Souldiers hands, did raise the Country; and finding the Greeks laden with booty, took the advantage of their disorder, cutting in pieces those two Regiments: which done, they attempted the rest, encompassing the hill whereon they encamped. One great advantage the Thracians had; that being all light armed, they could at pleasure make retreat from these Arcadians and Achaens, who wanting the assistance of horse, and having neither Archers nor Slingers among them, were driven to stand meercly upon their defence, bearing off with greater danger, & many wounds received, the Darts and Arrows of the Barbarians, till finally they were driven fro their watering place, and enforced to crave parley. Whatsoever the Articles of composition were, the Thracians yeilded to all; but pledges for assurance they would give none, without which the Greeks well knew, that all promises of such people, especially so incensed, were nothing worth. In the mean time Xenophon holding his way quietly through the In-land Region, did enquire of some Travellers, whether they knew ought of any Grecian Army, passing along those parts: & receiving by them true information of the desperate case into which these Gallants had foolishly thrown themselves, he marched directly towards the place where they lay, taking with him for guides, them who gave him the intelligence. His horse-men he sent before to discover, & to scowr the waies; the light armed foot-men took the hill tops on either hand, all of them setting fire on whatsoever they found combustible: whereby the whole Country seemed to be on a light flame, to the great terror of the enemies, who thought that some huge Army had approached. That night he encamped on a hill, within five mile of the Arcadians, encreasing still the number of his fires, which he caused hastily to be quenched soon after Supper. The enemies perceiving this, thought certainly that he would have fallen upon them in the dark, which caused them in all haste to dislodge. Early in the next morning Xenophon comming thither in very good order, to have given battell, found that his device, to affright the Thracians, had taken full effect; but he marvelled that the Greeks were also departed, concerning whom he learned by enquiry, that they removed at break of day, & perceived by signes that they had taken the way to the Port of Calphas, in which journey he overtook them. They embraced him and his, with great joy: confessing that they themselves had thought the same which the enemies did, looking that he should have come by night; wherein finding themselves deceived, they were affraid lest he had forsaken them, and therefore hastened away to overtake him, and joyn with him. So they arrived at the Haven of Calphas, where it was decreed, That whosoever from thenceforth made any motion to dis-joyn the Army, should suffer death.

§. XV.

Of divers pieces of service done by Xenophon; and how the Army returned into Greece. The occasions of the War between the Lacedæmonians and the Persians.

The Haven of Calphas lay under a goodly head-land, that was very strong, and abounding with all kind of Grain and Fruits, except Olives. There was also Timber for building and shipping, and a very convenient Sea for a great City. All which commodities that might have allured the Souldiers to stay there, and to plant, caused them to haste away, fearing lest Xenophon should find some device to have settled himself and them in that place. For the greater part of them had good meanes to live at home; neither did they so much for hope of gain follow Cyrus in that War, as in regard of his Honour, and the love which they bare unto him: the poorer sort were such as left their Parents, Wives, and Children, to whom (though failing of the riches which they had hoped to purchase) they were now desirous to return. But, whether it were so that Xenophon found advantage by their own superstition, to make them stay, which they greatly suspected; or whether the signes appearing in the entrails, did indeed forbid their departure; so long they were enforced to abide in the place till victuals failed; neither would the Captaines lead them forth to forrage the Country, untill the Sacrifices should promise good successe. Cherisophus was dead of an Ague, and his ships were gone, being returned to the Heracleans, of whom they were borrowed. His followers were joyned to the rest of the Armie, which the greater it was, the more provision it needed, and the sooner felt want. For which cause, he that was chosen Coronel into the place of Cherisophus, would needs adventure to gratifie the Souldiers with the spoil of some Villages that stood near at hand; in which enterprize he found ill successe, the whole Country lying in wait to intrap him, and an Army of Horse being sent by Pharnabazus the Satrapa, or Vice-roy of Phrygia, to the assistance of these Bythinian Thracians, which troupes falling upon the Greeks that were scattered abroad in seeking booty, slew five hundred of them, and chased the rest to a certain Mountain there by. The news of this overthrow comming to Xenophon, he led forth a part of the Army to the rescue of those that survived, and brought them safe to the Camp; upon which the Bythinians made an offer that night, and breaking a Corps du garde, slew some, pursuing the rest to the very Tents. This new courage of the enemy, together with the present condition of the Army, so disheartened and unfurnished of necessities, caused the Greeks to remove their Camp to a place of more strength; which having intrenched, and committed to the defence of such as were least able to endure travell, Xenophon with the firmest and best able men went forth, both to bury those which were lately slain, and to abate the pride of the Thracians, and their assistance. In this journey his demeanour was very honourable. For having given buriall to the dead, the Enemy was discovered, lying on the tops of the hills adjoyning, to whom (notwithstanding that the way was very rough and troublesome, so that some thought it a matter of too great danger, to leave at their backs a wood scarce passable) he marched directly, telling his men plainly, that he had rather follow the enemy with half the number, than turn his back to them with twice as many; & letting them further know, that if they did not charge the Barbarians, he would not fail with the greater resolution to pursue them; from whom if they could safely retire to the camp, yet what should they do there, wanting victuals to sustain them in the place, and ships to carry them away? Wherefore he willed them rather to fight well that day, having eaten their dinners, than another day fasting; and not to regard the uneasy return, which might serve to stay Cowards from running away, but to with unto the Enemy a fair and easie way, by which he might flye from them. These perswasions were followed with so valiant execution, that both Persians and Bythinians being chased out of the field, abandoned the Countrey forthwith, removing their Families, and leaving all that could not suddenly be conveyed away, to the discretion of the Greeks, who at good leisure gathered the Harvest of these bad Neighbours fields. This was the last fight which they had on the side of Asia. For they were not only suffered quietly to enjoy the spoyle of the Country, but when the opinion grew common in those parts, that it was the intent of Xenophon to plant a Colony on the Port of Calphas, Embassadors were sent from the Neighbour people, to desire friendship, and make offer of their best assistance. But the Souldiers had no mind to stay. Wherefore entering further into Bythinia, they took a great booty, which they carried away unto Chrysopolis, a city near unto Chalcedon, where they sold it. Pharnabazus, Lieutenant in Phrygia to Artaxerxes, did greatly fear, lest their long stay in that Country might breed in them a desire to visite his Province; where they might have found great wealth, and little power to guard it. Therefore he sent to the Lacedæmonians an Admirall, entreating him with much instance and large promises to waite them over into Eurepe, to whom Anaxibius the Admirall condescending, promised to give the Souldiers pay, as soon as they arrived at Byzantium. So were they carried out of Asia at the intreaty of the Persian, who in the height of his pride had thought them so surely imprisoned with mighty Rivers, that he not only denied to permit their quiet departure, but willed them to surrender their Armes into his hands, and so to yeeld their lives to his discretion. How discourteously they were intreated by Anaxibius, and how to requite his injurious dealings, they seized upon Byzantium, which by Xenophons persuasion they forbore to sack; I hold it superfluous to relate. For the residue of their doings appertain little to the generall course of things. But this expedition as in all ages it was glorious, so did it both discover the secrets of Asia, and stir up the Greeks to think upon greater enterprises, than ever their forefathers had undertaken. Likewise it was the only remarkable action which the time afforded. For the Roman Wars did hitherto extend no further than to the next neighbouring Towns of Italy; and in Greece all things were quiet, the Lacedæmonians ruling insolently, but without disturbance. True it is, that the seeds of the War shortly following, which the Lacedæmonians made upon Artaxerxes, were already sown, before these companies returned out of the high Countries of Asia. For the Towns of Ionis which had sided with young Cyrus against Tissaphernes, if not against the great King, prepared to rebel, which they thought safer, than to fall into the hands of Tissaphernes, who was now appointed Lieutenant both of his old Province, and of all that had belonged to Cyrus. Wherefore the Ionians besought the Lacedæmonians to send them ayd, whereby to recover their liberty, and obtained their request. For a power was sent over, under conduct of Timotheus Spartan, who bestowed his men in such Towns as had already revolted, to secure the Cities and their Fields, but not to make any offensive War.

CHAP. XI.

Of the affairs of Greece, whilest they were managed by the Lacedæmonians.

How the Lacedæmonians took courage by example of Xenophons Army, to make War upon Artaxerxes.

It seems that the Lacedæmonians did well perceive in how ill part Artaxerxes took their favour shewed unto his brother, and yet were timorous in beginning an open war against him, thinking it sufficient to take all care that no advantage might slip, which could serve to strengthen their Estate, by finding the Persian work beyond the Sea. But when Xenophons Army had revealed the baseness of those effeminate Asiaticques, and rehearsed the many victories which they themselves had gotten, upon termes of extreme disadvantage; then was all Greece filled with desire of undertaking upon this huge unwieldy Empire, thinking it no hard matter for the joyned forces forces of that whole Nation, to hew out the way to Susa, whereof one handfull had opened the passage to Babylon; and further, finding no power that was able to give them resistance, in all that long journey of four and thirty thousand two hundred and fifty five furlongs, spent in going and returning, which make of English miles about four thousand two hundred fourscore and one, a very painfull march of one year and three months; Nevertheless, the civill distraction wherewith Greece was miserably torn, and especially that hot fire of the Theban war, which, kindled with Persian gold, brake forth suddenly into a great flame, drew back out of Asia the power of the Lacedaemonians, to the defence of their own Estate; leaving it questionable, whether Agessilaus having both the same and far greater forces, could have wrought proportionable effects. Sure it is, that in the whole space of two years, which he spent in Asia, his deeds procured more commendation of magnanimity and fair behaviour, than of stout courage, and great, or profitable achievements. For how highly soever it pleased Xenophon, who was his friend, and follower in this, and in other wars, to extoll his virtue; his exploits being only a few incursions into the Countries lying near the Sea, carrying no proportion to Xenophon's own journey, which I know not whether any Age hath paralleled: the famous retreat of Conan the Briton with six thousand men from Aquileia, to his own Country, through all the breadth of Italy, and length of France, in despite of the Emperour Theodosius, being rather like it than equall. But of Agessilaus and his wars in Asia and Greece, we shall speak more in due place.

§. II.

The prosperous beginnings of the War in Asia.

Thimbro receiving Xenophon's men, began to take in Towns, and to entertain all such as were willing to revolt from the Persian, who were many, and some of them such, as had been highly beholding to the King; who seem to have had no other cause of discontent, than that they were to live under the government of Tissaphernes, whom all others did as vehemently hate, as the King his Master did love him. The managing of the war begun by Thimbro, was for his oppressions taken out of his hands, and committed to Dercyllidas a Spartan, who behaved himself as a good man of War, and a wise Commander. For whereas the rule of the low Countries of Asia was divided between Pharnabazus and Tissaphernes, who did ill agree, Pharnabazus being the worthier man, but the other by his Princes favour the greater, and having the chief command in those Wars against the Greeks; Dercyllidas, who did bear a private hatred to Pharnabazus (knowing well that Tissaphernes was of a mischievous nature, and would not be forry to see his Corrivall thoroughly beaten, though to the Kings losse) made an appointment with Tissaphernes, and forthwith entered Aolis, which was under the jurisdiction of Pharnabazus, which Province in few dayes, he brought into his own power.

That Country of Aolis had about the same time suffered a violent alteration, which gave easie successe to the attempts of Dercyllidas. Zenis a Dardanian had bin Deputy to Pharnabazus in those parts; after whose death his wife Mania procured his Office, wherein she behaved her self so well, that she not only was beloved of the people under her government; but enlarged her Territory, by the conquest of certain Towns adjoining; and sundry times gave assistance to Pharnabazus in his Wars against the Myssians and Persians. For she had in pay some Companies of Greeks, whose valour by her good usage, did her great service. But somewhat before the arrival of Dercyllidas in those parts, a Son-in-law of hers, called Midias, whom she trusted and loved much, being blinded with ambition, found means to stifle her, and kill her son of seventeen years old; which done, he seized upon two of her principall Towns, wherein her treasure lay, hoping to have been admitted into possession of her whole estate. Being denied entrance by her Souldiers that lay in Garrison, he sent Messengers with presents to Pharnabazus, desiring him to make him Governour in the place of Mania. His presents were not onely rejected by Pharnabazus, but revenge of his foul treason threatned, whereby the wicked villain was driven into termes of almost utter desperation. In the mean time came Dercyllidas, to whom the Towns of Mania, that held against Midias, did quickly open their Gates. One onely Town stood out four dayes (against the will will of the Citizens, who were covetous of liberty) the Governour striving in vain to have kept it to the use of Pharnabazus. Now remained only two Cities, Gorgethe and Scepsis, which the Traytor held, who fearing all men, as being loved of none, sent Embassadors to Dercyllidas, desiring leave to speak with him, and pledges for his security: upon the delivery of which, he issued out of Scepsis, and coming into the Camp, made offer to joyn with the Greeks upon such conditions as might seem reasonable. But he was plainly told by Dercyllidas, that other condition there was none, than to set the Citizens freely at liberty. And presently upon these words they marched toward Scepsis. When Midias perceived that it was in vain to strive against the Army, and the Towns-men, who were all of one mind; he quietly went along with Dercyllidas, who remaining but a few hours in the City, did a sacrifice to Minerva, and then leading away the Garrison of Midias, he left the City free, and departed toward Gorgethe. Midias did not forsake his Company, but followed him, earnestly intreating that he might be suffered to retain Gorgethe: but comming to the Gates, he was bidden to command his Souldiers that they should be opened; for (quoth Dercyllidas) I must here likewise doe a sacrifice to Minerva. The Traytor, not daring to make deniall, caused his Mercenaries to open the Gates, whereby Dercyllidas, taking possession of the place, tendred pay to the Garrison, who did not refuse to serve under his Ensignes. This done, all the goods of Mania were seized upon, as belonging to one that had been subject to Pharnabazus, who was enemy to the Greeks: and so the murderous wretch was sent away naked, not knowing in what part of the World he might find any place to hide his detested head. Dercyllidas having in eight dayes taken nine Cities, purposed for the ease of his Confederates to winter in Bythinia, to which end he took Truce with Pharnabazus, who had not any desire of Warre. That Winter, and the Summer ensuing, the truce being continued, held; in which time, besides the waisting of Bythinia, the neck of Land joyning Cherronea to the Main, was fortified, being four or five miles in breadth; by which means eleven Towns, with much good Land belonging to them, were freed from the incursions of the wilde Thracians, and made fit and able to victual the Camp. Likewise the Citie of Atarne was taken, which was of great strength, and very well stored with provision. After this, Dercyllidas had command from Sparta, to divert the Warre into Caria, where was the seat of Tissaphernes; for that hereby it was thought not uneasy to recover all the Towns of Ionis; Pharax the Admirall of the fleet (which was a yearly office, being appointed to joyn with him. Though it was manifest that Tissaphernes had neglected Pharnabazus in time of necessity, yet was he not in his own danger requited with the like. For Pharnabazus having respect to the Kings service, came to assist his private enemy Tissaphernes, and so passing into Caria, they thrust Garrisons into all places of strength; which done, they marched towards Ionis, hoping to find the Towns ill manned for resistance. As these Persians were desirous to keep the Warre from their own dores, so was Dercyllidas willing to free his Confederates the Ionians from the spoil and danger of the War, by transferring it into Caria. For which cause he passed the River of Meander, and not looking to have been so soon encountered, marched carelessly through the Country: when on the very sudden the whole Army of Tissaphernes and Pharnabazus was discovered, consisting of Persians, Carians, and some Mercenary Greeks, who were all marshalled in very good order to present battell. The odds was too apparent, both in numbers of men, and in readinesse, as also in advantage of ground: for the Persian had a great multitude of Horse, the Greek very few and feeble, being to fight in an open plain. Therefore all the Ionians, together with the Islanders and others, of such places as bordered upon the Kings Dominions, did either betake themselves to present flight; or abiding a while for shame, did plainly discover by their looks, that they meant not to be more bold than wise. Onely Dercyllidas with his Peloponnesians, regarding their honour, prepared to endure the fight, which must needs have brought them to destruction, if the counsell of Pharnabazus had been followed, who perceiving the opportunity of so great a victory, was not willing to let it slip. But Tissaphernes, who naturally was a coward, seeing that countenance of resistance was made, began to consider what strange defence the Souldiers of Xenophon had shewed, and thinking that all the Greeks were of the like resolution, held it the wisest way to crave parley; the conclusion of which was, That a Truce should be made, to last untill Tissaphernes might receive answer from the King, and Dercyllidas from Sparta, concerning the demands propounded in the Treaty; which were on the one part, That all the Greeks in Asia might enjoy their own liberty and lawes; but contrariwise on the other side, That the Lacedæmonians should depart Asia, and leave the Towns to the Kings pleasure. This Treaty was of none effect; only it served to free the Greeks from the present danger, and to gain time unto Tissaphernes, who desired to avoid the War by procrastination, which he durst not adventure to finish by tryall of a battell.

How the Lacedæmonians took revenge upon the Eleans for old displeasure. The discontent of the Corinthians and Thebans, conceived against the State of Sparta.

IN the mean season the Lacedæmonians, who found none able to withstand them in Greece, began to call the Eleans to account for some disgraces received by them during the late Warres, when leasure was wanting to the requital of such petty injuries. These Eleans being Presidents of the Olympique games, had set a fine upon the City of Sparta, for Non-payment of which, they forbad them to come to the solemnity; and publicly whipt one of them that was of note, for presuming to contend against their decree. Likewise they hindred Agis King of Sparta from doing sacrifice to Jupiter; and in all points used great contempt toward the Spartans, who now had no business that could hinder them from taking revenge: and therefore sent a peremptory message to the Eleans, commanding them to set at liberty the Cities which they held in subjection. This was the usuall pretence which they made the ground of all their Wars: though little they cared for the liberty of such Towns, which they caused afterwards to become followers, and little better than meer Vassals of the Lacedæmonians. In their late Wars with Athens, the strong opposition which they found, caused this goodly Title of liberty to work very slowly: but having now to doe with a State of great spirit and small force, it gave present successe to their desires. Two years together they sent an Army into the Country of the Eleans: the first year an Earth-quake (held in those times a prodigious sign, and which did alwayes forbid the prosecution of any enterprize in hand) caused them to retire: the second year, all the Towns of the Eleans did hastily revolt, and the City it self was driven to submission; consenting both to suffer their old subjects freely to enjoy their liberty, and to have her own Walls thrown down. Only the Presidentship of the Olympian games was left unto them, which it was not to be doubted that they would in time comming use modestly, finding themselves to stand at the mercy of Sparta. In this expedition all the Greeks were assistant to the Lacedæmonians, excepting the Corinthians and Boeotians, whose ayd having been of as much importance in the late Peloponnesian War, as the force of Sparta it self, they could not smother their dislike of their unequall division following the victory; which gave to Sparta the command of all Greece; to Thebes and Corinth, onely security against Athens, but such a security as was worse than the danger. For when the equall greatnesse of two mighty Estates did counterpoise each the other, it was in the power of these Neutrall Common-weals to adhere to either, as the condition of their affairs required; but when to revenge injuries, they had by mortall hatred prosecuted the Warre to extremity, leaving the one City naked of power and friends, the other mightily increased in both; it was then (if not necessary to obey the greatnesse which themselves had made, yet) foolish and dangerous to provoke it. Nevertheless, it was not the purpose of the Spartans to take occasion of any quarrell, which they could not finish at pleasure, till such time as they had by victory or commotion made some good end with the Persian, toward whom they bent all their care and forces.

The passage of Agesilaus into Asia. His Warre with Tissaphernes. How Tissaphernes was put to death; and the Warre diverted into another Province, through perswasion and gifts of Tithraustes his successour. How carelesse the Persian Lieutenants were of the Kings good.

Agesilaus newly made King of Sparta, was desirous to have the honour of the victory, which not without cause, he expected upon those of Asia; and therefore procuring a great Army to joyn with that of Dercyllidus, he took his way in great pomp to Aulis in Boeotia, a Haven lying opposite to the Island of Eubœa; in which place Agamemnon (leading the power of all Greece to the War against Troy, many Ages before) had embarked his men. In imitation of Agamemnon, he meant also to do sacrifice in Aulis, which the Thebans, Lords of that Country, would not permit, but saying, that the performance of such ceremonies in that place, belonged unto their Officers; they were so unable to conceal their malice, that sending some Companies of horse, they threw down his sacrifice from the Altar. It was not then convenient time for Agesilaus to entangle himself and his Country in a new Warre; therefore waiting better opportunity of revenge, he quietly swallowed the contumely; and followed his main intendment. Having landed his men at Ephesus, he was entertained by Tissaphernes with a Treaty of peace, wherein Agesilaus peremptorily requiring that the Persian should restore to liberty all the Greek Towns in Asia, was promised that the King, being first informed of his demand, should send answer to his good liking, if he would in the mean while make Truce. Truce was therefore made, which Tissaphernes had sought, only to win time of making provision for the War, and getting supply of men and money from Artaxerxes, whilest Agesilaus was busie in settling the estates of his confederate Cities on that side of the Sea. The end of this long vacation from war was at the comming down of these forces which Artaxerxes had sent: at what time Agesilaus received a plain message from Tissaphernes, that either he must forthwith depart out of Asia, or make good his abode by strong hand. Agesilaus returning word, that hee was glad to hear that his enemies had by perjury deserved vengeance from heaven, prepared to invade them; and sending word to all the Towns which lay between him and Caria, that they should provide victuals & other necessaries for his Army, did easily make Tissaphernes believe, that his intent was to invade that Province wherein Tissaphernes dwelt, and which was unfit for Horse, in which part of his forces the Persian had most confidence. Therefore Tissaphernes bestowing all his Companies of foot in Caria, entred with his Horse into the plains of Maander, hoping thereby to stop the passage of a heave foot-army, not suffering them to passe into that Country which was fittest for their service. But the Greeks left him waiting there in vain, and marched directly into Phrygia, where they took great spoyl without resistance, till such time as the Horse-men of Pharnabazus met him, who in a small skirmish having the better of the Greeks, were the occasion that Agesilaus returned to Ephesus. Although in this last fight only twelve men were lost, yet Agesilaus perceiving by that tryall how hard it would be to prevail, and hold the mastery of the field, without a greater strength of Horse, took all possible care to increase that part of his forces. By which means having enabled himself, whilest Winter lasted, he entred upon the Country of Tissaphernes, as soon as the season of the year would permit, and not only took a great booty, but finding the Horse-men of Tissaphernes in the plain of Maander, without assistance of their infantry, he gave them battell, and had a great victory, taking their Camp, in which he found great riches. The blame of this losse fell heave upon Tissaphernes, who either upon cowardise had absented himself from the battell, or following some other business, was then at Sardis. For which cause his Master having him in distrust, and thinking that peace might be the sooner had, which he much desired, if the man, so odious to the whole Nation of the Greeks, were taken out of the way, he sent into those parts Tithraustes a Persian, to cut off the head of Tissaphernes, and succeed him in the government. Such was the end of this base and cowardly Politician, who little caring to offend Heaven, when by perjury he could advance his purposes on Earth, failed at the last, through too much over-weening of his own wisdom, even in that part of cunning wherein he thought himself most perfect; for supposing

Sparta, concerning the demands propounded in the Treaty; which were on the one part, That all the Greeks in Asia might enjoy their own liberty and lawes; but contrariwise on the other side, That the Lacedæmonians should depart Asia, and leave the Towns to the Kings pleasure. Such was the end of this base and cowardly Politician, who little caring to offend Heaven, when by perjury he could advance his purposes on Earth, failed at the last, through too much over-weening of his own wisdom, even in that part of cunning wherein he thought himself most perfect; for supposing posing, that by his great skill in subtle negotiation he should one way or other circumvent the Greeks, and make them wearie of Asia; he did not seek to finish the war, and according to his Masters wish, bring all things speedily to quiet, but rather to temporize, till he might find some opportunitie of making such end as best might stand with the Kings honour and his own. Wherein it seems that he much mistook his Princes disposition, who though he had highly rewarded him for the aid which he did bring in his time of danger, yet would he much more gladly have taken it, if he could have found such means whereby the danger it self might have been avoided: as not loving to have war, whilest by any conditions (honourable or not) he might obtain peace. And this appeared well by the course which Tithraustes took at his first possession of the low Countries. For he sent Embassadors to Agessilaus, in very friendly sort, letting him know, that the man who had been Author of the warre, was now taken out of the way; and that it was the Kings pleasure to let the Greeks enjoy their own lawes and libertie, upon condition, that they should pay him the tribute accustomed, and the Armie be forthwith dismissed. The answer to this proposition, was by Agessilaus referred to the Council of Sparta; in the mean season he was content to transferre the war into the Province of Pharnabazus, at the request of Tithraustes, who bought his departure with thirtie Talents.

This was a strange manner of War, both on the offensive, and on the defensive part. For Agessilaus having entertained great hopes of vanquishing the great King, was contented to forbear his several Provinces, at the entreaty of the Lieutenants: and those Lieutenants being employed by the King to maintain his Estates against all enemies (wherein if they failed, they knew that their heads might easily be taken from their shoulders) were little offended at any losse that fell on their next Neighbour-Princes, which were subject likewise to the same Crown of Persia, so long as their own government could be preserved from waste and danger. The cause of this disorder on the Persian side, I can ascribe to nothing so deservedly, as to the corrupted estate of the Court, wherein Eunuchs, Concubines, and ministers of pleasure, were able, by partiall construction, to countenance, or disgrace, the actions of such as had the managing of things abroad; and to that foolish manner of the Kings (which was so usuall that it might be called a rule) to the reward or punish the Provinciall Governour, according to the benefit or losse, which the Country, given in charge unto each of them, received, during the time of his rule. Whereby it came to passe, that as every one was desirous to make his own Territorie yeeld a large increase to the Kings treasure, so no man was carefull to assist his borderers, if losse or danger might thereby grow to himself and his, but sat still as an idle beholder, when perhaps by joyning their forces, it had not been uneasie to recompence the spoyl of one Countrey, by conquering another, or defending a third from far greater miseries.

The War and Treatie between Agessilaus and Pharnabazus.

Agessilaus having thus compounded with Tithraustes, entred Phrygia, burning and wasting the Country without resistance. He took the Palace of Pharnabazus, and by his Lieutenant drave him out of the Camp. These Actions, together with his honourable behaviour, which added much to their lustre, were more glorious than profitable. For he did not win Cities and Places of strength, which might have increased his power, and given assurance to the rest of his proceedings: but purchased fame and high reputation, by which he drew unto him some that were discontented and stood upon bad termes with the great King; whom he lost again as easily, by means of some sleight injury done to them by his under-Captains. Pharnabazus did not enclose himself in any Town, for fear of being besieged, but kept the field, lying as neer as he could safely to the enemies, with whom it was not his purpose to fight, but to make some good end by composition, which he found not uneasie to doe. For the pleasures, by him formerly done to the State of Sparta, in the times of their most necessity, had been so great, that when he (obtaining parley) did set before their eyes his bounty towards them, and his love, which had been such, that besides many other hazzards of his person, he had for the rescue of their fleet when it was driven to run a-shore at Abydos, advenadventured to ride into the Seas as far as he could find any ground, and fight on horse-back against the Athenians) together with his faith which had never been violated in word or deed: they knew not how to excuse their ingratitude, otherwise than by telling him, That having War with his Master, they were inforced against their will, to offend him. Agessilaus did make a fair offer to him, that if he would revolt from the King to them, they would maintain him against the Persian, and establish him free Prince of the Country wherein he was at that time onely Deputy to Artaxerxes. But Pharnabazus told him plainly, That if the King his Master did put him in trust to make war against them, he would not fail to do the best that he could as their enemy; if the charge were taken out of his hand, and he commanded to obey another, he would then shift side, and betake himself to their alliance. The issue of this parley was, That the Armie should no longer abide in Phrygia, nor again return into it, whilest employment could be found elsewhere. The excuse made by Agessilaus, and the withdrawing of his forces out of those parts, were not sufficient to appease Pharnabazus, whom he had not invaded for want of more necessary businesse elsewhere; but because his Country would yeeld great booty, and for the hire of thirty Talents. By this means the Lacedemonians changed an honourable Friend into a hot Enemy, who afterwards requited their unthankfulnesse with full revenge.

The great commotions raised in Greece by the Thebans and others, that were hired with gold from the Persian.

In the mean while Tithraustes, perceiving that Agessilaus meant nothing lesse than to return into Greece, and let Artaxerxes rest quietly in Asia, took a wife course, whereby the Citie of Sparta was not onely driven to look to her own, and give over her great hopes of subverting the Empire, but was beaten out of all that had been gotten by many late victories, and saw her Dominion restrained unto the narrow bounds of her own Territory. He sent into Greece fifty talents of silver, to be employed in raising war against the Lacedemonians; which treasure was by the subtle practice of him that was put in trust with it, in such wise dispersed among the principall men of the Thebans, Argives and Corinthians, that all those Estates having formerly borne secret hate to that of Sparta, were now desirous of nothing so much, as of open war. And lest this great heat of the incensed multitude should, for want of present exercise, begin to faint and vanish away in idle words, occasion was found out to thrust the Lacedemonians into Armes, that they themselves might seem Authors of the quarrell. Some land there was in the tenure of the Locrians, to which the Thebans had in former time layd claim; but the Phocians either having the better title, or finding the greater favour, had it adjudged unto them, and received yearly mony for it. This mony the Locrians were either hired or perswaded to pay now to the Thebans, who readily accepted it. The Phocians not meaning so to lose their Rent, made a distresse by strong hand, recovering a great deal more than their own; which the Thebans (as in protection of their new Tenants) requited with an invasion made upon Phocis, wasting that Country in the manner of open war. Such were the beginnings of professed hostility between Thebes & Sparta, & the first breaking out of their close enmity, that had long time, though hardly, bin concealed. For when the Phocian Embassadors came to Sparta, complaining of the violence done by the Thebans, & requesting succour, they had very favourable audience, & ready consent to their sute; it being the manner of the Lacedemonians to defer the acknowledgment of injuries received, until occasion of revenge were offered, & then to discover their indignation in cold blood. At this time they had very good opportunity to work their own wils, having no other war to disturbe them in Greece, and hearing out of Asia no news that could offend or trouble them. Wherefore they sent Lysander to raise all the Countries about Phocis, and with such forces as he could levie, to attend the coming of Pausanias King of Sparta (for Sparta, as hath bin shewed before, had two Kings) who should follow him with the strength of Peloponnesus. Lysander did as he was appointed, & being of great reputation in those parts, he drew the Orchomenians to revolt from Thebes. Pausanias likewise raised all Peloponnesus, except the Corinthians (who refused to assist him in that enterprise) meaning to joyn with Lysander, & make a speedy end of

of the war. The consideration of so great a danger, approaching so swiftly, caused the Thebans to seek what help they could abroad, for as much as their own strength was far too little to make resistance against such mightie preparations. It was not unknown to them, that many followers of the Lacedæmonians were otherwise affected in heart than they durst utter in countenance; but the good willies of such people were little available, considering that the most which could be expected from them, was, that they should do as little hurt as they could: by which maner of tergiversation, the Corinthians did at that present cast themselves into the displeasure of the Spartans, to the no great benefit of Thebes. Wherefore it was thought the safest course to procure the assistance of some Estate that might presently declare it self on their side, which would cause many others to follow the example, and make their party strong. To this end they sent to Embassadours to Athens, excusing old offences, as either not committed by publick allowance, or done in time of the generall war, and recompenced with friendship lately shown in their refusal of assisting Pausanias, when he came in behalf of the thirtie Tyrants against the good Citizens of Athens. In regard of which, and for their own Honour sake, they requested them of aid in the present war, offering to doe the best that they could for the restoring of Athens to her former estate and dignitie. Thrasylus and his Friends, who persecuted by the thirtie, had been well entertained at Thebes, procured now the Citie to make a large requitall of the courtesie which they had received. For it was decreed, that the State of Athens should not only refuse to aid the Lacedæmonians in this War; but that it should assist the Thebans, and engage it self in their cause. Whilst Pausanias lay still, waiting the arrivall of his Confederates, Lyfander being desirous to doe somewhat that might advance the business in hand, came to Haliartus, where though Pausanias did not meet him, as had been appointed, yet he attempted the Town, and was slain in fight by the Thebans, who came hastily to the rescue. As this victorie did encourage the Thebans, so the comming of Pausanias with his great Armie did again amaze them, with presentation of extreme danger; but their spirits were soon revived by the strong succour which was brought from Athens, in consideration of which, and of the late battell, Pausanias durst not hazard a new fight with them, but receiving the bodies of those that were slain, by composition, departed out of their Territorie; for which, either cowardise or indiscretion, he was at his return to Sparta condemned as a Traitor, and driven to flie into Tegea, where he ended his daies in banishment.

How Agefilas was called out of Asia to help his Country. A victory of the Spartans. Conon the Athenian assisted by Pharnabazus, overcomes the Lacedæmonian Fleet; recovers the mastery of the Seas, and rebuilds the walls of Athens.

His good successe, and the confederacy made with Athens, gave such reputation to the Thebans, that the Argives, Corinthians, Eubæans, Locrians, and Acarnanians, did forthwith side with them, and raising a strong Army, determined to give battell to the Lacedæmonians as near as they might, to their own doores; Considering that the force of Sparta it self was not great, but grew more and more by the adjunction of their Confederates. The Magistrates of Sparta perceiving the danger, sent for Agefilas, who readily obeyed them, and promising his friends in Asia to return presently to their assistance, passed the Straights of Hellefpont into Europe. In the mean time the Cities of the new league had given battell to the Lacedæmonians, and the remainder of their Associates; but with ill successe. For when the right wing of each part had gotten the better hand, the Argives and Thebans returning from the chase in some disorder, were broken and defeated by the Lacedæmonians, who meeting them in good order, won from them the Honour which they had gotten by forcing the left wing of the Lacedæmonians, and made the victorie of that day entirely their own. The reporters of this battell meeting Agefilas at Amphipolis, were by him sent over into Asia, wherein it is not likely that they brought much comfort unto his friend, who had since his departure seen the Spartan Fleet beaten, and Lyfander the Admirall slain. The same man, whose endeavour had brought the Athenians into order by advancing the Sea-forces of the Lacedæmonians with money, and all manner of supplies, was now the occasion that the power power of Athens grew strong at Sea, when the Citie was dispoyle of her old reputation, & scarcely able to maintain an Army by Land for her defence. Pharnabazus considering how much it imported the king his Master, to have the Greeks divided into such factions as might utterly disable them from undertaking abroad, thought it the safest way for himself, during these broiles, to take such order, that he should not need any more to seek peace by intreaty and commemoration of old benefits, at their hands, who unprovoked, had sold his love for thirty Talents. To which purpose he furnished Conon the Athenian with eight ships, who had escaped when the Fleet of Athens was surprized by Lyfander at Agos-Potamos; giving him the command of a great Navie, wherewith he required the losse received at Agos-Potamos, by repaying the Lacedæmonians with the like destruction of their fleet at Cnidus. After this victory Conon sailed to Athens, bringing with him, partly as the liberality of Pharnabazus, partly as the fruit of his victory, so strong a Navie, and so much Gold, as encouraged the Athenians to rebuild their Walls, and think more hopefully upon recovering the Signiory which they had lost.

Of sundry small victories gotten on each part. The Lacedæmonians lose all in Asia; the Athenians recover some part of their old Dominion.

Nevertheless, the Lacedæmonians, by many victories at Land, maintained for some years the honour of their Estate, endangered very greatly by this losse at Sea. For Agefilas obtained the better with his horse-men from the Thebans, who were accounted the best riders in Greece. He wasted Boeotia, and fought a great battell at Coronea against the Thebans and their Allies, whom he overthrew; and by his Marshall Gylis foraged the Country of Locris: which done, he returned home.

The gain of these victories was not great, & the reputation of them was, by many losses much defaced. For the Thebans did in the battell of Coronea vanquish the Orcho-menians, who stood opposite unto them, and retired unbroken to Mount Helicon, opening way perforce when Agefilas charged them in the return from the pursuit. Likewise Gylis was slain with a great part of his Army by the Locrians; and some other exploits by the Lacedæmonians performed against the Corinthians, were repayed with equall damage received in the parts adjoining; many Towns being easily taken, and as easily recovered. The variety of which enterfeats was such, that the Thebans themselves were drawn by the losse of the haven of Corinth, to sue for peace, but could not get audience, till such time as the newes came of a great victory obtained by Iphicrates, General of the Athenian forces at Lechaum; whereupon the Theban Embassadors being sent for, and willed to doe their message, required only in scorn, to have a safe conduct given them, that they might enter into Corinth. From this time forward the War was made for a while only by incursions, wherein the Acheans, Confederates of Sparta, felt most losse, their whole State being endangered by the Acarnanians, who held with the contrary side, untill Agefilas repayed these invaders with equall, or greater calamities, brought upon their own Lands, which did so afflict the Acarnanians, that they were driven to sue for peace. But the affaires at Sea were of most consequence, upon which the successe of all depended. For when the Towns of Asia perceived that the Lacedæmonians were not only intangled in a hard War at home, but almost disabled to passe the Seas, having lost their Fleet at Cnidus, they soon gave ear to Pharnabazus, who promised to allow that they should use their own lawes, if they would expell the Spartan Governours. Only the City of Abydus did stand firm, wherein Dercyllidas lay, who did his best to contain all the Towns about Hellefpont, in the Alliance of the Lacedæmonians; which he could not do, because the Athenian Fleet under Thrasylus, took in Byzantium, Chalcedon, and other places thereabout, reducing the Ile of Lesbos to their ancient acknowledgement of Athens.

The base conditions offered unto the Persian by the Lacedæmonian. Of sundry fights and other passages in the Warre. The peace of Antalcidas.

ABOUT this time the Spartans began to perceive how uneasy a thing it would be, to maintain the War against men as good as themselves, assisted with the treasures of Persia: wherefore they craved peace of Artaxerxes, most basely offering not only to renounce the Greeks inhabiting Asia, and to leave them to the Kings disposition, but wishall to set the Islanders, and every Town in Greece, as well the little as the great, at full and absolute liberty, whereby they said that all the principall Estates of their Country would be weakened, that no one, nor all of them should be able to stir against the great King. And sure it was, that the power of the Country being broken and rent into many small pieces, could neither have disquieted the Persian, by an offensive War, nor have made any good defence against him, but would have left it easie for him in continuance of time to have taken the Cities one after another, till he had made himself Master of all. The Spartans were not ignorant of this, but were so carried with envie, that perceiving how the dominion of the Seas was like to return to Athens, they chose rather to give all from themselves and others, and make all a-like weak, than to permit that any of their own Nation should grow stronger than themselves, who so lately had commanded all. Yet this great offer was not at the first accepted, both in regard that the other Estates of Greece, who had in the Kings behalf joyned together against the Lacedæmonians, did by their severall Embassadors oppose themselves unto it; and for that it was thought safest for Artaxerxes rather to weaken the Lacedæmonians yet more, than by interposing himself to bring friends and foes, on the sudden to an equality. Especially Struthas, whom Artaxerxes had sent as his Lieutenant into the low Countries, did seek to repay, the harm done by Agessilaus in those parts: which his intent appearing plain, and all hope of the peace being thereby cut off, Thimbro was sent into Asia to make Warre upon Struthas; and others were appointed to other places, whereby the War being scattered about, all the Isles and Towns on the firm Land, grew almost to the manner of Piracy and Robbery, affording many skirmishes, but few great actions worthy of remembrance. Thimbro was slain by Struthas; & in his place Diphridas was sent, who demeaned himself more warily. Dercyllidas was removed from his charge at Abydos, because he had not impeached Thrasylus in his enterprises about Hellepont; Anaxibius, who succeeded him, was surprised and slain in a skirmish by Iphicrates the Athenian. Thrasylus departing from Lesbos toward Rhodes, was slain by the way at Aspendus. The City of Rhodes had long before joyned with the Lacedæmonians, who erected there (as was their manner) an Aristocratie, or the Government of a few the principall Citizens; whereas contrariwise the Athenians were accustomed to put the Sovereignty into the hands of the people, each of them seeking to assure themselves, by erecting in the town of their Confederates a government like unto their own: which doing (where more especiall cause did not hinder) caused the Nobility to favour Sparta, and the Commons to incline to Athens. The people of Egina roved upon the coast of Attica, which caused the Athenians to land an Army in Egina, and besiege their Town; but this siege being raised by the assistance of the Lacedæmonian fleet, the Islanders began a new to molest Attica, which caused the Athenians to man their ships again, that returned beaten, having lost four of thirteen. The loss of these ships was soon recompensed by a victory which Chabrias the Athenian Generall had in Egina, whereupon the Islanders were faine to keep home, and leave to the Athenians the Seas free. It may well seem strange that the Citie of Athens, having but newly raised her wals, having not by any fortunate and important battell secured her estate from dangers by land, but only depending upon the assistance of such Confederates, as carried unto different ends, had often discovered themselves irresolute in the common cause, would send a fleet and an army to Cyprus, in defence of Evagoras, when the mastery of the Seas was so ill assured, that an Island in the eie of Pyræus, had ability to vex the coast of Attica. But as the over-weening of that City did cause it usually to embrace more than it could compasse; so the insolency and shamelesse injustice of the people, had now bred in the chief Commanders, a desire to keep themselves far out of fight, and to seek employments at such distance distance as might secure them from the eyes of the envious and from publike judgments, out of which few or none escaped. For which cause Timotheus did passe away much part of his time in the Ile of Lesbos, Iphicrates in Thrace; and Chabrias now did carry away into Cyprus a greater force than his Countie could well have spared: with which he returned not when the businesse in Cyprus came to an end, but sought new adventures in Egypt; whereby arose neither thanks to himself, nor profit to his Citie, though a notable blow given unto them, shortly after that Chabrias was gone to Cyprus, even within their own Haven. For Telentius, a Lacedæmonian, being made Governour of Egina, conceived a strong hope of surprizing the Navie of Athens, as it lay in Triari; thinking a night that it was an harder matter to encounter with ten ships prepared for the fight, than with twentie lying in harbour, whose Marriners were asleep in their Cabbins, or drinking in Taverns. Wherefore he sailed by night into the mouth of the Port, which entering at the break of day, he found (according to his expectation) most of the men on shore, and few or none left aboard to make resistance: by which means he took many ships laden with merchandizes, many fisher-men, passengers, and other Vessels, all three or four Gallies, having sunk or broken, and made unsevicable, as many of the rest as the time would suffer. About this time Pharnabazus, the Lieutenant of Egypt, had one of the Kings daughters given to him in marriage, with whom he lived about the Court; and many officers that favoured the Lacedæmonians were placed in the lower Asia; by whose assistance the Fleet of Sparta grew victorious about Hellepont; in such wise, that perhaps they should not have needed the peace, which they themselves procured by Antalcidas, from the great King; the conditions whereof were such as are mentioned before, giving freedom to all the Cities of Greece; and dividing the Countie into as many severall States as were petty Boroughs in it. Thus Artaxerxes having bought his own peace with money, did likewise by his money become Arbitrator and decider of Controversies between the Greeks, disposing of their businesse in such wise as stood best with his own good. The Tenor of Artaxerxes his decreet was, That all Asia and Cyprus should be his own; the Isles of Lemnos, Imbrus, and Sirius be subject to Athens; all other Greek Towns, as well the little as the great, be set at libertie; and that whosoever should refuse this peace, upon them the approvers of it should make war; the King assisting them by Land and Sea, with men, and ships, and treasure. The Athenians were so discouraged by their losses at Sea, the Lacedæmonians by revolt of their Confederates, and the necessitie of maintaining many Garrisons, for which they wanted money; and other States by the miseries of the war, whereof they saw no end; that all (excepting the Thebans) did consent unto these Articles. This was called the peace of Antalcidas: whereof the Lacedæmonians taking upon themselves the execution, did not only compell the Athens to depart out of Corinth (which under pretence of defending they held by Garrisons, lately thrust into it, not as Patrons, but as Lords) and the Thebans to leave Beotia, a free of which Province Thebes had alwaies held the government, the Thebans themselves being also comprehended under the name of the Boeotians; but caused the Macedonians to throw down their own Citie, and to dwell in villages: alleging that they had formerly bin accustomed so to do, though purposing indeed to chastise them, as having bin ill affected to Sparta in the late War. By these courses the Lacedæmonians did hope that all the small towns in Greece would, when occasion should require it, willingly follow them in their wars, as Authors of their libertie; and that the great Cities having lost all their dependants, would be unable to make opposition.

The war which the Lacedæmonians made upon Olynthus. They take Thebes by treason; and Olynthus by famine.

WHILE these wars, which ended without either victory or profit, consumed the riches and power of Greece, the Citie of Olynthus in Thrace was grown so mighty, that she did not only command her neighbour Towns, but was also become terrible to places far removed, and to Sparta it self. Great part of Macedonia, together with Pella, the principall Citie of that Kingdome, was taken by the Olynthians,
Sff

Olynthians, who following the usuall pretence of the Lacedæmonians, to set at liberty the places over which King Amyntas did tyrannize, had almost now driven him out of his Dominions, and taken all to themselves. The Citizens of Acanthus and of Apollonia being nearest unto the danger of those incroaching neighbours, acquainted the Lacedæmonians with their fear, affirming that this Dominion of the Olynthians would be too strong for all Greece, if continuance of time should give it reputation, which onely it wanted: wherefore they requested assistance, but in such termes as did sound of compulsion, protesting that either they must war upon Olynthus, or become subject unto her, and fight in her defence. Hereupon was made a hastie levie of men, two thousand being presently sent away, with promise to be seconded by a greater Army. Whilest these two thousand gave such beginning to the war, as agreed with their small number, the body of the Army following them, surprized the Cittadell of Thebes, which was betrayed into the hand of Phæbidas the Lacedæmonian, by some of the Magistrates, who sought to strengthen their faction by the slavery of their Country. The Thebans were ill affected to Sparta, but had not in any point violated the peace lately made between them, which caused the Lacedæmonians to doubt whether this act of Phæbidas were more worthy of reward or of punishment. In conclusion, profit so far over-weighed honestie, that the deed was approved, many principall Citizens of Thebes condemned to death, many driven into banishment, and the Traitors rewarded with the government of the citie: by whose authoritie, and the force of the Garrison, the Thebans were compelled to serve the Lacedæmonians in all, and more than all that they could require. This access of power having strengthened the Lacedæmonians, caused them to entertain the greater forces about Olynthus, which (notwithstanding the losse of one great battell, and some other difasters) they compelled at length by famine to render it self unto their obedience.

After this Olynthian War, which endured almost three years, it seemed that no Estate in Greece was able to make head against that of Sparta: but it was not long ere the Thebans found a means to shake off their yoke, and gave both example and means to others to doe the like. One of the banisht men found by conference with a Scribe of the Theban Magistrates, comming to Athens, that the tyrannie wherewith his Countrey was oppressed, pleased him no better than it did those who for fear of it were fled from home. Whereupon a plot was laid between these two, that soon found very good successe, being managed thus. Seven of the banished men forsook Athens privily, and entred by night into the fields of Thebes; where spending the next day secretly, they came late in the evening to the Gates like husband-men returned from work, and so passed undiscovered unto the house of Charon, whom Phyllidas the Scribe had drawn into the conspiracie. The day following, a solemn feast being then held in the Citie, Phyllidas promised the Governours, who were insolent and lustful men, that he would convey unto them that night the most beautifull Dames of the Town, with whom they should take their pleasure. Having cheared them with such hope, and plentie of good wine, he told them when the time of performance (which they urged) came, that he could not make good his promise, unless they would dismiss their followers, because the Gentlewomen, who attended without the Chamber, would not endure that any of the servants should see their faces. Upon this occasion the attendants were dismissed, and the Conspirators, attired like Ladies and their Maids, brought into the place; who taking advantage of the Governours loose behaviour, slew them all upon the sudden with Daggers, which they brought hidden under their garments. Then presently casting off their disguise, they went to other places, where feigning themselves to come to the Governours upon businesse, they got admittance, and likewise slew those which were of the Lacedæmonian faction. By the like device they brake into the prison, slew the Gaoler, & set at liberty such as they thought meet; and being followed by these desperate men, proclaimed libertie, making the death of the Tyrants known. The Captain of the Castle hearing the sudden Proclamation, thought the Rebels to be stronger than indeed they were: the Citizens contrariwise mistrusted, that it was a a practice to discover such as would be forward upon occasion of revolting. But as soon as day-light revealed the plain truth, all the people took armes and besieged the Castle, sending hastily to Athens for succour. The Garrison also sent for aid unto the Towns adjoining, whence a few broken troupes comming to the rescue, were defeated on the way by the horse-men of Thebes. On the other side the banished Thebans did not only make speed to assist their Countreymen, but procured some Athenians to joyn with them, and thereby came so strong into the Citie, that the Castle was yeilded, more through fear than any necessitie, upon condition that the Souldiers might quietly depart with their Armes, for which composition the Captaine at his return to Sparta was put to death. When the news of the doings at Thebes, and the successe arrived at Sparta, an Army was raised forthwith, and all things prepared as earnestly for the recovering of that Citie, as if some part of their ancient inheritance had bin taken from the Lacedæmonians, and not a town perfidiously usurped by them, restored to her own libertie. Gleombrotus, one of the Kings, was sent on this expedition, who having wearied his followers with a tedious Winters journe, returned home without any good or harm done, leaving Sphodrias, with part of his Armie, at Thespiæ to infect the Thebans; who doing them some displeasures, made large amends by a foolish attempt upon the Haven of Athens, which failing to take, he wasted the countrey adjoining, and drave away Cattel, causing by this outrage the Athenians to enter with all their power into the war, out of which they were before very carefully seeking how they might possibly with-draw themselves.

CHAP. XII.

Of the flourishing estate of Thebes, from the battell of Leuctra, to the battell of Mantinæa.

How Thebes and Athens joyned together against Sparta. How the Athenians made peace for themselves, and others, out of which the Thebans were excluded. The battell of Leuctra, and beginning of the Theban greatnesse.

The Lacedæmonians were men of great resolution, and of much gravitie in all their proceedings; but one dishonourable rule they held, That all respects withstanding the commodity of Sparta were to be neglected; the practice of which doctrine, even by the best and wisest of them, did greatly blemish that Estate: but when it was put in execution by insufficient over-weening men, it seldom failed to bring upon them in stead of profit unjustly expected, both shame and losse. And so it befell them in these enterprises of Phæbidas, upon the Castle of Thebes, and Sphodrias upon the Piræus. For, howsoever Agésilæus did spoyl the Countrey about Thebes, in which he spent two Summers, yet the diligence of the Thebans repaired all, who by the good successe of some attempts, grew stronger than they were at the first.

The Athenians likewise began to look abroad, sayling to the Isle of Corcyra, where they ordered things at their pleasure, and having in some fights at Sea prevailed, began, as in the Peloponnesian War, to surround Peloponnesus with a Navie, afflicting so the Lacedæmonians, that had not the Thebans by their insolencie wearied their friends, and caused them to seek for peace, it had bin very likely that the end of this war, should have soon come to a good end, which nevertheless, being prosecuted by the Thebans (who opposed at once both these two great Estates) left the Citie of Sparta as much dejected, as the beginning found it proud and tyrannous. But the Athenians perceiving how Thebes encroached every day upon her weak Neighbours, not sparing such as had bin dependants upon Athens, and finding themselves, whilest engaged in such a war, unable to relieve their complaining friends, resolved to settle the affairs of Greece, by renewing that form of peace which Antalcidas had brought from the Persians. Wherefore they sent Messengers to Thebes, peremptorily signifying, That it was their intent to finish the War; to which purpose they willed the Thebans to send Embassadors along with them to Sparta, who readily condescended, fearing otherwise that they should be left out of the Treatie of peace: which came to passe, being so wrought by the courageous wisdom of Epaminondas, who understood far better than his Countrymen, what was to be feared or hoped. In this Treatie the Lacedæmonians and Athenians did soon agree; but when the Thebans offered to swear to the Articles in the name of the Bæotians, Agésilæus required them to swear in their own name, and to leave the Bæotians free, whom they had lately reduced under their obedience. Whereunto Epaminondas made answer, That the Citie of Sparta should give example to Thebes by setting the Lacædæmonians free; for that the Signorie of Bæotia did by as good right appertain to the Thebans, as that of Laconia to the Spartans. This was well and truly spoken; but was heard with no patience: For Agésilæus bearing a vehement hatred unto those of Thebes, by whom he was drawn back out of Messia into Greece, and disappointed of all the glory which he had hoped to achieve by the Persian war, did now passionately urge that point of setting the Bæotians at libertie; and finding it as obstinately refused, he dashed the name of the Thebans out of the league. At the same time Cleombrotus the other King of Sparta, lay in Phocia, who received command from the Governours of Sparta forthwith to enter upon the Land of the Thebans with all his power; which he did, and was there slain at Leuctra, and with him the flower of his Armie. This battell of Leuctra, being one of the most famous that ever were fought between the Greeks, was not so notable for any circumstance foregoing it, or for the managing of the fight it self, as for the death of the King, and many Citizens of Sparta, but especially, for that after this battell (between which and the conclusion of the generall peace there passed but twenty daies) the Lacædæmonians were never able to recover the strength and reputation which had formerly made them redoubted far and neer; whereas contrariwise the Thebans, whose greatest ambition had in former times confined it self unto the little Region of Bæotia, did now begin to undertake the leading and command of many people and estates, in such wise, that soon after they brought an Armie of threescore and ten thousand strong unto the Gates of Sparta. So much doe the afflictions of an hard war, valiantly endured, advance the affairs of the distressed, and guide them into the way of conquest, by stiffening that resolution with a manly temper, which wealth and ease had through luxury, retchlesnesse, and many other vices or vanities, made rustie and effeminate.

How the Athenians took upon them to maintain the peace of Greece. New troubles hence arising. Epaminondas invadeth and wasteth the Territorie of Lacedæmon.

The Athenians refusing to take advantage of this overthrow fallen upon their old Enemies, and new Confederates the Lacædæmonians, did nevertheless finely give them to understand, that their Dominion was expired, and therefore their pride might well be laid away. For taking upon themselves the maintenance of the peace lately concluded, which Agésilæus (perhaps of purpose to make benefit of quarrels that might arise) had left imperfect, they assembled the Deputies of all the Estates confederated at Athens; where the generall libertie of all Towns, as well small as great, was ratified under the stile of the Athenians, and their associates. Hereupon began fresh garboiles. The Mantineans, claiming power by this decree to order their affairs at their own pleasure, did (as it were) in despite of the Spartans, who had enforced them to raze their Town, re-edifie it, and allie themselves with such of the Arcadians as stood worst affected to Sparta. The Arcadians, a strong Nation, consisting of many Cities, were distracted with factions; some desiring to hold good correspondency with the Lacædæmonians, some to weaken & keep them low, yet all pretending other ends. The Lacædæmonians durst not give impeachment to the Mantineans, nor take upon them to correct their ill-willers among the Arcadians, till such time as the factions brake out into violence, & each partie called in forraign help. Then was an Armie sent from Sparta, as it were in defence of the people of Tegea, against the Mantineans, but indeed against them both. Agésilæus had the leading of it, but effected nothing. The Thebans had by this time subdued the the Phocians, and were become head of the Locrians, Acarnanians, Eubæans, and many others; with the power of which Countries they entred Peloponnesus in favour of the Arcadians, who had, upon expectation of their coming, abstained from giving battell to Agésilæus. The Armie of the Spartans being dismissed, and Epaminondas joyned with the Arcadians, the Region of Laconia was invaded and spoiled: a thing so strange, that no Oracle could have found belief if any had foretold it. Almost 600. years were spent, since the Dorians, under the posteritie of Hercules, had seized upon Laconia, in all which time the sound of an enemies trumpet was not heard in that Countrie. Ten years were not fully past, since all Greece was at the devotion of the Spartans: but now the Region to which neither Xerxes with his huge Armie could once look upon, nor the mightie forces of Athens, and other enemy-States had dared to set foot on, saving by stealth, was all on a light fire, the very smoak whereof the women of Sparta were ashamed to behold. All which indignitie notwithstanding, the Lacædæmonians did not issue out of Sparta to fight, but sought how to preserve the Town, setting at libertie as many of their Helotes or Slaves as were willing to bear Arms in defence of the State, and somewhat pitifully created the Athenians to give them succour. From Corinth and some towns of Peloponnesus they received speedie assistance; the Athenians came forward more slowly, so that Epaminondas returned without battell, having re-built the Citie of Messene, and peopled it a-new by calling home the ancient Inhabitants, whom the Lacædæmonians many ages before had chased away to other Countries, possessing their Territories themselves.

S. III.

The Composition between Athens and Sparta for command in War against the Thebans; who again invade and spoil Peloponnesus. The unfortunate presumption of the Arcadians.

This journey therefore utterly defaced the reputation of the Spartans, in such wise, that they did no longer demand the conduct of the Armie, which was to be raised, nor any manner of precedence: but sending Embassadors from Sparta, and from all the Cities which held league with it, unto Athens, they offered to yeeld the Admiraltie to the Athenians, requesting that they themselves might be Generals by Land. This had been a composition well agreeing with the situation and qualitie of those two Cities; but it was rejected, because the Mariners and others that were to be employed at Sea, were men of no mark or estimation, in regard of those companies of horse and foot, whereof the Land-Armie was compounded, who being all Gentlemen or Citizens of Athens, were to have served under the Lacædæmonians. Wherefore it was agreed that the Authoritie should be divided by time, the Athenians ruling five daies, the Lacædæmonians other five, and so successively that each of them should have command of all, both by Land and by Sea. It is manifest, that in this conclusion vain ambition was more regarded than the common profit; which must of necessitie be very slowly advanced, where consultation, resolution, and performance are so often to change hands. This appeared by a second invasion of Peloponnesus, wherein the Thebans found their enemies so unable to impeach them, that having fortified Isthmus from Sea to Sea, as in former times they had done against Xerxes, they were driven out of their strength by Epaminondas, who foraged the Countrie without resistance. But as the Articles of this league between Athens and Sparta did, by dividing the conduct in such manner, disable the societie, and make it insufficient to those ends for which it was concluded; so the example of it wrought their good, by filling the enemies heads with the like vanitie. For the Arcadians considering their own numbers which they brought into the field, and having found by many trials that their people were not inferiour to others in strength of body, in courage, or in good Souldiership, thought it good reason that they should in like manner share the government, with their friends the Thebans; and not alwaies continue followers of others, by increasing whose greatnesse they should strengthen their own yoke. Hereupon they began to demean themselves very insolently, wherby they grew hateful to their Neighbours, and suspected of the Thebans in an ill time. For a motion of generall peace having been made (which took not effect, because the Citie of Messene was not abandoned to the Lacædæmonians) the next enterprise of the Spartans and their friends was upon these Arcadians, who relying too much upon their own worth, were overthrown in a great battell, their calamitie being as pleasing to their Confederates, as to their Enemies.

S. IV.

The great growth of the Theban Estate. Embassages of the Greeks to the Persian, with the reasons why he most favoured the Thebans. Troubles in the Persian Empire. The fruitlesse issue of the Embassages.

THe Thebans especially rejoiced at the Arcadians misfortune, considering, that without their aid, the successe of all enterprises proved so ill; whereas they themselves had by their own power accomplished very well whatsoever they took in hand, and were become not onely victorious over the Lacedæmonians, but patrons over the Theſſalonians, and moderators of great quarrels that had risen in Macedonia; where compounding the differences about that Kingdome, as pleased them best, they carried Philip the son of Amyntas, and father of Alexander the Great, as an Hostage unto Thebes. Having therefore obtained such reputation, that little seemed wanting to make them absolute Commanders of all Greece, they sought means of alliance with the Persian King, to whom they sent Embassadour the great and famous Captain Pelopidas, whose reputation drew Artaxerxes to grant unto the Thebans all that they desired; whereof two especial points were, That Messene should remain free from the Lacedæmonians, and that the Athenians should forbear to send their ships of warre to Sea; only the latter of these two was somewhat qualified with reference to further advice. The other States of Greece did also send their Embassadours at the same time, of whom few or none received much contentment. For the king having found by long experience, how farre it concerned him to maintain a sure partie in Greece, did upon many weighty considerations resolve to bind the Thebans firmly unto him; justly expecting, that their greatnesse should be on that side his own securitie. The Athenians had been ancient enemies to his Crown; and having turned the profit of their victories upon the Persians to the purchase of a great Estate in Greece, maintained their Signorie in such puissant manner, that sundrie grievous misfortunes notwithstanding they had endured a terrible waire, wherein the Lacedæmonians being followed by most of the Greeks, and supplied with treasure, and all sorts of aid by Darius Nothus, were not able to vanquish them till their own indiscretion brought them on their knees. The Lacedæmonians being victorious over Athens, had no sooner established their Dominion at home, than they undertook the conquest of Asia, from which though by the commotion raised in Greece with Persian gold, they were called back, yet having renewed their power, and settled things in Greece, it was not unlikely, that they should upon the next advantage have pursued the same enterprize, had not they been impeached by this Theban Warre. But the Thebans contrariwise had alwayes discovered a good affection to the Crown of Persia. They had sided with Xerxes in his invasion of Greece; with Darius and the Lacedæmonians against Athens: And finally, having offered much contumelie to Agesilaus when he put to Sea, they drew him home by making warre on the Confederates of Sparta. Besides all these their good deservings, they were no Sea-men, and therefore unlikely to look abroad; whereupon if perchance they should have any desire, yet were they disabled by the want of good haven towns, which they could not seize upon without open breach of that peace, whereof they intended to become the Executors, giving libertie to all Cities that had at any time been free. Wherefore Artaxerxes did wholly condescend unto the requests of Pelopidas, as farre forth as he might, without giving open defiance to the rest of Greece; and by that mean he purchased his own quiet, being never afterward molested by that Nation in the lower Asia. The ill means which the Greeks had to disturb Artaxerxes, was very beneficiall to the Estate of Persia shortly after these times, in that great rebellion of all the Maritime Provinces. For had then the affairs of Greece been so composed, that any one Citie might without impeachment of the rest have transported an Army to assist the revolting Satraps, or Viceroys of Caria, Phrygia, Lydia, Mysia, Lycia, Pisidia, Pamphilia, Cilicia, Syria, and Phœnicia; humane reason can hardly find the means, by which the Empire could have been preserved from that ruine, which the divine Counsell had deferred unto the dayes of Alexander. But this great conspiracie of so many large and wealthy Provinces, wanting ting a firm body of good and hardy Souldiers, was in short space dissolved, and vanished like a mist, without effect: these effeminate Asiatics wearied quickly with the travells and dangers incident to War, forsaking the common cause, and each man striving to be the first, that by treason to his company should both redeem the former treason to his Prince, and purchase with all his own promotion with increase of riches. Of this commotion, which in course of time followed some actions not as yet related, I have rather chosen to make short mention in this place, than hereafter to interrupt the Narration of things more important, but for that it was like a sudden storm, rashly commenced, idly followed, and foolishly layd down, having made a great noyse without effect, and having small reference to any other action agreeable; as also because in the whole reign of Artaxerxes, from the War of Cyrus to the invasion of Egypt, I find nothing (this insurrection, and a fruitlesse journey against the Cadusians excepted) worthy of any mention, much lesse of digression from the course of the businesse in Greece. All, or the most of his time passed away so quietly, that he enjoyed the pleasures which an Empire so great and wealthy could afford unto so absolute a Lord, with little disturbance. The troubles which he found were only, or chiefly Domesticall; growing out of the hatred which Paryſatis the Queen-Mother bare unto his wife Statira, and to such as had been the greatest enemies to her sonne Cyrus, or gloried in his death: upon whom, when by poyson and mischievous practices she had satisfied her feminine appetite of revenge, thenceforth she wholly applied her self to the Kings disposition, cherishing in him the lewd desire of marrying his own Daughter, and filling him with the persuasion, which Princes not endued with an especiall grace, do readily entertain; That his own will was the supreme law of his subjects, and the rule by which all things were to be measured and adjudged to be good or evil. In this imaginary happinesse Pelopidas, and the other Embassadors of Greece, both found and left him; but left him by so much more assured than they found him, by how much the conclusion of this Treaty with them, being altogether to his own advantage, did seem to promise, if not the perpetuity, a long endurance of the same felicity to him and his, or at the least a full security of danger from Greece, whence only could any danger be feared. But such foundations of eternity layd by mortall men in this transitory world, like the Tower of Babel, are either shaken from heaven, or made vain and unprofitable, ere the frame can be raised to full height, by confusion of tongues among the builders. Hereof was found a good example in the Thebans, & other Estates of Greece that had sent Embassadors to the Persian. For whereas it had been concluded, that all Towns, as well the little as the great, should be set at liberty, and the Thebans made Protectors of this common peace, who thereby should become the judges of all controversies that might arise, and Leaders in War of all that would enter into this Confederacy; the Kings letters being solemnly published at Thebes, in the presence of Embassadors drawn thither from all parts of Greece; when an oath was required for observation of the form of peace therein set down, a dilatory answer was made by the Embassadors, who said, that they were sent to hear the articles; not to swear unto them. Hereby the Thebans were driven to send unto each of the Cities to require the Oath; But in vain. For when the Corinthians had boldly refused it, saying, that they did not need it; others took courage by their example to do the like, disappointing the Thebans of their glorious hopes, to whom this negotiation with Artaxerxes gave neither addition nor confirmation of greatnesse, but left them as it found them to rely upon their own swords.

S. V.

How all Greece was divided between the Athenians and Lacedæmonians on the one side, and Thebans on the other. Of the great tumults rising in Arcadia.

THe condition of things in Greece at that time did stand thus: Athens and Sparta, which in former times had commanded all that Nation, and each upon envie of the others greatnesse drawn all their followers into a cruell intestine Warre, by which the whole Countrey, and especially the Estates of these two Cities, was brought very low, did now conjoyn their forces against the Thebans, who sought to make themselves Lords of all. The Eleans, Corinthians, and Achæans, followed the party of these ancient governing Cities; either for the old reputation of them, & benefits received, or in dislike dislike of those, who by strong hand were ready to become Rulers, to which authoritie they could not suddenly aspire without some injurie and much envie. The Citie of Thebes abounding with men, whom necessitie had made warlike, and many victories in few years had filled with great spirits, and being so mighty independants, that she had reduced all the continent of Greece without Peloponnesus (the Region of Attica, and very little part beside excepted) under such acknowledgement, as wanted not much of meer Vassallage, did hope to bring all Peloponnesus to the like obedience, wherein already she had set good footing by her conjunction with the States of Argos, and of Arcadia. The Argives had been alwayes bad Neighbours to the Spartans, to whom they thought themselves in ancient Nobilitie Superiours, but were farre under them in valour, having been often beaten out of the field by them, and put in danger of losing all: which 10 caused them to suspect and envie nothing more than the greatnesse and honour of Sparta, taking truce with her when she was at rest, and had leisure to bend her whole force against them; but firmly joyning with her enemies whensoever they found her entangled in a difficult warre. As the Argives were, in hatred of Sparta, sure friends of Thebes, so the Arcadians, transported with a great opinion of their own worthinesse, had formerly renounced and provoked against them their old Confederates and Leaders, the Lacedamonians, and were now become very doubtfull adherents to the Thebans. In which regard it was thought convenient by Epaminondas, and the State of Thebes, to send an Armie into Peloponnesus, before such time as these wavering friends should fall further off, and become either Neutrall, or, which was to be feared, open enemies. And surely great cause there was to suspect the worst of them, considering that without consent 20 of the Thebans, they had made peace with Athens, which was very strange, and seemed no lesse to the Athenians themselves, who holding a firm league with Sparta at the same time when the Arcadians treated with them, did nevertheless accept this new Confederacie, not relinquishing the old, because they found that howsoever these Arcadians were enemies to the Lacedamonians, they should hereby be drawn somewhat further from their alliance with Thebes, which without them was unlikely to invade Peloponnesus with a strong Armie. But this did rather hasten, than by any means stay the coming of Epaminondas, who finding the way somewhat more clear for him (because the Citie of Cinizib, which lay upon the Isthmus, and had been adverse to Thebes, was now, by mis- 30 riles of this grievous warre, driven to become Neutrall) took occasion hereby, and by some disorders among the Arcadians, to visit Peloponnesus with an Armie, consisting of all the power of Thebes. A great tumult had risen in Arcadia about consecrated money, which many principall men among them had laid hands on, under pretence of employing it to publike uses. In compounding the differences grown upon this occasion, such as had least will to render account of the money which had come into their hands, procured the Captain of some Theban Souldiers, lying in Tegea, to take prisoners many of their Country-men, as people desirous of innovation. This was done: but the up-raise thereby caused was so great, that the prisoners were forth-with enlarged, and the Arcadians, who had in great numbers taken Arms, with much a-doe scarce pacified. When 40 complaint of the Captains proceedings came to Thebes, Epaminondas turned all the blame upon them, who had made the peace with Athens, letting them know, that hee would be shortly among them, to judge of their fidelity, by the assistance which they should give him, in that war which he intended to make in Peloponnesus. These Lordly words did greatly amaze the Arcadians, who needing not the aid of so mighty a power as he drew along with him, did vehemently suspect that great preparation to be made against themselves. Hereupon such of them as had before sought means to settle the affairs of their Countie, by drawing things to some good conclusion of peace, did now forth-with send to Athens for help, and withall dispatched some of the principall among them as Embassadours to Sparta, by whom they offered themselves to the common defence of 50 Peloponnesus, now ready to be invaded. This Embassage brought much comfort to the Lacedamonians, who feared nothing more than the coming of Epaminondas, against whom they well knew, that all their forces, and best provisions, would be no more than very hardly sufficient. Forbearing therefore to dispute about prerogatives, they (who had been accustomed unto such a supremacie, as they would in no wise communicate with the powerfull Citie of Athens, till other hope of securing their own estate could not be thought upon) did now very gently yield to the Arcadians, that the command of the Armie in chief, should be given for the time, to that Citie in whose Territorie it lay.

A terrible invasion of Peloponnesus by Epaminondas.

Certain it is, that the condition of things did at that time require a very firm consent, and uniform care of the common safetie. For, beside the great forces raised out of the other parts of Greece, the Argives & Messenians prepared with all their strength to joyn with Epaminondas; who having lien a while at Nemea, to intercept the Athenians; received there intelligence, that the Army coming from Athens would passe by Sea, whereupon he dislodged, and came to Tegea, which Citie, and the most of all Arcadia besides, forthwith declared themselves his. The common opinion was, that the first attempt of the Thebans, would be upon such of the Arcadians as had revolted, which 10 called the Lacedamonian Captains to fortifie Mantineaa with all diligence, and to send for Agefilaw, to Sparta, that he bringing with him all that small force of able men which remained in the Town, they might be strong enough to abide Epaminondas there. But Epaminondas held so good espiall upon his Enemies, that had not an unknow fellow 20 brought hasty advertisement of his purpose to Agefilaw, who was then well onward in the way to Mantineaa, the Citie of Sparta had suddenly bin taken. For thither with all speed and secrecie did the Thebans march, who had surely carried the Citie, notwithstanding any defence that could have bin made by that handful of men remaining within it, but that Agefilaw in all flying haste got into it with his companies, whom the Armie of his Confederates followed thither to the rescue as fast as it was able. The arrival of the Lacedamonians and their friends, as it cut off all hope from Epaminondas of taking Sparta, so it presented him with a fair advantage upon Mantineaa. It was the time of Har- 30 vest, which made it very likely, that the Mantineans, finding the war to be carried from their wals into another quarter, would use the commoditie of that vacation, by fetching in their corn, and turning out their cattell into the fields, whilest no enemy was neer that might impeach them. Wherefore he turned away from Sparta to Mantineaa, sending his horse-men before him, to seize upon all that might be found without the Citie. The Mantineans (according to the expectation of Epaminondas) were scattered abroad in the country, far more intent upon their harvest businesse, than upon the war, whereof they were secure, as thinking themselves out of distance. By which presumption it fell out, 40 that great numbers of them, and all their Cattell, being unable to recover the Town, were in a desperate case, and the town it self in no great likelihood of holding out, when the enemy should have taken all their provision of victuals, with so many of the people as had not over-deerly bin redeemed, by that Citie returning to societie with Thebes. But at the same time, the Athenians coming to the succour of their Confederates, whom they thought to have found at Mantineaa, were very earnestly entreated by the Citizens to rescue their goods, and people, from the danger whereinto they were fallen, if it were possible by any courageous adventure to deliver those who otherwise were given as lost. The Thebans were known at that time to be the best Souldiers of all the 50 Greeks, and the commendation of good horsemanship had alwaies bin given to the Thebans, as excelling in that qualitic all other Nations; yet the regard of honour so wrought upon the Athenians, that for the reputation of their Citie, which had entred into this war upon no necessitie of her own, but only in desire of relieving her distressed friends, they issued forth of Mantineaa, not abiding so long as to refresh themselves, or their horses with meat; and giving a lustie charge upon the enemy, who as bravely received them, after a long and hot fight, they remained masters of the field, giving by this victory a safe and easie retreat to all that were without the wals. The whole power of the Boeotians arrived in the place soon after this battell, whom the Lacedamonians and their assistants were not far behind.

E Epaminondas, considering that his Commission was almost now expired, and that his attempts of surprizing Sparta and Mantinea having failed, the impression of terror which his name had wrought in the Peloponnesians, would soon vanish, unless by some notable act he should abate their courage in their first growth; & leave some memorable character of his expedition, resolved to give them battell, whereby he reasonably hoped both to settle the doubtfull affections of his own Associates, and to leave the Spartans as weak in spirit and abilitie, as he found them, if not wholly to bring them into subjection. Having therefore warned his men to prepare for that battell, wherein Glorie should be rewarded with Lordship of all Greece; and finding the alacritie of his Soldiers to be such as promised the accomplishment of his own desire, he made them of declining the enimie, and intrenching himself in a place of more advantage, that by taking from them all expectation of fighting that day, he might allay the heat of their valour, and afterward strike their senses with amazement, when he should come upon them unexpected. This opinion deceived him not. For with very much tumult, as in a great & sudden danger, the enimie ran to Arms, necessity enforcing their resolution, & the consequence of that daies service urging them to do as well as they might. The Theban Army consisted of thirty thousand foot, & three thousand horse; the Lacedemonians and their friends were short of this number, both in horse and in foot, by a third part. The Mantineans (because the war was in their Countrey) stood in the right wing, and with them the Lacedemonians; the Athenians had the left wing; the Achaens, Eleans, and others of lesse account, filled the bodie of the Armie. The Thebans stood in the left wing of their own battell, opposite to the Lacedemonians, having by them the Argives, the Eubaeans, Locrians, Sicyonians, Messenians, and Thessalians with others, compounding the main battell; the Argives held the right wing; the horse-men on each part were placed in the flanks, only a troupe of the Eleans were in rear. Before the footmen could joyn, the encounter of the horse on both sides was very rough, wherein finally the Thebans prevailed, notwithstanding the valiant resistance of the Athenians: whose yielding to the enimie either in courage or skill, were overlayd with numbers, and so beare upon by Thessalian slings, that they were driven to forsake the place, and leave their infanterie naked. But this retreat was the lesse disgracefull, because they kept themselves together, and did not fall back upon their own foot-men; but finding the Thebans horse to have given them over, and withall discovering some Companies of foot, which had bin sent about by Epaminondas, to charge their battell in the rear, they brake upon them, routed them, and hewed them all in pieces. In the mean season the battell of the Athenians had not only to doe with the Argives, but was hardly pressed by the Theban Horsemen, in such wise that it began to open, & was ready to turn back, when the Elean Squadron of Horse came up to the relief of it, and restored all on that part. With far greater violence did the Lacedemonians and Thebans meet, these contending for Dominion, the other for the maintenance of their ancient honour; so that equal courage and equal loss on both sides made the hope and appearance of victorie to either equally doubtfull: unless perhaps the Lacedemonians being very firm abiders, might seem the more likely to prevaile, as having borne the first brunt and furie of the on-set, which was not hitherto remitted; and being framed by discipline, as it were by Nature, to excell in patience, whereof the Thebans, by practice of a few years, cannot be thought to have gotten a habite so sure and generall. But Epaminondas perceiving the obstinate stiffnesse of the Enemies to be such, as neither the bad successe of their own horse, nor all the force of the Boeotian Armie, could abate so far, as to make them give one foot of ground; taking a choice companie of the most able men, whom he cast into the forme of a Wedge, or Diamond, by the advantage of that figure against a Squadron, and by his own exceeding vertue, accompanied with the great strength and resolution of them which followed him, did open their ranks, and cleave the whole battell in despite of all resistance. Thus was the honour of that day won by the Thebans, who may justly be said to have carried the victorie, seeing that they remained Masters of the

the ground whereon the battell was fought, having driven the Enimie to lodge farther off. For that which was alleged by the Athenians, as a token that the victorie was partly theirs, the slaughter of those Mercenaries upon whom they lighted by chance in their own fight, finding them behind their Army, & the retaining of their dead bodies, it was a ceremony regardable only among the Greeks, and served merely for ostentation, shewing that by the fight they had obtained somewhat, which the enemy could not get from them otherwise than by request. But the Thebans arrived at the generall immediate end of battell, none daring to abide them in the field: whereof a manifest confession is expressed from them, who forsake the place which they had chosen or accepted, as indifferent for trial of their abilitie and prowess. This was the last work of the incomparable vertue of Epaminondas, who being in the head of that Warlike troupe of men, which broke the Lacedemonian Squadron, and forced it to give back in disorder, was furiously charged on the sudden, by a desperate Company of the Spartans, who all at once threw their Darts at him alone; whereby receiving many wounds, he nevertheless with a singular courage maintained the fight, using against the enemies many of their Darts, which he drew out of his own body; till at length by a Spartan, called Antiarates, he received so violent a stroke with a Dart, that the wood of it brake, leaving the yron and a peece of the crunction in his breast. Hereupon he sunk down, and was soon conveyed out of the fight by his friends, having by his fall somewhat animated the Spartans (who vain would have got his bodie,) but much more inflamed with revengefull indignation, the Thebans, who raging at this heavy mischance, did with great slaughter compell their disordered enemies to leave the field, though long they followed not the chase, being wearied more with the fadnesse of this disaster, than with all the travell of the day. Epaminondas being brought into his Tent, was told by the Physicians, that when the head of the Dart should be drawn out of his body, he must needs dye. Hearing this he called for his shield, which to have lost, was held a great dishonour: It was brought unto him. He bad them tell him which part had the victorie, answer was made, that the Argives had won the field. Then said he, It is a fair time for me to dye; and withall sent for Solidus and Diophantes, two principall men of War, that were both slain, which being told him, He advised the Thebans to make peace, whilst with advantage they might, for that they had none left that was able to discharge the office of a General. Herewithall he willed, that the head of the weapon should be drawn out of his body, comforting his friends that lamented his death; and want of issue, by telling them, that the victories of Leuctra and Mantinea were two fair daughters, in whom his memory should live.

So died Epaminondas, the worthiest man that ever was bred in that Nation of Greece, and hardly to be matched in any Age or Countrey: for he equalled all others in the severall vertues, which in each of them were singular. His Justice and Sinceritie, his Temperance, Wisdom, and high Magnanimitie, were no way inferior to his Military vertue; in every part whereof he so excelled, that he could not properly be called a Warrior, a Valiant, a Politique, a Bountifull, or an Industrious, and a Provident Captain. Neither was his private Conversation unanswerable to those high parts, which gave him praise abroad. For he was Grave, and yet very Affable and Courteous; resolute in publique business, but in his own particular easie, and of much mildnesse: a lover of his People, bearing with mens infirmities, witty and pleasant in speech, far from insolence, Master of his own affections, and furnished with all qualities that might win and keep love. To these graces were added great ability of body, much Eloquence, and very deep knowledge in all parts of Philosophie and Learning, wherewith his mind being enlightened, rested not in the sweetnesse of Contemplation, but brake forth into such effects as gave unto Thebes, which had ever more bin an underling, a dreadfull reputation among all people adjoining; and the highest command in Greece.

§. VIII.

Of the peace concluded in Greece after the battell of Mantinea. The voyage of Agesilaus into Egypt. His death; and qualities; with an examination of the comparison made between him and Pompey the Roman.

His battell of Mantinea was the greatest that had ever been fought in that Countie between the Naturals; and the last. For at Marathon, and Plataea, the most populous Armies of the barbarous Nations gave rather a great fame, than a hard triall to the Grecian valour; neither were the practice of Armes and Art Militarie so perfect in the beginnings of the Peloponnesian War, as long continuance and daily exercise had now made them. The times following produced no actions of worth or moment, those excepted which were undertaken against forrain enemies, proving for the most part unfortunate. But in this last fight all Greece was interested, which never had more able Souldiers, and brave Commanders, nor ever contended for victory with greater care of the successe, or more obstinate resolution. All which notwithstanding the issue being such as hath bin related, it was found best for every particular Estate, that a general peace should be established, every one retaining what he presently had, and none being forced to depend upon another. The Messenians were by name comprised in this new league; which caused the Lacedemonians not to enter into it. Their standing out hundred not this, yet from preceeding to conclusion, considering that Sparta was now too weak to offend her Neighbours, and therefore might well be allowed to shew that anger in ceremonies, which had no power to declare it self in execution. This peace, as it gave some breath and refreshing to all the Country, so to the Cities of Athens and Sparta it afforded leisure to seek after wealth by forrain employment in Egypt, whither Agesilaus was sent with some small forces to assist, or indeed, as a Mercenarie, to serve under Tachos King of Egypt in his War upon Syria. Chabrias the Athenian, who had before commanded under Acoris King of Egypt, went now as a voluntarie, with such forces as he could raise, by entreatie, and offer of good pay, to the same service. These Egyptian Kings descended from Amyrtasus of Sais, who rebelled against Darius; Nothus, having retained the Country, notwithstanding all intestine dissensions, and forrain invasions, during three Generations of their own race, were so well acquainted with the valour of the Greeks, that by their help (easily procured with gold) they conceived great hope, not onely to assure themselves, but to become Lords of the Provinces adjoining, which were held by the Persian. What the issue of this great enterprise might have been, had it not fallen by Domesticall rebellion, it is uncertain. But very likely it is, that the rebellion it self had soon come to nothing, if Agesilaus had not proved a false Traitor, joyning with Nechanebus, who rose against his Prince, and helping the Rebelle with that Army which the money of Tachos had waged. This falshood Agesilaus excused, as tending to the good of his own Country, though it seem rather, that he grudged because the King took upon himself the conduct of the Armie, using his service onely as Lieutenant, who had made full account of being appointed the General. Howsoever it came to passe, Tachos being shamefully betrayed by them, in whom he had reposed his chief confidence, fled unto the Persian, who upon his submission gave him gentle entertainment; and Nechanebus (who seems to have been the Nephew of Tachos) reigned in his stead. At the same time the Citizens of Mendes had set up another King; to whom all, or most of the Egyptians yielded their obedience. But Agesilaus fighting with him in places of advantage, prevailed so far, that he left Nechanebus in quiet possession of the Kingdome; who in recompence of his treason to the former King Tachos, and good service done to himself, rewarded him with two hundred and thirtie Talents of silver, with which bootie sailing homewards, he died by the way. He was a Prince very temperate, and valiant, and a good Leader in War, free from covetousnesse, and not reproached with any blemish of lust; which praises are the lesse admirable in him, for that the discipline of Sparta was such as did endue every one of the Citizens (not carried away by the violent stream of an ill nature) with all, or the chief of these good qualities. He was nevertheless very arrogant, perverse, unjust and vain-glorious, measuring all things by his own will, and obstinately prosecuting those courses, whose ends were beyond hope. The expedition of Xenophon had filled him him with an opinion, that by his hand the Empire of Persia should be overthrown; with such conceit being transported, and finding his proceedings interrupted by the Thebans and their Allies, he did ever after bear such hatred unto Thebes, as compelled that Estate to meet necessitie to grow war-like; and able, to the utter dishonour of Sparta, and the irreparable loss of all her former greatness. The commendations given to him by Xenophon his good friend, have caused Plutarch to lay his name to the ballance against Pompey the Great, whose actions (the solemn gravitie of carriage excepted) are very disproportioned. Yet we may truly say, That as Pompey made great waiges in sundry Climates and in all the Provinces of the Roman Empire, exceeding in the multitude of imployments all that were before him; so Agesilaus had at one time or other some quarrell with every Town in Greece, had made a Warre in Asia, and meddled in the busines of the Egyptians, in which variety he went beyond all his Predecessours; yet not winning any Countries, as Pompey did many, but obtaining large waiges, which Pompey never took. Herein also they were very like. Each of them was the last great Captain which his Nation brough forth in time of libertie, and each of them ruined the libertie of his Countie by his own Lordly wilfulness. We may therefore well say, Similia magis omnia quam paria; The resemblance was neerer than the equalitie. Indeed the freedome of Rome was lost with Pompey, falling into the hands of Caesar, whom he had informed to take Armes; yet the Roman Empire stood, the form of Government onely being changed: But the libertie of Greece, or of Sparta it self, was not forfeited unto the Thebans; whom Agesilaus had compelled to enter into a victorious Warre; yet the Signiorie, and ancient renown of Sparta was presently lost; and the freedome of all Greece being wounded in this Theban warre, and after much bloud lost, ill healed by the peace ensuing, did very soon, upon the death of Agesilaus, give up the ghost, and the Lordship of the whole Countie was seized by Philip King of Macedon, whose actions are now on foot, and more, to be regarded than the Contemporarie passages of things, in any other Nation.

THE FOURTH BOOK.

CHAP. I.

Of Philip the father of Alexander the Great, King of Macedon.

What Kings reigned in Macedon before Philip.

LHE Greeks, of whom we have already made large discourse, not as yet wearied with intestine War, nor made wise by their vain contention for superiority, doe still, as in former times, continue the invasion and vastation of each other.

Against Xerxes, the greatest Monarch of that part of the world, they defended their libertie, with as happy successe as ever Nation had, and with no lesse honour, than hath ever been acquired by deeds of Arms. And having had a triall and experience, more than fortunate, against those nations, they so little regarded what might come from them, who had so often forfeited the reputation of their forces, as whatsoever could be spared from their own distraction at home, they transported over the Hellefont, as sufficient, to entertain and buse them withall.

But, as it commonly falleth out with every man of mark in the world, that they underfall, and perish by the hands and harmes which they least fear, so fared it at this time, with the Greeks. For of Philip of Macedon (of whom we are now to speak) they had so little regard, as they grew even then more violent in devouring each other, when the fast-growing greatnesse of such a Neighbour-King, should, in regard of their own safeties, have served them for a strong argument of union and accord. But the glorie of their Persian victories, wherewith they were pampered and made proud, taught them to neglect all Nations but themselves, and the rather to value at little the power and purposes of the Macedonians, because those Kings and States, which fate nearer them than they did, had in the time of Amyntas, the father of Philip, so much weakened them, and won upon them, that they were not (as the Grecians perswaded themselves) in any one age, likely to recover recover their own, much lesse to work any wonders against their borderers. And, indeed, it was not in their Philosophie to consider, That all great alterations are storm-like, sudden, and violent; and that it is then over-late to repair the decayed and broken banks, when great rivers are once swollen, fast-running, and intaged. No, the Greeks did rather imploy themselves, in breaking down those defences which stood between them and this inundation, than seek to rampire and re-enforce their own fields, which by the Levell of reason they might have found to have lien under it. It was therefore well concluded by Croesus: Græcia Civitates imperare singula cupiunt, imperium omnes perdidit. The Cities of Greece lost their command, by striving each of them to command all.

The Kingdom of Macedon, so called of Macedon, the son of Ofris, or, as other Authors affirm, of Jupiter and Asia, is the next Region towards the North which bordereth Greece; It hath to the East, the Aegean Sea; it is bounded on the North and North-west, by the Thracians and Illyrians; and on the South and South-west by Thessaly and Epirus.

Their Kings were of the familie of Temenus, of the race of Hercules, and by nation Argives; who are listed as followeth. About some six years after the translation of the Assyrian Empire, Arbaces then governing Media, Caranus of Argos, commanded by an Oracle, to lead a Colonie into Macedon, departed thence with many people, and as he was marching through that Countie, the weather being raynt and tempestuous, he espied a great herd of Goats, which fled the storm as fast as they could, halting them to their known place of covert. Whereupon Caranus, calling to mind, that he had also by another Oracle bin directed, to follow the first troupe of beasts, that should either lead him, or lie before him, He pursued these Goats to the Gates of Edessa, and being undiscovered by the Inhabitants, by reason of the darknesse of the air, he entered their Citie without resistance, and possess it. Soon after this, by the overthrow of Cisseus, Caranus became Lord of the rest of Macedon, and held it eight and twenty years. Ceanus succeeded Caranus, and reigned twelve years. Tyrinus followed Ceanus, and ruled eight and twenty years.

Perdiccas the first, the son of Tyrinus, governed one and fifty years: a Prince, for his great valour, and many other vertues, much renowned. Solinus, Plinie, Iustine, Eusebius, Theophilus, Antiochenus, and others, affirm, that he appointed a place of buriall for himself, and for all the Kings of Macedon his Successors, at Aega: assuring them, that the Kingdome should so long continue in his Line and Race, as they continued to lay up their bodies in that Sepulchre, wherein it is said, that because Alexander the Great failed, therefore the posteritie of the Temenide failed in him: a thing rather devised after the effect, as I conceive, than foretold by Perdiccas.

Argæus succeeded unto Perdiccas, and ruled eight and twenty years.

Philip the first, his successor, reigned eight and twentie years.

Europus followed Philip, and governed six and twenty years: in whose infancie the Illyrians invaded Macedon, and having obtained a great victory, they pursued the same, to the great danger of that State. Whereupon the Macedonians, gathering new forces, and resolving either to recover their former losse, or to lose at once both their Kingdome and their King, they carried him with them in his cradle into the field, and returned victorious; for they were either confident that their Nation could not be beaten (their King being present) or rather they perswaded themselves that there was no man so void of honour and compassion, as to abandon their naturall Lord, being an infant, and no way (but by the hands of his servants) able to defend himself from destruction. The like is reported by Aimoni of Clotarius, the son of Fredegunda.

Alceas succeeded Europus, and ruled nine and twentie years.

Amyntas the first succeeded Alceas, and reigned fifty years; He lived at such time as Darius Hyaspes, after his unprosperous return out of Scythia, sent Megabazus with an Armie into Europe, who in Xerxes' name required Amyntas to acknowledge him for his Supreme Lord, by yielding unto him Earth and Water. But his Embassadors, as you have heard before, were, for their insolent behaviour towards the Macedonian Ladies, slain by the direction of Alexander, who was the son of Amyntas, and his Successor.

Alexander surnamed the Rich, the son of Amyntas, governed Macedon three and fortie fortie years. He did not only appease the wrath of Megabazus, for the slaughter of the Persian Embassadors, by giving Gygea his Sister, to Bubares of the bloud of Perſia, but by that match he grew to great in Xerxes grace, as he obtained all that Region between the Mountains of Olympus and Hemus, to be united to the Kingdome of Macedon. Yet could not these benefits buy his affection from the Greeks. For Xerxes being returned into Asia, and Mardonius made Generall of the Persian Armie; Alexander acquainted the Greeks with all his intents and purposes against them. He had three sons, Perdiccas, Alcetas, and Philip.

Perdiccas the second, the son of Alexander, lived in the time of the Peloponnesian war, and reigned in all eight and twenty years. The wars which he made were not much remarkable: the Storie of them is found here and there by pieces in Thucydides his first six Books. He left behind him two sons; Perdiccas, who was very young; and Archelaus, who was base borne.

Perdiccas the third, being delivered to the custodie and care of Archelaus, was at seven years of age cast into a Well and drowned by his false Guardian: who excusing this fact to Cleopatra the mother of the young King, said, That the child in following a Goose hastily, fell thereinto by misadventure. But Archelaus stayed not here: for having thus dispatched his brother, he slew both his Uncle Alcetas the son of Alexander the Rich, and Alexander the son of this Alcetas, his Cousin Germain, and enjoyed the Kingdome of Macedon himself four and twentie years.

This Archelaus, of whom both Plato and Aristotle make mention, though he made himself King by wicked murder, yet he performed many things greatly to the profit of his Nation. It is said, That he sought by all means to draw Socrates unto him, and that he greatly loved and honoured Eurypides the Tragedian. He had two sons, Archelaus and Orestes.

Archelaus the second succeeded his father, and having reigned seven years, he was slain in hunting, either by chance, or of purpose, by Crataus.

Orestes his younger son was committed to the education of Eropeus, of the royall bloud of Macedon, and had the same measure which Archelaus had measured to his Pupill, for Eropeus murdered him and usurped the Kingdome, which he held some six years: the same who denied passage to Agessilaus King of Sparta, who desired after his return from the Asian expedition, to passe by the way of Macedon into Greece.

Diod. Polyen.
Plut. in Demet.

This Usurper left three sons, Pausanias, Argaeus, and Alexander. Pausanias succeeded his father Eropeus, and having reigned one year, he was driven out by Amyntas the son of Philip, the son of the first Perdiccas, the son of Alexander the Rich; which Philip was then preserved, when Archelaus the Bastard slew his brother Perdiccas, his uncle Alcetas, and his son Alexander. This Amyntas reigned (though very unquietly) four and twentie years; for he was not only infested by Pausanias, assisted by the Thracians, and by his brother Argaeus, encouraged by the Illyrians; and by the said Argaeus, for two years dispossessed of Macedon: but on the other side, the Olynthians, his Neighbours near the Aegean Sea, made themselves for a while Masters of Pella, the chief Citie of Macedon.

Amyntas the second had by his wife Eurydice the Illyrian, three sons; Alexander the second, Perdiccas the third, and Philip the second, Father of Alexander the Great; and one Daughter called Euryone or Exione. He had also by his second Wife Gygea, three Sons; Archelaus, Argaeus, and Menelaus, afterward slain by their brother Philip. He had more by a Concubine, Protomie surnamed Alorites, of the Citie of Alorus, where in he was born.

Alexander the second reigned not much above one year, in which time he was invaded by Pausanias, the son of Eropeus, but defended by Iphicrates the Athenian, while he was at that time about Amphipolis. He was also constrained (for the payment of a great sum of money) to leave his youngest brother Philip in Hostage with the Illyrians, who had subjected his father Amyntas to the payment of tribute. After this, Alexander being invited by the Alevade against Alexander the tyrant of Pheres in Thessalie, having redeemed his brother Philip; to draw the Thebans to his assistance, entred into Confederacie with Pelopidas, being at that time in the same Countie, with whom he also left Philip with divers other principall persons, for the gage of his promises to Pelopidas. But Eurydice his mother falling in love with her Son-in-law, who had married her Daughter Daughter Euryone or Exione, practised the death of Alexander her son, with a purpose to conferré the Kingdome on her Paramour, which Ptolomy Alorites did put in execution: by means whereof he held Macedon for three years, but was soon after slain by Perdiccas the brother of Alexander. Didone hath it otherwise of Philip being made pledge and faith, That Amyntas his father delivered him for hostage to the Illyrians, by whom he was conveyed to Thebes, there to be kept: others report that Philip (while his father was yet living) was first ingaged to the Thebans, and delivered for hostage, a second time by Alexander his brother.

Perdiccas the third, after he had slain Alorites his base brother, governed Macedon five years, and was then slain in a battell against the Illyrians, according to Didoneus, but Philip affirmeth that he perished by the practice of Eurydice his mother, as Alexander did.

The beginning of Philip's reign: and how he delivered Macedon from the troubles wherein hee found it intangled.

Philip the second, the youngest son of Amyntas by Eurydice, having bin instructed in all knowledge requisite unto the government of a Kingdome, in that excellent education which he had under Epaminondas, making an escape from Thebes, returned into Macedon, in the first year of the hundred and fifth Olympiad, which was after the building of Rome three hundred fourscore and thirteen years; and finding the many enemies and dangers wherewith the Kingdome was environed, he took on him, not as a King (for Perdiccas left a son, though but an infant) but as the Protector of his Nephew, and Commander of the men of war. Yet his fruitfull ambition soon over-grew his modestie, and he was easily perswaded by the people to accept both the title of King, and withall, the absolute rule of the Kingdome. And to say the truth, the necessitie of the State of Macedon at that time required a King both prudent and active. For, besides the incursions of the Illyrians and Pannonians, the King of Thrace did set up in opposition Pausanias; the Athenians, Argaeus, sons of the late Usurper Eropeus: each of these labouring to place in Macedon a King of their own election. These heave burdens when Philip could not well bear, he bought off the weightiest by mony; and by fair promises unloaded himself of so many of the rest, as he ran under the remainder happily enough. For, notwithstanding that his brother Perdiccas had his death accompanied with four thousand Macedonians, beside those that were wounded and taken prisoners; and that the Pannonians were destroying all before them in Macedon; and that the Athenians with a Fleet by Sea, and three thousand Souldiers by Land under Mantias, did bear upon him on all sides & quarters of his Countie: yet after he had practised the men of war of Pannonia, and corrupted them with gifts; and had also bought the King of Thrace from Pausanias, he forthwith made head against the Athenians his stiffest enemies; and, for the first, he prevented their recovery of Amphipolis, a Citie on the frontier of Macedon: and did then pursue Argaeus the son of Eropeus, set against him by the Athenians, and followed him so hard at the heels, in his retreat from Eges, that he forced him to abide the battell: which Argaeus lost, having the greatest part of his Armie slain in the place. Those of the Athenians, and others which remained unbroken, took the advantage of a strong peece of ground at hand, which though they could not long defend, yet avoyding thereby the present furie of the Souldiers, they obtained of the vanquishers life and libertie to return into Attica. Whereupon a peace was concluded between him and the Athenians for that present, and for this clemencie he was greatly renowned and honoured by all the Greeks.

s. III.

The good successes which Philip had in many enterprises.

Now had Philip leisure to look Northward, and to attend the Illyrians and Pannonians, his irreconcilable enemies and borderers: both which hee invaded with so prosperous successe, as he slew Bardillis, King of the Illyrians, with seven thousand of his Nation, and thereby recovered all those places which the Illyrians held in Macedon: and withall upon the death of the King of Pannonia, he pierc'd that Country, and after a main victory obtained, he enforc'd them to pay him tribute. This was no sooner done than (without staying to take longer breath) he hastned speedily towards Larissa, upon the river Peneus in Thessaly, of which Town he soon made himself master; and thereby he got good footing in that Country, whereof he made use in time following. Now although he resolv'd either to subdue the Thessalians, or to make them his own against all others, because the horse-men of that Country were the best, and most feared in that part of Europe; yet he thought it most for his safety to close up the entrances out of Thrace, lest while he invaded Thessaly and Greece towards the South, those ample Nations, lying towards the North, should either withdraw him, or over-run Macedon, as in former times. He therefore attempted Amphipolis, seated on the famous river of Strimon, which parteth Thrace from Macedon, and won it. He also recovered Pydna; and (to the North of Amphipolis) the City of Crenides (sometime Datus) and called it after his name Philippi: to the people whereof Saint Paul afterward directed one of his Epistles. This place, wherein Philippi stood, is very rich in mines of gold, out of which, greatly to the advancement of Philips affairs, he drew yearly a thousand talents, which make six hundred thousand French Crowns.

And that he might with the more ease disburden the Thracian shores of the Athenian Garrisons, to which he had given a great blow by the taking in of Amphipolis, he entred into league with his fathers malicious enemies, the Olynthians; whom the better to fasten unto him, he gave them the City of Pynda with the territory, meaning nothing lesse than that they should enjoy it, or their own Estate, many years.

Now that he might by degrees win ground upon the Greekes, hee took the fair occasion to deliver the City of Pheres in Thessaly, from the tyrants Lycophron and Tisiphonus: who, after they had conspired with Thebe the wife of Alexander, who usurped upon the liberty of that State, they themselves (Alexander being murdered) held it also by the same strong hand and oppression that Alexander did, till by the assistance of Philip they were beaten out, and Pheres restored to her former liberty. Which act of Philip did for ever after fasten the Thessalians unto him, and, to his exceeding great advantage, binde them to his service.

S. IV.

Of the Phocian War which first drew Philip into Greece.

About this time, to wit, in the second year of the hundred and sixth Olympiad, eight years after the battell of Mantineea, and about the eighth year of Artaxerxes Ochus, began that War, called Sacred. Now, as all occasions concur towards the execution of eternal providence, and of every great alteration in the World, there is some preceding preparation, though not at the first easily discerned; so did this revengefull hatred by the Thebans, Thessalians, and Locrians, conceived against the Phocians, not only teach Philip how he might with half a hand wrest the sword out of their fingers; but the Greekes themselves, beating down their own defences, to give him an easie passage; and beating themselves, to give him victory without perill, left nothing unperformed towards their own slavery, saving the title and imposition. Of this War the Thebans (made over-proud by their victory at Leuctres) were the inflamers. For at the Councell of the Amphyctyones, or of the general Estates of Greece, in which at that time they sway'd most, they caus'd both the Lacedaemonians and Phocians to be condemn'd in greater summes of money than they could well bear; the one for surprizing the Castle of Cadmea in the time of peace, the other for ploughing up a piece of ground belonging to the Temple of Delphos. The Phocians being resolv'd not to obey this Edict, were secretly set on, and encouraged by the Lacedaemonians: and for refusall were expos'd as Sacrilegers, and accus'd to all their neighbour-Nations, for whom it was then lawfull to invade, and destroy them at their pleasures.

The Phocians perswaded thereunto by Philomelus, a Captain of their own, cast the same dice of hazzard that Cesar after many Ages following did; but had not the same chance chance. Yet they dealt well enough with all the enemies of their own Nation. And the better to bear out an ungracious quarrell, of which there was left no hope of composition; they resolv'd to sack the Temple it self. For seeing that for the ploughing of a piece of Apollo's ground, they had so much offended their Neighbour-God, and their Neighbour-Nations, as worse could not befall them than already was intended; they resolv'd to take the gold with the ground, and either to perish for all, or to prevail against all that had commission to call them to account. The treasure which they took out of the Temple in the beginning of the Warre, was ten thousand talents, which in those dayes serv'd them to wage a great many men; and such was their successe in the beginning of the war, as they won three great battels against the Thebans, Thessalians and Locrians; but being beaten in the fourth, their Leader Philomelus cast himself headlong over the Rocks.

In the mean while the Cities of Chersonesus, both to defend themselves against their bad neighbour Philip, who encroach'd upon them, and to draw others into their quarrell, render'd themselves to the Athenians. Philip prepar'd to get them into his hands, and at the siege of Methone lost one of his eyes. It is said, That he that shot him, did purposely direct his arrow toward him, and that it was written on the shaft thereof: After Philippo; After to Philip: for to he was called that gave him the wound. This Cite he even'd with the soil.

Plut. in Vlpiam
Strab. l. 8.

The Tyrant Lycophron before mentioned, while Philip was busied on the border of Thrace, and the Thessalians engag'd in the holy war, entred Thessaly with new forces, being assisted by Onomarchus, Commander of the Phocian Armie, in place of Philomelus. For hereby the Phocians hop'd so to entertain the Thessalians at home, as they should not find leisure to invade them. Hereupon was Philip the second time call'd into Thessalie; but both the Thessalians and Macedonians (Philip being present) were utterly overthrow'n by Onomarchus, and great numbers of both Nations lost. From Thessalie, Onomarchus drew speedily towards Baotia, and with the same victorious Armie brake the forces of the Baotians, and took from them their Cite of Coronea. But Philip, impatient of his late misadventure, after he had re-enforc'd his Armie, return'd with all speed into Thessalie, there to find again the honour which he lately lost: and was the second time encountred by Onomarchus, who brought into the field twentie thousand foot, and five hundred horse. All this great preparation suffic'd not; for Onomarchus was by Philip surmount'd, both in numbers and in good fortune, his Armie overturn'd, six thousand slain, and three thousand taken: of which number himself being one, was among others hang'd by Philip. Those that fled, were in part received by the Athenian Gallies, which sail'd alongst the coast, commanded by Chares; but the greatest number of those that took the Sea, were therein devour'd ere they recovered them. Lycophron was now again driven out of Thessalie, and Pheres made free as before.

S. V.

Of the Olynthian war. The ambitious practices of Philip.

From hence Philip resolv'd to invade Phocis it self, but the Athenians did not favour his entrance into those parts; and therefore with the help of the Lacedaemonians; they retrench'd his passage at the Streits of Thermopylis. Whereupon he return'd into Macedon; and after the taking of Micyberne, Torone, and other Towns, he quarrell'd with the Olynthians, whom not long before he had woo'd to his alliance, and bought his peace of them. For the Olynthians were very strong, and had evermore both brav'd and beaten the Macedonians. It is said, that Philip having put to death Archelaus his half brother (for Amyntas had three sons by Eurydice the Mother of Philip, and three other sons by Gygæa: but Philip's elder brother by the same Mother being dead, he determin'd to rid himself also of the rest) the two younger held themselves within Olynthus; and that the receiving of them by the Olynthians was the cause of the war, Justine affirmeth. But just quarrels are ballanced by just Princes, for to this King all things were lawfull that might serve his turn; all his affections, and passions, how divers soever in other men, were in his ambition swallowed up; and thereinto converted.

For

For he neither forbore the murder of his own brothers, the breach of faith, the buying of other mens fidelitie: he esteemed no place strong where his Asse loaden with gold might enter; nor any Citie or State unconquerable, where a few of the greatest, to be made greater, could lose the sense of other mens sorrow and subjection. And because he thought it vain to practise the winning of Olynthus, till he had inclosed all the power they had within their own Walls, he entred their Territorie, and by the advantage of a well-compounded and trained Armie, he gave them two overthrowes ere he fate down before the Citie it self: which done, he bought Euthicrates and Lasthenes from their people, and from the service of their Countrie and common-weale, by whose treason he entred the Town, slew his brothers therein, sackt it, and sold the Inhabitants for slaves by the drumme. By the spoil of this place he greatly enriched himself, and had treasure sufficient to buy-in other Cities withall, which he daily did. For so was he advised by the Oracle in the beginning of his undertaking, That he should make his Affairs with silver speares: Whereupon Horace well and truly said, Hor. Carm.

od. 16.

Diffidit Urbium
Portas vir Macedo, & subruit emulos Reges muneribus.

By gifts the Macedon clave Gates afunder,
And Kings envying his estate brought under.

And it is true that he won more by corruption and fraud, than he did by force. For as he had in all the principall Cities of Greece his secret workers (which way of Conquest was well followed by Philip the second of Spain:) So when in the contention between the Competitors for the Kingdome of Thrace, he was chosen the Arbitrator; he came not to the Councell accompanied with Pietie and Justice, but with a powerfull Armie, and having beaten and slain both Kings, gave sentence for himself, and made the King some his own.

How Philip ended the Phocian warre.

THE war still continued between the Phocians and the Associates of the holy war: the Bæotians, finding themselves unable to subsist without some present aid, sent unto Philip for succour, who willingly yeelded to their necessities, and sent them such a proportion of men, as were neither sufficient to master their enemies, nor to assist themselves; but yet to enable them to continue the war, and to waste the strength of Greece. They also sent to Artaxerxes Ochus for supply of treasure, who lent them thirty talents, which makes a hundred and fourscore thousand crowns: but when with these supplies they had still the worst against the Phocians, who held from them three of the strongest Cities within Bæotia it self, they then besought Philip of Macedon that hee would assist them in person, to whom they would give an entrance into their Territorie, and in all things obey his commandements in war.

Now had Philip what he longed for; for he knew himself in state to give the law to both, and so quitting all his other purposes towards the North, he marched with a speedy pace towards Bæotia, where being arrived, Phalæchus who commanded the Phocian Armie, fearing to shock with this victorious King, made his own peace, and withdrew himself with a Regiment of eight thousand Souldiers into Peloponnesus, leaving the Phocians to the mercie of the Conqueror; and for conclusion he had the glory of that war called Sacred, which the Grecians with so many mutuall slaughters had continued for ten years, and besides the glory, he possest himself of Orchomene, Coronea, and Cerisia, in the Countrie of the Bæotians, who invited him to be victorious over themselves. He brought the Phocians into servitude, and wasted their Cities, and gave them but their Villages to inhabit, reserving unto himself the yearly tribute of threescore talents, which make six and thirty thousand French Crowns. He also hereby (besides the same of pietie for service of the gods) obtained the same double voice in the Councell of the Amphyctyons, Amphyctyones which the Phocians had, with the superintendencie of the Pythian games, forfeited by the Corinthians, by being partakers in the Phocian sacrilege.

How Philip with ill successe attempted upon Perinthus, Byzantium, and the Scythians.

Philip, after his triumphant return into Macedon, by the Lieutenant of his Armie Parmenio, slaughtered many thousands of the Illyrians and Dardarians; and brought the Thracians to pay him the tenth part of all their revenues. But his next enterprise against the Perinthians stayed his furie. Perinthus was a Citie of Thrace, seated upon Propontis, in the mid-way between Sestos and Byzantium, a place of great strength, and a people resolved to defend their libertie against Philip, where the Athenians incouraged and assisted them. Philip fate down before it with a puissant Armie, made many fair breaches, gave many furious assaults, built many over-topping and commanding Towers about it. But he was repelled with equall violence. For whereas Philip thought by his continuall assaults to weary them, and waste both their men and munition, they were supplied, not only from the Persian with men and mony, and succoured from Byzantium, which stood upon the same sea-coast, but they were relieved from Athens, Chio, and Rhodes, by the conduction of Phocion, with whatsoever was wanting to their necessitie. But because those of Byzantium, by reason of their neighbourhood, and easie passage by water, gave them often and ready help, Philip removed the one half of his Armie, and besieged it, leaving fifteen thousand foot before Perinthus, to force it if they could: But to be short, he failed in both attempts, (as all Princes commonly doe that undertake divers enterprises at one time) and returned into Macedon with no lesse dishonour than losse: whereupon he made an overture of peace with the Athenians, and greatly desired it to which though Phocion perswaded them in all he could, and that by the occasion offered they might greatly advantage their conditions; yet Demosthenes with his eloquence prevailed in the refusal. In the mean while, Philip having digested his late affront, and supplied his expence, by the taking of an hundred threescore and ten Merchants ships, he gathered new forces, and being accompanied with his son Alexander, led them into Scythia; but he was also unprosperous in that enterprise: For the Triballi, a people of Masia, set on him in his return, wounded him, and took from him the greatest part of the spoils which he had gathered.

How Philip overthrowing the Greeks in the battell of Chæronæa, was chosen Captain-Generall of Greece. The death of Philip.

AMONG these Northern Nations (part of which he suppressed, and part quieted) he spent some eight years; and in the ninth year, after the end of the holy War, he was by his great advantage invited again by the Grecians to their assistance. For the Citizens of Amphissa having disobeyed the decree of the Amphyctyones, in which Philip had a double voice, and who by reason that the Thebans and Lærians gave countenance and aid to the Amphissians, the rest were not of themselves able to constrain them, they besought Philip to come in person to their assistance. Now you must think that Philip was not long in resolving upon this enterprise; he needed no drawing on, whom nothing could keep back; nor other dissuasion than a mastering power could hold thence. He therefore commanded his Armie forthwith to march; the same being compounded of thirty thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse; and with as much expedition as could be made, he entred Phocia, won Plataea, and brought into subjection all that Region.

The rest, and especially the Athenians, although they had good cause to fear that a great part of this storm would fall on themselves, yet were they dissuaded by Demosthenes, from accepting such reasonable conditions of peace as Philip offered, and rather made choice (having drawn the Thebans to joyn with them) to leave the enjoying of their cities

States and their freedom to the chance of one battell, than to hold it either by composition, or by the grace of Philip. But this their Oratours eloquence cost them dear. It is true, that he could far more easily mind them of the virtue of their Ancestors, than make them such as they were. He might repeat unto them (with words moving passion) the wonders they wrought at Marathon, but he could not transform the Macedonians into Persians, nor draw from the dead, a Miltiades, an Aristides, a Themistocles, or a Cimon, or any of those famous Commanders, whose great vertues they had payed with the greatest ingratitude that ever Nation did. A Phocion they had, but by the strength of a contrary faction he was at this time in disgrace, and not employed: in so much as when the Armies of Philip and the Confederates incourtered, although some thousand of the Athenians did abide the killing, and the like number well-near of the Thebans died with them, yet the want of the worthy men on that side to hold up the rest, and to draw them on, and the many choice Captains of the Macedonians, incouraged by a King of a growing fortune, as it gave to Philip so shining a victory, that Alexander by the light thereof found his way (in despite of all the Nations interjacent) into Persia, India, and Egypt: so it cut to the ground, and gave end and date to all the Grecian glory: Yea their liberty (saith Curtius) with their large Dominion won with so many difficulties, continued for so many Ages, and so often defended against the greatest Kings, was now lost in a moment, and for ever lost.

Now this advised King (never passionate to his disadvantage) to the end he might retain the Sovereignty over all Greece, and be acknowledged for their Caprain-General against the Persians, without any further hazzard or trouble, was content to let go those Athenians that were taken at this battell of Cheronea, as he also forbore to attempt any thing against their Citie: but in Thebes (which lately by the vertue of Eparinonda triumphed over the rest) he lodged a Garrison of Macedonians. And being soon after (according unto the long desire which he had nourished of this Sovereignty) by the general States at Corinth, stiled the first Commander of all the Grecians, and contribution of men and money granted him, he compounded an Army of great strength, and under the Commandement of Attalus and Parmenio, transported the same over the Hellesspont into Asia, to begin the War. Of his enterprise against Persia, he sought the successe from the Oracle at Delphos, from whence he received such another convertible riddle, as Craesus did when he attempted Cyrus, and was in like sort mistaken in the exposition.

But as it is hard to discern and withstand the flatteries of our own appetites, so did Philip's ambitious desire to invade Persia, abuse his judgement: so far, that the death, wherewith himself was threatened, he understood to be delivered of his enemy, whom he intended presently to invade. Before his purposed departure into Asia, he prepared for the marriage of his Daughter Cleopatra, with Alexander King of Epirus; to which feast and pastimes thereat appointed, he invited all his Friends and Allies, with the principall persons of the Grecian Cities, from whom he received much honour and many rich presents: but this was indeed the feast of his Funerall. For having refused to do justice to one Pausanias, a Gentleman of his Guard, whom Attalus greatly favoured by Philip had first made drunk, and then left to be carnally abused by divers base persons: this Pausanias grew into so great a detestation of the Kings partiality in so foul a fact, as when Philip was passing towards the Theater, he drew a sword from under his long garment and wounded him to death, when he had lived six and forty years, and reigned five and twenty. Justus reports it, that Olympias incouraged Pausanias to murder the King her husband, which after his death she boldly avowed, by the honour she did unto Pausanias, in crowning his dead body, in consecrating his sword unto Apollo, by building for him a monument, and other like Graces.

What good foundations of Alexanders greatnesse were laid by Philip, of his laudable qualities and issue.

Now although he were then taken from the World, when he had mastered all opposition on that side of the Sea, and had seen the fruits of his hopes, and labours, changing colour towards ripenesse and perfection; yet hee was here-herein happy, that he lived to see his son Alexander at mans estate, and had himself bin an eie-witnesse of his resolution and singular valour in this last battell.

The foundation of whose future greatnesse he had laid so soundly for him, with so plain a pattern of the buildings which himself meant to erect, as the performance and finishing was farre more easie to Alexander, though more glorious, than the beginnings unto Philip, though lesse famous. For, besides the recovery of Macedon it self in competition between him and the sonnes of Eropus, the one assisted by the Thracians, the other by the Athenians, and besides the regaining of many places posselt by the Illyrians, the crushing of all those Northern Kings his Neighbours, the over-throw of Olinthus, a State that despised the power of his Father, the many Maritime Cities taken, of great strength and ancient freedom, and the subjection of that famous Nation of Greece, which for so many ages had defended it self against the greatest Kings of the World, and won upon them; He left unto his son, and had bred up for him so many choice Commanders, as the most of them, both for their valour and judgement in the Warre, were no lesse worthy of Crowns, than himself was that wore a Crown: For it was said of Parmenio (whom Alexander, ungratefull to so great vertue, impiously murdered) That Parmenio had performed many things challenging eternall fame, without the King; but the King without Parmenio never did any thing worthy of renowne: as for the rest of his Capitaines, though content to obey the Son of such a Father, yet so did they not after Alexanders death endure to acknowledge any man Superiour to themselves.

Of this Prince it is hard to judge, whether his ambition had taught him the exercise of more vices, than Nature and his excellent education had enriched him with vertues. For besides that he was Valiant, Wise, Learned, and Master of his Affections, he had this favour of Piety, that he rather laboured to satisfie those that were grieved, than to suppress them. Whereof (among many other) we find a good example in his dealing with Arcaetes and Nicanor, whom, when for their evill speech of Philip, his familiars perswaded him to put to death, he answered them, That first it ought to be considered, whether the fault were in them that gave him ill languages, or in himself; Secondly, that it was in every mans own power to be well spoken of; and this was shortly proved, for after Philip relieved their necessities, there were none within his Kingdome that did him more honour than they did. Whereupon he told those that had perswaded him to use violence, that he was a better Physician for evill speech than they were.

His Epistles to Alexander his son are remembered by Cicero and Gellius, and by Dion and Chrysostome exceedingly commended. His Stratagems are gathered by Polyanius and Eraninus, his wife sayings by Plutarch. And albeit he held Macedon as in his own right, all the time of his reign, yet was he not the true and next Heire thereof, for Amyntas the son of his brother Perdiccas (of whom he had the Protection during his infancy) had the right. This Amyntas he married to his daughter Cyna, who had by him a daughter called Eurydice, who was married to Philip's base son Aridas, her Uncle by the Mothers side: both which Olympias, Philip's first Wife, and Mother to Alexander the Great, put to death; Aridas by extreme torments, Eurydice she strangled.

Philip had by this Olympias, the daughter of Neoptolemus, King of the Molossians (of the race of Achilles) Alexander the Great, and Cleopatra. Cleopatra was married to her Uncle Alexander, King of Epirus, and was after her brother Alexanders death slain at Sardis, by the commandement of Antigonus.

By Audata, an Illyrian, his second Wife, he had Cyna, married as is shewed before. By Nicapolis, the Sister of Fajon, Tyrant of Pheres, he had TheSalonica, whom Cassander, after he had taken Pidna, married; but she was afterward by her father-in-law so Antipater put to death.

By Cleopatra the Nece of Attalus, he had Caranus, whom others call Philip: him Olympias, the Mother of Alexander the Great, caused to be rotted to death in a copper Pan. Others lay this murder to Alexander himself. By the same Cleopatra he had likewise a daughter called Europa, whom Olympias also murdered at the Mothers breaſt.

By Phila and Meda he had no issue.

He had also two Concubines, Arſinoe, whom after he had gotten with child, he married to an obscure man, called Lagus, who bare Ptolomie King of Egypt, called the Son of Lagus, but esteemed the Son of Philip: by Philinna, his second Concubine,

CHAP. II.

ALEXANDER the Great.

5. I.

A brief rehearsal of Alexanders doings, before he invaded Asia.

*A*lexander, afterwards called the Great, succeeded unto Philip his Father, being a Prince no lesse valiant by Nature, than by Education, well instructed, and enriched in all sorts of Learning and good Arts. He began his reign over the Macedonians four hundred and seventeen years after Rome was built, and after his own birth twenty years. The strange dreams of Philip his father, and that one of the gods, in the shape of a Snake, begat him on Olympias his Mother, I omit as foolish tales, but that the Temple of Diana (a work the most magnificent of the world) was burnt upon the day of his birth, and that so strange an accident was accompanied with the newes of three severall victories, obtained by the Macedonians, it was very remarkable, and might with the reason of those times be interpreted for ominous, & fore-shewing the great things by Alexander afterward performed. Upon the change of the King, the Neighbour Nations, whom Philip had oppressed, began to consult about the recovery of their former libertie, and to adventure it by force of arms. Alexanders young years gave them hope of prevailing, and his suspected severitie increased courage in those, who could better resolve to die, than to live slavishly. But Alexander gave no time to those swelling humours, which might speedily have endangered the health of his Estate. For after revenge taken upon the Conspirators against his Father, whom he slew upon his Tombe, and the celebration of his Funeralls, he first fastened unto him his own nation, by freeing them from all exactions and bodily slavery, other than their service in his Wars; and used such Kingly austeritie towards those that contemned his young years, and such clemencie to the rest that perswaded themselves of the crueltie of his disposition, as all affections being passed at home, he made a present jurnie into Peloponnesus, and so well exercised his spirits among them, as by the Counsell of the States of Greece, he was according to the great desire of his heart, elected Captain-Generall against the Persians, upon which war Philip had not only resolved, (who had obtained the same title of Generall Commander) but had transported under the leading of Parmentio and Attalus, a part of his Armie, to recover some places on Asia-side, for the safe descent of the rest. This enterprize against the Persian occupied all Alexanders affections; those fair marks of Riches, Honour, and large Dominion, he now shot at both sleeping and waking: all other thoughts & imaginations were either grievous or hateful. But a contrary wind ariseth; for he receiveth advertisement, that the Athenians, Thebans, and Lacedemonians, had united themselves against him, and by assistance from the Persian, hoped for the recovery of their former freedome. Hereto they were perswaded by Demosthenes, himself being thereto perswaded by the gold of Persia: the devise he used was more subtle than profitable; for hee caused it to bee bruited that Alexander was slain in a battail against the Triballes, and brought into the assembly a companion whom hee had corrupted, to affirm, that himself was present, and wounded in the battail. There is indeed a certain Doctrine of Politie (as Politie is now a daies defined by falshood and knaverie) that devised rumors & lies, if they serve the turn but for a day or two, are greatly available. It is true that common people are sometimes mockt by them, as Souldiers are by false alarms in the Wars, but in all that I have observed, I have found the success as ridiculous, as the invention. For as those that find themselves at one time abused by such like bruits, doe at other times neglect their duties, when they are upon true reports, and in occasions perillous, summoned to assemble; so doe all men in generall condemn the Veners of such trumpery, and for them, fear upon necessary occasions to entertain the truth itself. This labour unlooked for, and losse of time, was not only very grievous to Alexander, but by turning his sword from the ignoble and effeminate Persians, against which he had directed it, towards the manly and famous Gracians, of whose assistance he thought himself assured, his present undertaking was greatly disordered. But he that cannot endure to strive against the wind, shall hardly attain the Port which he purposeth to recover: and it no lesse becommeth the worthiest men to oppose misfortunes, than it doth the weakest children to bewail them.

He therefore made such expedition towards these Revolters, as that himself, with the Army that followed him, brought them the first newes of his preparation. Hereupon all stagger, and the Athenians, as they were the first that moved, so were they the first that fainted, seeking by their Embassadors to pacifie the King, and to be received again into his grace. Alexander was not long in resolving; for the Persians perswaded him to pardon the Gracians. Wise men are not easily drawn from great purposes by such occasions as may easily be taken off, neither hath any King ever brought to effect any great affair, who hath intangled himself in many enterprizes at once, not tending to one and the same certain end.

And having now quietted his borderers towards the South, he resolved to assure those Nations which lay on the North-side of Macedon, to wit, the Thracians, Triballes, Peones, Getes, Agrians, and other salvage people, which had greatly vexed with incursions, not only other of his Predecessors, but even Philip his Father: with all which, after divers overthrowes given them, he made peace, or else brought them into subjection. Notwithstanding this good successe, hee could not yet find the way out of Eurppe. There is nothing more naturall to man than liberty; the Greeks had enjoyed it over-long, and lost it too late to forget it; they therefore shake off the yoke once again. The Thebans, who had in their Citadell a Garrison of a thousand Macedons, attempt to force it; Alexander hastneth to their succour, and presents himself with thirty thousand foot, all old Souldiers, and three thousand horse, before the City, and gave the Inhabitants some daies to resolve, being even heart-sick with the desire of passing into Asia. So unwilling indeed, he was to draw blood of the Gracians, by whom he hoped to serve himself elsewhere; that he offered the Thebans remission, if they would only deliver into his hands Phanix and Prothytes, the flurriers up of the Rebellion. But they, opposing the mounting fortune of Alexander, (which bare all resistance before it, like the breaking in of the Ocean Sea) in stead of such an answer, as men besieged and abandoned should have made, demanded Philotas and Antipater to be delivered unto them; as if Thebes alone, then layed in the balance of Fortune with the Kingdome of Macedon, and many other Provinces, could either have evened the scale or swayed it. Therefore in the end they perished in their obstinacy. For while the Thebans oppose the Army assailable, they are charged at the back by the Macedonian Garrison; their Citie taken and razed to the ground, six thousand slain, and thirty thousand sold for slaves, at the price of four hundred and forty talents. This the King did to the terror of the other Gracian Cities.

Many arguments were used by Cleander one of the prisoners, to perswade Alexander to forbear the destruction of Thebes. He prayed the King to believe that they were rather mislead by giving hasty credit to false reports, than any way malicious; for being perswaded of Alexanders death, they rebelled but against his successor. He also brought the King to remember, that his father Philip had his education in that City; yea, that his Antecessor Hercules was born therein: but all persuasions were fruitlesse; the times wherein offences are committed do greatly aggravate them. Yet for the honour he bare to learning, he pardoned all the race of Pindarus, the Poet, and spared, and set at liberty Timoclea, the sister of Theagenes, who died in defence of the liberty of Greece against his father Philip. This noble woman being taken by a Thracian, and by him ravished, he threatened to take her life unless she would confesse her treasure: she led that Thracian to a Well, and told him that she had therein cast it: and when the Thracian stooped to look into the Well, she suddenly thrust him into the mouth thereof; and stoned him to death.

Now because the Athenians had received into their City so many of the Thebans, as had had escaped and fled unto them for succour, Alexander would not grant them peace, but upon condition to deliver into his hands both their Orators which perswaded this second revolt, and their Captains; yet in the end, it being a torment unto him to retard the enterprise of Persia; he was content that the Orators should remain, and accepted of the banishment of the Captains; wherein he was exceeding ill advised, had not his fortune, or rather the providence of God, made all the resistance against him unprofitable: for these good Leaders of the Gracians betook themselves to the service of the Persian, whom after a few dayes he invaded.

§. II.

How Alexander passing into Asia, fought with the Persians upon the River of Granicus.

Vhen all was now quieted at home, Alexander, committing to the trust of Antipater both Greece and Macedon; in the first of the Spring did passe the Hellepont, and being ready to dis-imbarke, he threw a Dart towards the Asian shore, as a token of defiance, commanding his Souldiers not to make any waste in their own Territorie, or to burn, or deface those buildings which themselves were presently, and in the future to possesse. He landed his Armie, consisting of two and thirty thousand foot, and five thousand horse, all old Souldiers, neer unto Troy, where he offered a solemn sacrifice upon Achilles Tombe, his maternall Ancestor.

But before he left his own coast, hee put to death without any offence given him, all his Mother-in-lawes Kinsmen, whom Philip his Father had greatly advanced, not sparing such of his own as he suspected. He also took with him many of his tributary Princes, of whose fidelity he doubted; thinking by unjust cruelty to assure all things, both in the present and future. Yet the end of all fell out contrary to the policy which his Ambition had commended unto him, though agreeing very well with the justice of God; for all that he had planted, was soon after withered, and rooted up; those, whom he most trusted, were the most traitorous; his mother, friends, and children, fell by such another mercilesse sword as his own, and all manner of confusion followed his dead body to the grave, and left him there.

When the knowledge of Alexander's landing on Asia side was brought to Darius; he so much scorned the Army of Macedon, and had so contemptible an opinion of Alexander himself, as having stiled him his servant on a letter which he wrote unto him, reprehending his disloyaltie and audacitie (for Darius intituled himself King of Kings, and the Kinsman of the gods) he gave order withall to his Lieutenants of the lesser Asia, that they should take Alexander alive, whip him with rods, and then convey him to his presence: that they should sink his ships, and send the Macedons taken prisoners beyond the Red-Sea; belike into Aethiopia, or some other unhealthfull part of Africa.

In this sort did this glorious King, confident in the glittering, but heartlesse, multitude which he commanded, dispose of the already-vanquished Macedonians: But the ill destinies of men bear them to the ground, by what strong confidence soever armed. The great numbers which he gathered together and brought in one heap into the field, gave rather an exceeding advantage to his enemies, than any discouragement at all. For besides that they were men utterly unacquainted with dangers, men who by the name and countenance of their King were wont to prevail against those of lesse courage than themselves, men that took more care how to embroider with gold and silver their upper garments, as if they attended the invasion but of the Sun-beams, than they did to arm themselves with yron and steel against the sharp pikes, swords and darts of the hardie Macedonians; I say, besides all these, even the opinion they had of their own numbers, of which every one in particular hoped that it would not fall to his turn to fight, filled every of them with the care of their own safetie, without any intent at all to hazard any thing but their own breath, and that of their horses, in running away. The Macedonians, as they came to fight, and thereby to enrich themselves with the gold and jewels of Persia, both which they needed; so the Persians, who expected nothing in that Warre but blowes and wounds, which they needed not, obeyed the King, who had power to constrain them in assembling themselves for his service; but their own fears and cowardise, which in time of danger had most power over them, they only then obeyed, when their rebellion against so servile a passion did justly and violently require it. For, saith Vegetius: Quemadmodum bene exercitatus miles praelium capit, ita formidat indoctus; nam sciendum est impugna ulum amplius prodesse quam vires; as the well-practised Souldier desires to come to battail, so the raw one fears it: for we must understand, that in fight it more avails to have been accustomed unto the like, than only to have rude strength. What manner of men the Persians were, Alexander discovered in the first encounter, before which time it is said, by those that write his story, that it was hard to judge, whether his daring to undertake the conquest of an Empire so well peopled, with a handfull of men, or the successe he had, were more to be wondered at. For at the River of Granicus, which severeth the Territory of Troy from Propontis, the Persians fought to stop his passage, taking the higher ground and bank of the River to defend, which Alexander was forced (as it were) to climb up unto, and scale from the Level of the water. Great resistance (saith Curius) was made by the Persians; yet in the end Alexander prevailed. But it seems to me, that the victory then gotten was exceeding easie, and that the twenty thousand Persian foot-men, said to be slain, were rather kill'd in the back, in running away, than hurt in the bosoms, by resisting. For had those twenty thousand foot, and two hundred and fiftie horsemen, or after Plutarch, two thousand and five hundred horse-men, dyed with their faces towards the Macedonians; Alexander could not have bought their lives at so small a rate, as with the losse of four and thirty of all sorts of his own. And if it were also true, that Plutarch doth report, how Alexander encountered two of the Persian Commanders, Spithridates and Rhasaces; and that the Persian horse-men fought with great fury, though in the end scattered; and lastly, how those Gracians in Darius his pay, holding themselves in one body upon a piece of ground of advantage, did (after mercy was refused them) fight it out to the last; how both it then resemble truth; that such resistance having been made, yet of Alexander's Army there fell but twelve Footmen, and two and twenty Horsemen.

§. III.

A digression concerning the defence of hard passages. Of things following the battail of Granicus.

The winning of this passage did greatly encourage the Macedonians, and brought such terror upon all those of the lesser Asia, as he obtained all the Kingdoms thereof without a blow, some one or two Towns excepted. For in all invasions, where the Nations invaded have once been beaten upon a great advantage of the place, as in defence of Rivers, Streights, and Mountains, they will soon have perswaded themselves, that such an enemy upon equall termes and even ground, can hardly be resisted. It was therefore Machiavels counsell, That he which resolveth to defend a passage, should with his ablest force oppose the Assailant. And to say truth, few Regions of any great circuit are so well fenced, that Armies of such force as may be thought sufficient to conquer them, can be debarred all entrance, by the naturall difficultie of the wayes. One passage or other is commonly left unguarded: if all be defended, then must the forces of the Country be distracted; and yet lightly some one place will be found that is defended very weakly. How often have the Alpes given way to Armies, breaking into Italy? Yea, where shall we find that ever they kept out an invader? Yet are they such as (to speak briefly) afflict with all difficulties those that travail over them; but they give no security to those that lye behind them: for they are of too large extent. The towns of Lombardy perswaded themselves that they might enjoy their quiet, when the Warlike Nation of the Suiters had undertaken to hinder Francis the French King from descending into the Dutchy of Milan: but whilest these Patrons of Milan, whom their own dwelling in those Mountains had made fittest of all other for such a service, were busied in custody of the Alpes, Francis appeared in Lombardy, to so much the greater terror of the Inhabitants, by how much the lesse they had expected his arrivall. What shall we say of those Mountains, which lock up whole Regions in such sort, as they leave but one gate open? The Streights, or (as they were called) the gates of Taurus in Cilicia, and those of Thermopyla, have seldom been attempted, perhaps because they were thought impregnable: but how seldom (if ever) have they been attempted in vain? Xerxes, and long after him, the Romans, forced the entrance of Thermopylae, Cyrus the younger, and after him Alexander, found the Gates of Cilicia wide open; how strongly soever they had bin locked and barred, yet were those Countries open enough to a fleet that should enter on the back-side. The defence of Rivers how hard a thing it is, we find examples in all histories that bear good witness. The deepest have many Foords; the swiftest and broadest may be passed by Boats, in case it be found a matter of difficulty to make a bridge. He that hath men enow to defend all the length of his own bank, hath also enow to beat his enemy; and may therefore doe better to let him come over, to his loss, than by striving in vain to hinder the passage, as a matter tending to his own disadvantage, fill the heads of his Souldiers with an opinion, that they are in ill case, having their means of safeguard taken from them, by the skill or valour of such as are too good for them. Certainly, if a River were sufficient defence against an Army, the Isle of Mona, now called Anglesey, which is divided from North-Wales by an arm of the Sea, had been safe enough against the Romans, invading it under conduct of Fulius Agricola. But he wanting, and not meaning to spend the time in making vessels to transport his forces, did assay the foords. Whereby he so amazed the enemies attending for ships and such like provision by Sea, that surely believing nothing could be hard or invincible to men, which came so minded to War, they humbly intreated for peace, and yielded the Island. Yet the Britaines were men stout enough, the Persians were very dastards.

It was therefore wisely done of Alexander, to passe the River of Granick in face of the enemy; not marching higher to seek an easier way, nor labouring to convey his men over it by some safer means. For, having beaten them upon their own ground, he did thereby cut off no lesse of their reputation, than of their strength, leaving no hope of succour to the partakers and followers of such unable Protectors.

Soon after this victory he recovered Sardis, Ephesus, the Cities of the Trallians, and Magnesia, which were rendred unto him. The inhabitants of which, with the people of the Countrey, he received with great grace, suffering them to be governed by their own laws. For he observed it well, Novum Imperium inchoantibus utilis clementia forma; It is commodious unto such as lay the foundations of a new Sovereignty, to have the fame of being mercifull. He then by Parmentio won Miletas, and by force mastered Halicarnassus, which because it resisted obstinately, he razed to the ground. From whence he entred into Caria, where Ada the Queen, who had been cast out of all that she held (except the City of Alinda) by Darius his Lieutenants, presented her self unto him, and adopted him her son and successour, which Alexander accepted in so gracious part, as he left the whole Kingdome to her disposing. He then entred into Lycia, and Pamphylia, and obtained all the Sea coasts, and subjecting unto him Pisidia, he directed himself towards Darius (who was said to be advanced towards him with a marvellous Army) by the way of Phrygia: For all the Province of Asia the lesse, bordering upon the Sea, his first victory layed under his feet.

While he gave order for the government and settling of Lycia, and Pamphylia, they sent Cleander to raise some new Captains in Peloponnesus, and marching towards the North, he entred Celenas, seated on the River Meander, which was abandoned unto him, the Castle onely holding out, which also after forty dayes was given up: for so long time he gave them to attend succour from Darius. From Celenas he past on through Phrygia towards the Euxine Sea, till he came to a city called Gordium, the Regall seat, in former times, of King Midas. In this City it was, that he found the Gordian-knot, which when he knew not how to undoe, he cut it asunder with his sword. For there was an ancient prophetic did promise to him that could untie it, the Lordship of all Asia; whereupon Alexander, not respecting the manner how, so it were done, assumed to himself the fulfilling of the prophetic, by hewing it in pieces.

But before he turned from this part of Asia the lesse towards the east, he took care to clear the Sea coast on his back, and to thrust the Persians out of the Islands of Lesbos, Chio, and Coos: the charge whereof he committed unto two of his Captains, giving them such order as he thought to be most convenient for that service; and delivering unto them fifty Talents to defray the charge; and withall out of his first spoyle gotten, he sent threescore Talents more to Antipater his Lieutenant in Greece and Macedon. From Celenas he removed to Ancira, now called Anguori, standing on the same River of Sangarius, which runneth through Gordium: there he mustered his Army, and then then entred Paphlagonia, whose people submitted themselves unto him, and obtained freedom of tribute: where he left Caius Governor with one Regiment of Macedonians lately arrived.

Here he understood of the death of Memnon, Darius Lieutenant, which heartned him greatly to passe on towards him; for of this only Captain he had more respect, than of all the multitude by Darius assembled, and of all the Commanders he had besides. For so much hath the spirit of some one man excelled, as it hath undertaken and effected the alteration of the greatest States and Common-weals, the erection of Monarchies, the conquest of Kingdoms and Empires, guided handfuls of men against multitudes of equall bodily strength, contrived victories beyond all hope and discourse of reason, converted the fearful passions of his own followers into magnanimity, and the valour of his enemies into cowardize; such spirits have been stirred up in sundry Ages of the world, and in divers parts thereof, to erect and cast down again, to establish and to destroy, and to bring all things, Persons and States, to the same certain ends, which the infinite Spirit of the Universal, piercing, moving, and governing all things, hath ordained. Certainly the things that this King did, were marvellous, and would hardly have been undertaken by any man else: and though his Father had determined to have invaded the lesser Asia, it is like enough that he would have contented himself with some part thereof, and not have discovered the River of Indus, as this man did. The swift course of victory, wherewith he ran over so large a portion of the World, in so short a space, may justly be imputed unto this, that he was never encountered by an equall spirit, concurring with equall power against him. Hereby it came to passe that his actions being limited by no greater opposition, than desert places, and the meer length of tedious journeys could make, were like the Goleusus of Rhodes, not so much to be admired for the workmanship, though therein also praise-worthy, as for the huge bulk. For certainly the things performed by Xenophon, discover as brave a spirit as Alexanders, and working no lesse exquisitely, though the effects were lesse materiall, as were also the forces and power of command, by which it wrought. But he that would find the exact pattern of a noble Commander, must look upon such as Epaminondas, that encountering worthy Captains, and those better followed than themselves, have by their singular vertue over-topped their valiant enemies; and still prevailed over those, that would not have yielded one foot to any other. Such as these are, do seldome live to obtain great Empires. For it is a work of more labour and longer time, to master the equall forces of one hardy and well-ordered State, than to tread down and utterly subdue a multitude of feeble Nations, compounding the body of a grosse unwieldy Empire. Wherefore these Hero Potentes, men that with little have done much upon enemies of like ability, are to be regarded as choise examples of worth; but great Conquerors, to be rather admired for the substance of their actions, than the exquisite managing; exactnesse and greatnesse concurring so seldome, that I can find no instance of both in one, save onely that brave Roman, Cesar.

Having thus farre digressed, it is now time that wee return unto our Eastern Conqueror; who is travelling hastily towards Cilicia, with a desire to recover the Streights thereof before Darius should arrive there. But first making a dispatch into Greece, he sent to those Cities, in which he reposed most trust, some of the Persian Targets, which hee had recovered in his first battell; upon which, by certain inscriptions, he made them partakers of his victory. Herein he well advised himself; for he that doth not as well impart of the honour which he gains in the Wars, as he doth of the spoils, shall never be long followed of those of the better fort. For men which are either well born, or well bred, and have more of wealth than of reputation, do as often satisfie themselves with the purchase of glory, as the weak in fortune, and strong in courage, do with the gain of gold and silver.

The Governour of Cilicia hearing of Alexanders coming on, left some Companies to keep the Streights, which were indeed very defensible; and withall, as Curtius noteth, hee began overlate to prise and put in execution the Counsell of Memnon: who in the beginning of the Wars advised him to waste all the provisions for Men and Horse, that could not be lodged in strong places, and alwayes to give ground to the Invader, till he found some such notable advantage as might assuredly promise him the obtaining of victory. For the fury of an invading Army is best broken, by delays, change of diet, and want, eating sometimes too little, and sometimes too much, sometimes reposing themselves in beds, and more often on the cold ground. These and the like sudden alterations bring many diseases upon all Nations out of their own Countries. Therefore if Darius had kept the Macedonians but a while from meat and sleep, and refusing to give or take battell, had wearied them with his light horse, as the Parthians afterward did the Romans, he might perchance have saved his own life, and his estate. For it was one of the greatest encouragements given by Alexander, to the Macedonians, in the third and last fatal battell, that they were to fight with all the strength of Persia at once.

Xerxes, when he invaded Greece and fought abroad, in being beaten, lost only his men; but Darius being invaded by the Greeks, and fighting at home, by being beaten, lost his Kingdom. Pericles though the Lacedemonians burnt all in Attica to the Gates of Athens, yet could not be drawn to hazard a battell: for the invaded ought evermore to fight upon the advantage of time and place. Because we read Histories to inform us out understanding by the examples therein found, we will give some instances of those that have perished by adventuring in their own Countries, to charge an invading Armie. The Romans, by fighting with Hannibal, were brought to the brink of their destruction.

Pompey was well advised for a while, when he gave Cæsar ground, but when by the importunity of his Captains he adventured to fight at Pharsalia, he lost the battell, lost the freedom of Rome, and his own life.

Ferdinand, in the Conquest of Naples, would needs fight a battell with the French to his confusion, though it was told him by a man of sound judgement, that those Counsellors which promise surety in all things, are honourable enough.

The Constable of France made frustrate the mighty preparation of Charles the Fifth, when he invaded Provence, by wasting the Countrey, and forbearing to fight; so did the Duke of Alva wearie the French in Naples, and dissolve the boistrous Army of the Prince of Orange in the Low-Countries.

The Leigers, contrary to the advice of their Generall, would needs fight a battell with the Bourgonians, invading their Countrey, and could not be perswaded to linger the time, and stay their advantage; but they lost eight and twenty thousand upon the place. Philip of Valois set upon King Edward at Chesie; and King John (when the English were well-near tired out, and would in short time by an orderly pursuit have been wasted to nothing) constrained the black Prince with great fury, neer Poitiers, to joyn battell with him: But all men know what lamentable successe these two French Kings found. Charles the fifth of France made another kind of Fabian-Warfare; and though the English burnt and wasted many places, yet this King held his resolution to forbear blowes, and followed his advice, which told him, That the English could never get his inheritance by smok; and it is reported by Belloy and Herrault, that King Edward was wont to say of this Charles, that he wan from him the Dutchy of Guyen without ever putting on his Armour.

But where God hath a purpose to destroy, wise men grow short-lived, and the charge of things is committed unto such as either cannot see what is for their good, or know not how to put in execution any sound advice. The course which Memnon had proposed, must in all appearance of reason have brought the Macedonian to a great perplexity, and made him stand still a while at the Straights of Cilicia, doubting whether it were more shamefull to return, or dangerous to proceed. For, had Cappadocia and Paphlagonia been wasted whilest Alexander was far off; and the Straights of Cilicia been defended by Armenes, Governour of that Province, with the best of his forces; hunger would not have suffered the enemy, to stay the triall of all means that might be thought upon, of forcing that passage: or if the place could not have been maintained, yet might Cilicia at better leisure have been so thoroughly spoiled, that the heart of his Army should have been broken, by seeking out miseries by painfull travell.

But Armenes leaving a small number to defend the Straights, took the best of his Armie with him, to waste and spoil the Countrey; or rather, as may seem, to find himself some work, by pretence of which he might honestly run further away from Alexander. Hee should rather have adventured his person in custody of the Straights, whereby he might perhaps have saved the Province; and in the mean time, all that was in the fields, would have been conveyed into strong Towns. So should his Army, if it were driven from the place of advantage, have found good entertainment within walled Cities, and himself with his horse-men have had the lesse work in destroying that little which was left abroad. Handling the matter as he did, he gave the Cilicians cause to wish for Alexanders coming, and as great cause to the Keepers of the passage not to hinder it. For cowards are wise in apprehending all formes of danger. These Guardians of the Straights, hearing that Armenes made all haste to joyn himself with Darius, burning down all as he went, like one despairing of the defence, began to grow circumspect, and to think that surely their Generall, who gave as lost the Countrey behind their backs, had exposed themselves unto certain death, as men that were good for nothing else but to dull the Macedonian swords. Wherefore, not affecting to die for their Prince and Countrey (which honour they saw that Armenes himself could well forbear) they speedily followed the foot-steps of their Generall, gleaning after his Harvest. Thus Alexander without labour got both the entrance of Cilicia, abandoned by the cowardise of his Enemies, and the whole Province that had been alienated from the Persian side by their indiscretion.

s. IIII.

Of the unwarlike Army levied by Darius against Alexander. The unadvised courses which Darius took in this expedition. He is vanquished at Issus; where his Mother, Wife, and Children are made prisoners: of some things following the battell of Issus.

IN the mean season Darius approached; who (as Curtius reports) had compounded an Army of more than two hundred and ninety thousand Souldiers, out of divers Nations; Fustine musters them at three hundred thousand Foot, and a hundred thousand Horse; Plutarch at six hundred thousand.

The manner of his coming on, as Curtius describes it, was rather like a masker than a man of War, and like one that took more care to set out his glory and riches, than to provide for his own safety, perswading himself, as it seemed, to beat Alexander with pomp and sumptuous Pageants. For, before the Armie there was carried the holy fire, which the Persians worshipped, attended by their Priests, and after them three hundred and threescore and five young-men, answering the number of the dayes of the year, covered with Scarlet; then the Chariot of Jupiter drawn with white Horses; with their Riders clothed in the same colour, with rods of gold in their hands; And after it, the Horse of the Sun. Next after these follow ten sumptuous Chariots, in-layed and garnished with silver and gold; and then the Vanguard of their horse, compounded of twelve severall Nations, which the better to avoid confusion, did hardly understand each others language; and these marshalled in the head of the rest, being beaten, might serve very fitly to disorder all that followed them: in the tail of these Horses the Regiment of foot marched, with the Persians called immortall, because if any died, the number was presently supplied: and these were armed with chains of gold, and their coats with the same metall imbroidered, whereof the sleeves were garnished with pearl; baits, either to catch the hungry Macedonians withall, or to perswade them that it were great incivility to cut, and to deface such glorious garments. But it was well said; Sumptuosè indutus miles, se virtute superiorem aliis non existimet, cum in preliis oporteat fortitudine animi, et non vestimentis muniri, quoniam hostes vestibus non debellantur; Lei no man think that he exceedeth those in valour, whom he exceedeth in gay garments; for it is by men armed with fortitude of mind, and not by the apparell they put on, that enemies are beaten. And it was perchance from the Roman Papyrius that this advice was borrowed, who when he fought against the Samnites in that fatal battell, wherein they all sware either to prevail or dye, thirty thousand of them having apparelled themselves in white garments, with high crests, and great plumes of feathers, bade the Roman Souldiers to lay aside all fear: Non enim cristas vulnera facere, et per picta atque aurata scuta transire Romanum pilum; For these plumed crests would wound no body, and the Roman pile would bore holes in painted and gilded shields.

To second this Court-like company, fifteen thousand were appointed more rich and glittering than the former, but apparelled like Women (belike to breed the more terror) and these were honoured with the Title of the Kings Kinsmen. Than came Darius himself, himself, the Gentle-men of his Guard-robe, riding before his Chariot, which was supported with the gods of his Nation, cast and cut in pure gold; these the Macedonians did not serve, but they served their turns of these, by changing their massie-bodies into thin, portable and currant coyn. The head of this Chariot was set with precious stones, with two little golden Idols, covered with an open-winged-Eagle of the same metall: The hinder part being raised high whereon Darius fate, had a covering of inestimable value. This Chariot of the King was followed with ten thousand Horse-men, their Lances plated with silver, and their heads gilt; which they meant not to imbrue in the Macedonian blood, for fear of marring their beauty. Hee had for the proper Guard of his own person, two hundred of the blood Royall; blood too Royall and precious to be spilt by any valorous adventure, (I am of opinion that two hundred sturdy fellows, like the Switzers, would have done him more service) and these were backt with thirty thousand foot-men, after whom again were led four hundred spare horses for the King, which if he had meant to have used, he would have marshalled somewhat neerer him.

Now followed the Rearward, the same being led by Sisygambis the Kings Mother, and by his wife, drawn in glorious Chariots, followed by a great train of Ladies their attendants on horse-back, with fifteen Wagons of the Kings children, and the wives of the Nobility, waited on by two hundred and fiftie Concubines, and a world of Nurses and Eunuchs, most sumptuously appareled. By which it should seem that Darius thought that the Macedonians had been Comedians or Tumblers; for this troop was far fitter to behold those sports than to be present at battells. Between these and a company of slight-armed slaves, with a world of Varlets, was the Kings treasure, charged on six hundred Mules, and three hundred Camels, brought, as it proved, to pay the Macedonians. In this sort came the May-game-King into the field, incumbered with a most unnecessary train of Strumpets, attended with troupes of divers Nations, speaking divers languages, and for their numbers impossible to be marshalled; and for the most part so effeminate, and so rich in gold and in garments, as the same could not but have encouraged the nakedst Nation of the world against them. Wee find it in daily experience, that all discourse of magnanimity, of Nationall Vertue, of Religion, of Liberty, and whatsoever else hath been wont to move and incourage vertuous men, hath no force at all with the common Souldier, in comparison of Spoil and riches. The rich ships are boarded upon all disadvantage, the rich Towns are furiously assaulted, and the plentyfull Countries willingly invaded. Our English nation have attempted many places in the Indies, and run upon the Spaniards head-long, in hope of their Royals of plate, and Pistoles; which, had they bin put to it upon the like disadvantages in Ireland, or in any poor Country, they would have turned their Peces and Pikes against their Commanders, contesting that they had bin brought without reason to the Butchery and slaughter. It is true, that the warre is made willingly, and for the most part with good successe, that is ordained against the richest Nations; for as the needy are alwayes adventurous, so plenty is wont to thin perill, and men that have well to live, do rather studie how to live well, I mean wealthily, than care to die (as they call it) honourably. Car ou il n'y a rien a gaigner que des coups, volontiers il n'y va pas. No man makes haste to the market, where there is nothing to be bought but blowes.

Now if Alexander had beheld this preparation before his consultation with his Soothsayers, he would have satisfied himself by the out-sides of the Persians, and never have looked into the intraines of Beasts for successe. For leaving the description of this second battell (which is indeed no-where well described, neither for the confusion and hasty running away of the Assians could it be) we have enough by the slaughter that was made of them, and by the few that fell of the Macedonians, to inform us what manner of resistance was made. For if it be true that threescore thousand Persian footmen were slain in this battell, with ten thousand of their horsemen; Or (as Curtius saith) an hundred thousand footmen, with the same number of horsemen, and besides this slaughter, forty thousand taken prisoners, while of Alexanders Armie there miscarried but two hundred and fourscore of all sorts, of which numbers Arrianus and other Historians cut off almost the one half; I do verily beleieve, that this small number rather died with the over-travell and pains-taking in killing their enemies, than by any strokes received from them. And surely if the Persian Nation (at this time degenerate and the basest of the World) had had any any favour remaining of the ancient valour of their fore-fathers, they would never have sold so good cheap, and at so vile a price, the Mother, the Wife, the Daughters, and other the Kings children; had their own honour been valued by them at nothing, and the Kings safetie and his estate at lesse. Darius by this time found it true, that Charidemus a banished Græcian of Athens had told him, when he made a view of his Army about Babylon, to wit, That the multitude which he had assembled of divers Nations, richly attired, but poorly armed, would be found more terrible to the Inhabitants of the country, whom in passing by they would devoure than to the Macedonians, whom they meant to assail; who being all old and obedient Souldiers, imbattailed in grosse squadrons, which they call their Phalanx, well covered with Armour for defence, and furnished with weapons for offence of great advantage, would make so little account of his delicate Persians, loving their ease and their palat, being withall ill armed and worse disciplined, as except it would please him to entertain (having so great abundance of treasure to do it withall) a sufficient number of the same Græcians, and so to encounter the Macedonians with men of equall courage, he would repent him overlate, as taught by the miserable successe like to follow.

But this discourse was so unpleasing to Darius (who had bin accustomed to nothing so much as to his own praises, and to nothing so little as to hear truth,) as he commanded that this poor Græcian should be presently slain: who while he was a sundring in to the Tormentors hand, used this speech to the King, That Alexander, against whom he had given this good counsell, should assuredly revenge his death, and lay deserved punishment upon Darius for despising his advice.

It was the saying of a Wise man: Desperata est Principis salus est, cujus auris ita formate sunt, ut aspera que utilia, nec quicquam nisi jucundum accipiat; That Princes safetie in a desperate case, whose ears judge all that is profitable to be too sharp, and will entertain nothing that is unpleasant.

For liberty in counsell is the life and essence of counsell; Libertas consilii est ejus vita, & essentia, quæ erepta consilium evanescit.

Darius did likewise value at nothing the advice given him by the Græcian Souldiers that served him, who intreated him not to fight in the Streights: But had they been Counsellors and directors in that War, as they were underlings and commanded by others, they had with the help of a good troupe of horse-men bin able to have opposed the fury of Alexander, without any assistance of the Persian foot-men. For when Darius was overthrown with all his cowardly and confused rabble, those Græcians, under their Captain Amynas, held firm; and marched away in order, in despite of the vanquishers. Old Souldiers are not easily dismayed: we read in Histories ancient and modern, what brave retraites have bin made by them, though the rest of the Army in which they have served, hath bin broken.

At the battail of Ravenna, where the Imperials were beaten by the French, a squadron of Spaniards, old Souldiers, came off unbroken and undismayed; whom when Gaston de Foix, Duke of Nemours, and Nephew to Lewis the twelfth, charged, as holding the victory not entire by their escape, he was overturned and slain in the place. For it is truly said of those men, who, by being acquainted with dangers, fear them not; That, Neglecto periculo imminenti est mali, opus ipsum quantumvis difficile aggrediuntur; They goe about the business it self, how hard soever it be, not standing to consider the danger, which the mischief hanging over their heads may bring: and as truly of those that know the wars but by hear-say; Quod valentes sunt & prevalentes ante pericula, in instantem periculis discedunt; They have ability enough, and to spare, till dangers appear; but when perill indeed comes, they get them gone.

These Græcians also that made the retrait, advised Darius to retire his Army into the plain of Mesopotamia, to the end that Alexander being entred into those large fields and great Champions, he might have invironed the Macedonians on all sides with his multitude; and withall they counselled him to divide that his huge Army into parts, not committing the whole to one stroke of Fortune, whereby he might have fought many battails, and have brought no greater numbers at once than might have been well marshalled & conducted. But this counsell was so contrary to the cowardly affections of the Persians, as they perswaded Darius to inviron the Græcians which gave the advice, and to cut them in pieces as Traitors. The infinite wisdom of God doth not work alwayes by by one and the same way, but very often in the alteration of Kingdoms and Estates, by taking understanding from the Governours, so as they can neither give nor discern of Counsels. For Darius that would needs fight with Alexander upon a streightned piece of ground, neer unto the City of Iffus, where he could bring no more hands to fight than Alexander could, (who by the advice of Parmenio staid there, as in a place of best advantage) was utterly overthrowne, his Treasure lost, his Wife, Mother, and Children (whom the Grecians his followets had perswaded him to leave in Babylon, or elsewhere) taken prisoners, and all their train of Ladies spoiled of their rich Garments, Jewels, and Honour. It is true, that both the Queen, with her Daughters, who had the good hap to be brought to Alexanders presence, were entertained with all respect due unto their birth, their Monours preserved, and their Jewels and rich Garments restored unto them; and though Darius Wife was a most beautifull Lady, and his Daughters of excellent form, yet Alexander mastred his affections towards them all: only it is reported out of Aristobolus the Historian, that he imbraced the wife of the valiant Memnon, her Husband lately dead, who was taken flying from Damascus by Parmenio, at which time the Daughters of Ochus, who reigned before Darius, and the Wives and Children of all the Nobility of Persia in effect, fell into captivity; at which time also Darius Treasure (not lost at Iffus) was seized, amounting to six thousand and two hundred talents of coin, and of Bullion five hundred talents, with a world of riches besides.

Darius himself leaving his brother dead, with divers other of his chief Captains, (casting the Crown from his head) hardly escaped.

After this overthrow given unto Darius, all Phenicia (the City of Tyre excepted) was yielded to Alexander, of which Parmenio was made Governour.

Aradus, Zidon, and Biblos, maritime Cities of great importance, of which one Strato was King (but hated of the people) acknowledged Alexander. Good fortune followed him so fast that it trod on his heels; for Antigenus, Alexanders Lieutenant in Asia the lesse, overthrowne the Cappadocians, Paphlagonians, and others lately revolted; Aristodemus, Darius Admiral, had his Fleet partly taken, and in part drowned by the Macedonians newly levied; the Lacedemonians that warred against Antipater were beaten; four thousand of those Greeks which made the reitrait at the last battail, forsaking both the party of Darius and of Alexander, and led by Amyntas into Egypt, to hold it for themselves, were buried there; for the time was not yet come to divide Kingdoms.

Alexander to honour Ephesion, whom he loved most, gave him power to dispose of the Kingdom of Zidon. A man of a most poor estate, that laboured to sustain his life being of the Royall blood, was commended by the people unto him, who changed his Spade into a Scepter, so as he was beheld both a Beggar and a King in one and the same hour. It was a good desire of this new King, when speaking to Alexander, he wisht that he could bear his prosperity with the same moderation, and quietnesse of heart, that he had done his adversity; but ill done of Alexander, in that he would not perform in himself that which he commended in another mans desire: for it was a sign that he did but accompany, and could not govern his felicity.

While he made some stay in those parts, he received a letter from Darius, importing the ransom of his Wife, his Mother, and his Children, with some other conditions of peace; but such as rather became a Conqueror, than one that had now been twice shamefully beaten, not vouchsafing in his direction, to stile Alexander King. It is true, that the Romans, after that they had received an overthrow by Pyrrhus, returned him a most scornfull answer upon the offer of peace, than they did before the triall of his force. But as their fortunes were then in the Spring, so that of Darius had already cast leashe one a resolved, well armed and disciplined Nation, the other cowardly and effeminate. Alexander disdaind the offers of Darius, and sent him word, that he not onely directed his letter to a King, but to the King of Darius himself.

How Alexander besieged and won the Citie of Tyre.

Alexander comming neer to the City of Tyre, received from them the present of a golden Crown, with great store of victuals, and other presents, which he took very thankfully, returning them answer, That he desired to offer a sacrifice sacrifice to Hercules, the Protector of their Citie, from whom he was descended. But the Tyrians like not his companie within their Walls, but tell him that the Temple of Hercules was seated in the old City adjoining, now abandoned and desolate. To be short, Alexander resolved to enter it by force: and though it were a place in all mens opinion impregnable, because the Island whereon it was built, was eight hundred furlongs from the Main, yet with the labour of many hands, having great store of stone from the old Tyre, and timber sufficient from Lybanus, hee filled the passage of the Sea between the Island and the Main, which being more than once carried away by the strength of the Sea upon a storm of wind, sometime by the Tyrians fired, and sometime torn asunder, yet with the help of his Navie which arrived (during the siege) from Cyprus, he overcame all difficulties and prevailed, after he had spent seven moneths in that attempt. The Tyrians in the beginning of the siege had barbarously drowned the messengers sent by Alexander, perswading them to render the City, in respect whereof, and of the great loss of time and men, he put eight thousand to the sword, and caused two thousand of those that escaped the first fury, to bee hanged on Crosses on the Sea-shore, and reserved for slaves (saith Diadore) thirteen thousand; Arrianus reckons them at thirty thousand. Many more had died, had not the Zidonians, that served Alexander, conveyed great numbers away by shipping unto their own Citie.

Happy it was for Apollo that the Town was taken: for one of the Tyrians having dreamt, that this god meant to forsake the City, they bound him fast with a golden chain to the Idoll of Hercules; but Alexander, like a gracious Prince, loosened him again. It is true, that it was a notable enterprife and a difficult, but great things are made greater. For Nabuchodonosor had taken it before, and filled up the channell that lay between the Island and the Main.

The government of this Territory he gave to Philotas, the Son of Parmenio; Cilicia, he committed to Socrates, and Andromachus Lieutenant under Parmenio; Ephesion had charge of the Fleet, and was directed to find Alexander at Gaza towards Egypt.

S. VI.

How Darius offered conditions of peace to Alexander. Alexander wins Gaza; and deals graciously with the Jewes.

IN the mean while Darius sends again to Alexander, sets before him all the difficulties of passing on towards the East, and layeth the losse of the last battell to the streightnesse of the place: he hoped to terrifie him by threatening to encompass him in the plain Countries, he bids him to consider, how impossible it was to passe the Rivers of Euphrates, Tigris, Araxes, and the rest with all such other fearfull things: for he that was now filled with nothing but fear, had arguments enovv of that nature to present unto another. All the Kingdomes betwene the River of Alys, and the Hellespont, he offered him in Dowry with his beloved daughter. But Alexander answered, That he offered him nothing but his own, and that which victory and his own vertue had possessed him of; That he was to give conditions, and not to receive any, and that he having passed the Sea it self, disdaind to think of resistance in transporting himself over Rivers. It is said, that Parmenio, who was now old and full of honour and riches, told the King; That were he Alexander, he would accept of Darius his offers; to which Alexander answered, That so would he, if he were Parmenio.

But he goes on towards Egypt, and comming before Gaza, Getis a faithfull servant to Darius, shuts the Gate against him, and defends the Town with an obstinate resolution; so at the siege whereof Alexander received a wound in the shoulder, which was dangerous, and a blow on his legge with a stone. Hee found better men in this place than he did at the former battells, for he left so many of his Macedonians buried in the sands of Gaza, that he was forc'd to send for a new supply into Greece. Here it was that Alexander first began to change condition, and to exercise cruelty. For after that he had entred Gaza by assault, and taken Beth, (whom Josephus calleth Babemesis) that was weakened with many wounds, and who never gave ground to the Assailants, he bored holes through his feet, and caused him to be drawn about the street, whilst he was as yet alive; who being as valiant a man as himself, disdaind to ask him either life or remission of his torments.

And

And what had he to countenance this his tyrannie, but the imitation of his Ancestor Achilles, who did the like to Hector? It is true, that cruelty hath alwayes somewhat to cover her deformity.

Lib. 11. cap. ult.

From Gaza (saith Josephus) he led his Army towards Jerusalem, a City, for the antiquity and great fame thereof, well known unto him while he lay before Tyre; He had sent for some supply thither, which Jaddus the high Priest, being subject and sworn to Darius, had refused him. The Jews therefore fearing his revenge, and unable to resist, committed the care of their estates and safety to Jaddus, who, being taught by God, issued out of the City covered with his Pontificall Robes, to wit, an upper garment of purple, embroidered with gold, with his Miter, and the plate of gold wherein the name of God was written, the Priests and Levites in their rich ornaments, and the people in white garments, in a manner so unusuall, stately and grave, as Alexander greatly admired it. Josephus reports it, that he fell to the ground before the high Priest, as reverencing the name of God, and that Parmenio reprehended him for it. Howsoever it was, I am of opinion, that he became so confident in his enterprise, and so assured of the successe after the prophesie of Daniel had been read unto him, wherein he saw himself, and the conquest of Persia so directly pointed at, as nothing thenceforth could discourage him or fear him. He confessed to Parmenio (saith Josephus) that in this City of Masada, when his mind laboured the conquest of Asia, he saw in his sleep such a person as Jaddus, and so apparelled, professing one and the same God; by whom he was encouraged to pursue the purpose he had in hand, with assurance of victory. This apparition, formerly apprehended only by the light of his fantasie, he now beheld with his bodily eyes, wherewith he was so exceedingly pleased and emboldened, as contrary to the practice of the Phœnicians, (who hoped to have sack'd and destroyed Jerusalem) he gave the Jews all, and more than they desired, both of liberty and immunity, with permission to live under their own lawes, and to exercise and enjoy their own religion.

Alexander wins Egypt: and makes a journey to the Temple of Hammon.

From Jerusalem, Alexander turned again towards Egypt, and entred it, where Darius his Lieutenant, Astaces, received him, and delivered into his hand the City of Memphis, with eight hundred talents of treasure, and all other the King's riches. By this we see that the King of Persia, who had more of affection than of judgment, gave to the valiantest man he had, but the command of one City, and to the truest toward the government of all Egypt. When he had set things in order in Egypt, he began to travell after God-head, towards Jupiter Hammon, so foolish had profanity made him. He was to passe over the dangerous and drie sands, where, when the water which he brought on his Camels back was spent, he could not but have perished, had not a marvellous shewre of rain fallen upon him, when his Army was in extreme despair. All men that know Egypt, and have written thereof, affirme, That it never rains there: but the purposes of the Almighty God are secret, and he bringeth to passe what it pleaseth him, for it is also said, That when he had lost his way in those vast deserts, that a flight of Crows flew before the Army, who making faster wing when they were followed, and fluttering slowly when the Army was cast back, guided them over those pathlesse sands to Jupiter's Temple.

Arrianus from the report of Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, sayes, That he was led by two Dragons, both which reports may be a-like true. But many of those wonders and things prodigious, are fained by those that have written the Story of Alexander, as That an Eagle lay hovering directly over his head at the battell of Issus; That a Swallow flew about his head when he slept, and could not be feared from him, till it had wakened him at Halicarnassus, fore-shewing the treason of Artabanes, practised by Darius to have slain him; That from the yron barres of which the Tyrians made their defensive engine, when Alexander besieged them, there fell drops of blood; and that the like drops were found in a loafe of bread, broken by a Macedonian Souldier, at the same time; That a Turke of earth fell on his shoulder, when he lay before Gaza, out of which there flew a Bird into the air. The Spaniards in the conquest of the West Indies have many such pretty pretty tales; telling how they have been assisted in battell by the presence of our Lady, and by Angels riding on white horses with the like Romish miracles, which I think themselves do hardly believe. The strangest thing that I have read of in this kind being certainly true, was, That the night before the battell at Novara, all the Dogs which followed the French Army, ran from them to the Swissers, leaping and fawning upon them, as if they had been bred and fed by them all their lives, and in the morning following, Triumphi and Tremouille, Generals for Lewis the twelfth, were by these imperiall Swissers utterly broken and put to ruine.

The place of this Idoll of Jupiter Hammon is ill described by Curtius, for he bounds it by the Arabian Troglodites on the South, between whom and the Territory of Hammon, the Region Thebais, or the superiour Egypt, with the Mountains of Lybia, and the River of Nilus, are interjacent; and on the North he joyns it to a Nation called Nassamones, who bordering the Sea-shore, live (saith he) upon the spoyle of shipwrack: whereas the temple or grove of this Idoll hath no Sea neer it by two hundred miles and more, being found on the South part of Lybia, these Nassamones being due West from it, in the South part of Marmarica.

When Alexander came neer the place, he sent some of his Parasites before him to practise the Priests attending the Oracle, That their answer might be given in all things, agreeable to his mad ambition; who affected the title of Jupiters son. And so he was called, Son of Jupiter, by the Devils Prophet, whether prepared before to flatter him, or rather (as some think) defective in the Greek tongue; For whereas he meant to say O pater, he said O pai dios, that is, O Son of Jupiter, in stead of O dear Son: for which Grammaticall error he was richly rewarded, and a rumour presently spread, that the great Jupiter had acknowledged Alexander for his own.

He had heard that Persens and Hercules had formerly consulted with this Oracle, The one when he was employed against Gorgon, The other against Anteus and Busiris; and seeing these men had derived themselves from the gods, why might not he? By this it seems, that he hoped to make his followers and the world fools, though indeed he made himself one, by thinking to cover from the worlds knowledge his vanities and vices; and the better to confirm his followers in the belief of his Deity, he had practised the Priests to give answer to such as consulted with the Oracle, that it should be pleasing to Jupiter to honour Alexander as his Son.

Whothis Hammon was, and how represented, either by a Bosse carried in a Boat, or cur. Lib. 4. by a Ram, or a Rams head, I see that many wise men have troubled themselves to find out; but as Arrianus speaks of Dionysius, or Liber Pater (who lived saith S. Augustine, in Moses time) Ex aqua de diis veteris fabulis suis conscribere, non sunt nimium curiosi investiganda; We must not over-curiously search into the fables which the Antients have written of their gods.

But this is certain and notable, that after the Gospel began to be preached in the World, the Devill in this and all other Idols became speechlesse. For, that this Hammon was neglected in the time of Iulius Caesar, and in the time of Trajan altogether forgotten, Strabo and Plutarch witness.

There is found neer his Temple a Fountain called Fons solis (though Ptolemy in his third African Table sets it farther off) that at Mid-night is as hot as boyling water, and at Noon as cold as any yce: to which I cannot but give credit, because I have heard of some other Wells of like nature, and because it is reported by S. Augustine, by Diocoretus, Pliny, Meli, Salinus, Arrianus, Curtius, and others; and indeed our Bathes in England are much warmer in the night than in the day.

S. VIII.

How Alexander marching against Darius, was opposed very unskilfully by the Enemy.

From the Temple of Hammon he returned to Memphis, where among many other learned men, he heard the Philosopher Pammanes, who, belike understanding that he affected the title of Jupiters Son, told him that God was the Father-King of all men in generally; and refining the pride of this haughty King, brought him to say, That God was the Father of all mortall men, but that he acknowledged none for his children but good men.

Hec

Arist. Pol. 1.5.

Curt. 1.4.

He gave the charge of the severall Provinces of Egypt to severall Governours, following the rule of his Master Aristotle, That a great Dominion should not be continued in the hands of any one: whom therein the Roman Emperours also followed, not daring to commit the government of Egypt to any of their Senators, but to men of meaner rank and degree. He then gave order for the founding of Alexandria upon the Wester-most branch of Nilus. And having now settled (as he could) the estate of Egypt, with the kingdoms of the lesser Asia, Phenicia and Syria, (which being but the pawns of Darius his ill fortune, one happy victory would readily have redeemed) he led his Army towards Euphrates, which passage though the same was committed to Mazæus to defend, yet was it abandoned, and Alexander without resistance past it. From thence he marched towards Tigris, a river for the swiftnesse thereof called by the Persians, The Arrow. Here, as Curtius, and Reason it self tels us, might Darius easily have repelled the invading Macedonian: for the violent course of the stream was such, as it drave before it many weighty stones, and those that moved not, but lay in the bottom, were so round and well polished by a continuall rolling, that no man was able to fight on so slippery a footing; nor the Macedonian foot-men to wade the river, otherwise than by joyning their hands, and entrelling their arms together, making one weighty and entire body to resist the swift passage and furious race of the stream. Besides this notable help, the Channell was so deep towards the Eastern shore, where Darius should have made head, as the foot-men were enforced to lift their Bowes, and Arrows, and Darts, over their heads to keep them from being moistned, and made unserviceable by the Waters. But it was truly and understandingly sayd of Homer,

*Talis est hominum terrestrium mens,
Qualem quotidie ducit pater virorumq; Deorumq;*

The mindes of men are ever so affected,
As by Gods will they daily are directed.

And it cannot be denied, that as all Estates of the world, by the surfeit of mis-government have been subject to many grievous, and sometimes mortall diseases: So had the Empire of Persia at this time brought it self into a burning and consuming Feaver, and thereby become frantick and without understanding, foreshewing manifestly the dissolution and death thereof.

But Alexander hath now recovered the Eastern shores of Tigris, without any other difficulty, than that of the nature of the place; where Mazæus (who had charge to defend the Passage both of Euphrates and it) presented himself to the Macedonians, followed with certain companies of Horse-men, as if with uneven forces he durst have charged them on even ground, when as with a multitude farre exceeding them, he forsook the advantage which no valour of his enemies could easily have overcome. But it is commonly seen, that fearfull and cowardly men do ever follow those wayes and counsels, whereof the opportunity is already lost.

It is true that he set all provisions afire wherewith the Macedonians might serve themselves over Tigris, thinking thereby greatly to have distressed them; but the execution of good counsell is fruitlesse, when unseasonable. For now was Alexander so well furnished with carriages, as nothing was wanting to the competency of the Army which he conducted. Those things also which he sought to waste, Alexander being now in sight, were by his Horse-men saved and recovered. This Mazæus might have done some dayes before at good leasure; or at this time with so great a strength of Horse-men, as the Macedonians durst not have pursued them, leaving the strength of their foot out of sight and far behind.

The new provisions of Darius. Accidents foregoing the battell of Arbela.

Darius, upon Alexander's first return out of Egypt, had assembled all the forces, which those Regions next him could furnish, and now also were the Arians, Scythians, Indians, and other Nations arrived; Nations (saith Curtius) that rather served to make up the names of men, than to make resistance. Arrianus hath numbered

numbered them with their Leaders, and finds of foot-men of all sorts ten hundred thousand, and of horse four hundred thousand, besides armed Chariots, and some few Elephants. Curtius, who musters the Army of Darius at two hundred thousand foot, and near fifty thousand horse, comes (I think) neerer to the true number; and yet seeing he had more confidence in the multitude than in the valour of his Vassals, it is like enough that he had gathered together of all sorts some three or four hundred thousand, with which he hoped in those fair plains of Assyria, to have over-borne the few numbers of the invading Army. But it is a rule in the Philosophy of the War;

In omni pralio non tam multitudo, & virtus indocta, quam ars & exercitium solent regere.
In every battell skill and practice do more towards the victory, than multitude and rude audacity.

While Alexander gave rest to his army after the passage over Tigris, there happened an Eclipse of the Moon, of which the Macedonians, not knowing the cause and reason, were greatly affrighted. All that were ignorant (as the multitude alwaies are) took it for a certain presage of their overthrow and destruction, inso-much as they began not only to murmur, but to speak it boldly. That for the ambition of one man, a man that disdained Philip for his father, and would needs be called the son of Jupiter, they should all perish; For he not only enforced them to make war against Worlds of enemies, but against Rivers, Mountains, and the Heavens themselves.

Hereupon Alexander being ready to march forward, made a halt, & to quiet the minds of the multitude, he called before him the Egyptian Astrologers, which followed him thence, that by them the Souldiers might be assured that this defection of the Moon was a certain presage of good successe; for, that it was naturall they never imparted to the common people, but reserved the knowledge to themselves, so as a sorry Almanack-maker had been no small fool in those daies.

Of this kind of superstitious observation Cæsar made good use, when he fought against Antony and the Germans: for they being perswaded by the casting of lots, that if they fought before the change of the Moon, they should certainly lose the battell, Cæsar forced them to abide it, though they durst not give it; wherein having their minds already beaten by their own superstition, and being resolutely charged by the Romans, the whole Army in effect perished.

These Egyptians gave no other reason than this, That the Grecians were under the aspect of the Sun, the Persians of the Moon; and therefore the Moon failing and being darkened, the state of Persia was now in danger of failing, and their glory of being obscured. This judgement of the Egyptian Priests being noised through all the Army, all were satisfied, and their courage redoubled. It is a principle in the Warre, which, though devised since, was well observed then: Exercitum terrore plenum Dux ad pugnam non ducat; Let not a Captain lead his Army to the fight, when it is possessed with matter of terrour.

It is truly observed by Curtius, that the people are led by nothing so much as by superstition; yea, wee find it in all stories, and often in our own, that by such inventions, devised tales, dreams, and prophecies, the people of this Land have been carried head-long into many dangerous tumults and insurrections, and still to their own losse and ruine.

As Alexander drew neer the Persian Army, certain letters were surprized, written by Darius to the Grecians, perswading them for great summes of money, either to kill or betray Alexander. But these by the advice of Patmenis he suppressed.

At this time also Darius his fair Wife, oppressed with sorrow, and wearied with travell, died. Which accident Alexander seemed no lesse to bewaile than Darius, who upon the first bruit, suspected that some dishonourable violence had been offered her; but being satisfied by an Eunuch of his own that attended her, of Alexander's kingly respect towards her, from the day of her being taken, he desired the immortal Gods, That if they had decreed to make a new Master of the Persian Empire, then it would please them to confer it on so just and continent an enemy as Alexander, to whom he once again before the last tryall by battell offered these conditions of peace.

That with his Daughter in marriage he would deliver up and resign all Asia the less, and with Egypt, all those kingdoms between the Phenician sea, and the River of Euphrates; That he would pay him for the ranfome of his Mother, and his other Daughters, 30

thousand talents, and that for the performance thereof, he would leave his son Ochus in hostage: To this they sought to perswade Alexander by such arguments as they had. Alexander causing the Embassadors to be removed, advised with his Councell, but heard no man speak but Parmenio, the very right hand of his good fortune, who perswaded him to accept of these fair conditions. He told him, that the Empire between Euphrates and Hellespont was a fair addition to Macedon, that the retaining of the Persian prisoners was a great cumber, and the treasure offered for them of far better use than their persons, with divers other arguments; all which Alexander rejected. And yet it is probable that if he had followed his advice, and bounded his ambition within those limits, he might have lived as famous for vertue as for fortune, and left himself a Successor of able age to have enjoyed his estate, which afterward indeed he much enlarged, rather to the greatening of others than himself: who to assure themselves of what they had usurped upon his issues, left not one of them to draw breath in the world within a few years after. The truth is, That Alexander in going so far into the East, left behind him the reputation which he brought out of Macedon, the reputation of a just and prudent Prince, a Prince temperate, advised and gratefull: and being taught new lessons by abundance of prosperity, became a lover of wine, of his own flattery, and of extreme cruelty. Yea, as Seneca hath observed, the taint of one unjust slaughter, amongst many, defaced and withered the flourishing beauty of all his great acts and glorious victories obtained. But the Persian Embassadors stay his answer, which was to this effect, That whatsoever he had bestowed on the wife and children of Darius, proceeded from his own naturall clemency and magnanimity, without all respect to their Master, but thanks to an enemy was improper: that he made no Wars against adversity, but against those that resisted him; not against Women and Children, but against armed enemies: and although by the reiterated practice of Darius, to corrupt his Souldiers, and by great summes of money to perswade his friends to attempt upon his person, he had reason to doubt that the peace offered was rather pretended than meant, yet he could not (were it otherwise and faithfull) resolve in haste to accept the same, seeing Darius had made Warre against him, not as a King with Royall and overt force, but as a Traytor by secret and base practice; That for the Territory offered him, it was already his own, and if Darius could beat him back again over Euphrates, which he had already past, he would then believe that he offered him somewhat in his own power: Otherwise he propounded to himself for the reward of the War which he had made, all those kingdomes as yet in Darius possession; wherein, whether he were abused by his own hopes or no, the battell which he meant to fight in the day following should determine. For in conclusion, he told them, that he came into Asia to give, & not to receive; That the heavens could not hold two Suns: and therefore if Darius would be content to acknowledge Alexander for his Superiour, he might perchance be perswaded to give him conditions fit for a second Person, and his Inferiour.

The battell of Arbela: and that it could not be so strongly fought as reports hath made it.

With this answer the Embassadors return; Darius prepares to fight, and sends Mazeus to defend a passage, which he never dared yet so much as to hazard. Alexander consults with his Captains, Parmenio perswades him to force Darius his Camp by night; so that the multitude of enemies might not move terror in the Macedonians being but few. Alexander disdains to steal the victory, and resolves to bring with him the day-light, to witnesse his valour. But it was the success that made good Alexander's resolution, though the counsell given by Parmenio was more found: For it is a ground in War, Si pauci necessarij cum multitudine pugnare cogantur, consilium est noctis tempore belli fortunam tentare, Notwithstanding upon the view of the multitude at hand, he staggers and trenches himself upon a ground of advantage, which the Persian had abandoned: And whereas Darius for fear of surprise had stood with his Army in armour all the day, and forborn sleep all the night, Alexander gave his men rest and store of food; for reason had taught him this Rule in the Warre, In pugna Milites validius resistunt, si cibo potuque refecti fuerint, nam fames intrinsecus magis magis pignat, quam ferrum exterius; Souldiers do the better stand to it in fight, if they have their bellies full of meat and drink; for hunger within, fights more eagerly than steel without.

The numbers which Alexander had, saith Arrianus, were forty thousand foot, and seven thousand horse; these belike were of the European Army; for he had besides both Syrians, Indians, Egyptians, and Arabians, that followed him out of those Regions. He used but a short speech to his Souldiers to encourage them, and I think that he needed little Rhetorick; for by the two former battels upon the River of Granick, and in Cilicia, the Macedonians were best taught with what men they were to encounter. And it is a true saying, Victoria victoriam parat, animusque victoriam augeat, & adversariis adversis, Outvictory begets another, and puts courage into those that have already had the better, taking spirit away from those that have been beaten.

Arrianus and Curtius make large descriptions of this battell, fought at Gangamela; They tell us of many charges and re-charges: That the victory inclined sometime to the Persians, sometime to the Macedonians; That Parmenio was in danger of being overthrown, who led the left wing; That Alexander's Rear-guard was broken, and his carriages lost; That for the fierce and valorous encounters on both sides, Fortune herself was long unresolved on whom to bestow the Garland: And lastly, that Alexander in person wrought wonders, being charged in his retreat. But in conclusion, Curtius delivers us in account but three hundred dead Macedonians, in all this terrible daies work, saying, That Ephesion, Perdiccas, and others of name were wounded. Arrianus finds for a third part of this number slain; of the Persians there fell forty thousand (saith Curtius) thirty thousand according to Arrianus; Ninety thousand, if we believe Dionysius. But what can we judge of this great encounter, other than that, as in the two former battels, the Persians upon the first charge ran away, and that the Macedonians put them to flight? For if of those four or five hundred thousand Arians brought into the field by Darius, every man had cast but a dart or a stone, the Macedonians could not have bought the Empire of the East at so easie a rate, as six or seven hundred men in three notorious battels. Certainly, if Darius had fought with Alexander upon the banks of Euphrates, he had armed but fifty or threescore thousand of this great multitude, only with Spades, (for the most of all he had were fit for no other weapon) it had been impossible for him to have past that River so easily, much less the River of Tigris. But as a man whole Empire God in his providence had determined, he abandoned all places of advantage, and suffered Alexander to enter so far into the bowels of his Kingdome, as all hope and possibility of escape by retreat being taken from the Macedonians, they had presented unto them the choice, either of death or victory: to which election Darius could no way constrain his own, seeing they had many large Regions to run into from those that invaded them.

Of things following the battell of Arbela. The yeelding of Babylon and Susa.

Darius after the rout of his Army recovered Arbela the same night, better followed in his flight, than in the fight. He propounded unto them that ran after him his purpose of making a retreat into Media, perswading them that the Macedonians, greedy of spoyle and riches, would rather attempt Babylon, Susa, and other Cities filled with treasure, than pursue the vanquished. This miserable resolution his Nobility rather obeyed than approved.

Alexander soon after Darius his departure arrives at Arbela, which with a great masse of treasure, and Princely ornaments, was rendred to him: for the fear which conducted Darius, took nothing with it but shame and dishonour. He that had been twice beaten, should rather have sent his treasure into Media, than brought it to Arbela, so neer the place where he abid the coming of his enemies; if he had been victorious, he might have brought it after him at leisure; but being overcome, he knew it impossible to drive Mules and Camels laden with gold from the pursuing Enemy, seeing himself, at the overthrow he had in Cilicia, cast the Crown from his head, to run away with the more speed. But errors are then best discerned when most incurable. Et praterita magis reprehendi possunt quam corrigi; It is easier to reprehend than amend what is past.

From Arbela Alexander took his way towards Babylon, where Mazeus, in whom Darius had most confidence, rendred himself, his Children and the Citie. Also the Captain of the Castle, who was keeper of the treasure, strewed the streets with flowers, burnt Frankincense upon Altars of silver as Alexander passed by, and delivered unto him whatsoever was committed to his trust. The Magi (the Chaldean Astrologers) followed this Captain in great solemnitie to entertain their new King: after these came the Babylonian horsemen, infinite rich in attire, but exceeding poor in warlike furniture. Between these (though not greatly to be feared) and himself, Alexander caused his Macedonian foot-men to march. When he entered the Castle, he admired the glorie thereof, and the abundance of treasure therein found, amounting to fifty thousand talents of silver uncoyned. The Citie it self I have else where described, with the Walls, the Towers, the Gates and Circuit, with the wonderfull place of pleasure about two miles in Circuit, surrounded with a wall of fourscore foot high, and on the top thereof (being under-born with Pillars) a Grove of beautifull and fruitfull trees, which it is said that one of the Kings of Babylon caused to be built, that the Queen and other Princeesses might walk privately therein. In this Citie, rich in all things, but most of all in voluptuous pleasures, the King rested himself and the whole Army four and thirty dayes, consuming that time in banquetting, and in all sorts of effeminate exercise; which so much softened the minds of the Macedonians, not acquainted till now with the like delicacies, as the severe discipline of war, which taught them the sufferances of hunger and thirst, of painfull travell, and hard lodging, began rather to be forgotten, than neglected.

Here it was that those bands of a thousand Souldiers were erected, and Commanders appointed over them, who thereupon were stiled Chiliarchi. This new order Alexander brought in, was to honour those Captains which were found by certain selected Judges to have deserved best in the late warre. For before this time the Macedonian companies consisted but of five hundred. Certainly the drawing down of the foot-bands in this latter age hath been the cause (saith the Marshall Monluc) that the title and charge of a Captain hath been bestowed on every Pique-Bœuf or Spurn-Cow; for when the Captains of foot had a thousand Souldiers under one Ensigne, and after that five hundred, as in the time of Francis the first, the title was honourable, and the kings were lesse charged, and far better served. King Henry the eighth of England never gave the commandement of any of his good ships, but to men of known valour, and of great estate, nay sometime he made two Gentlemen of qualitie Commanders in one ship: but all orders and degrees are fallen from the reputation they had.

While Alexander was yet in Babylon, there came to him a great supply out of Europe; for Antipater sent him six thousand foot, and five hundred horse out of Macedon; of Thracians three thousand foot, and the like number of horse; and out of Greece four thousand and four hundred horse, by which his Armie was greatly strengthened: for those that were infected with the pleasures of Babylon, could hardly be brought again, De quitter la plume pour dormir sur la dure; To change from soft beds to hard boards.

He left the Castle and Citie of Babylon, with the Territories about it, in charge with three of his own Captains, to wit, Agathon, Minetus, and Appolidorus; to supply all wants, a thousand talents: but to grace Mazeus, who rendred the Citie unto him, he gave him the title of his Lieutenant over all, and took with him Bagistines that gave up the Castle, and having distributed to every Souldier a part of the Treasure, he left Babylon, and entered into the Province Satrapene: from thence he went on toward Susa in Persia, the same which Ptolomy, Herodotus, and Eliaius call Memnonia, situate on the river Euleus, a Citie sometime governed by Daniel the Prophet. Abulites also, Governor of this famous Citie, gave it up to the Conqueror, with fiftie thousand talents of silver in bullion, and twelve Elephants for the warre, with all other the treasures of Darius. In this sort did those Vassals of fortune, lovers of the Kings prosperitie, not of his person, (for so all ambitious men are) purchase their own peace and safetie with the Kings treasures. And herein was Alexander well advised, that whatsoever titles he gave to the Persians, yet he left all places of importance in trust with his own Captains, to wit, Babylon, Susa, and Persepolis, with other Cities and Provinces by him conquered; for if Darius (as yet living) had beaten the Macedonians but in one battell, all the Nobles of Persia would have returned unto their naturall Lord. Those that are Traitors for their own Kings, are never to be used alone in great enterprises by those Princes that entertain them, nor ever to be trusted with the defences of any frontier-Town, or Fortresse of weight, by the rendring whereof they may redeem their liberty and estates lost. Hereof the French had experience, when Don Pedro de Navarra, being banished out of Spain, was trusted with Fonterabe, in the year 1523.

While Alexander spoiled Arbela, Mazeus might have furnish'd the King from Babylon; and while he stayed four and thirty dayes at Babylon, Abulites might have holpen him from Susa; and while he feasted there, Tiridates from Persepolis might have relieved him, for the great masse of Treasure was layd up in that City. But who hath sought out and friended fearfull adversity? It is certain, that benefits bind not the ambitious; but the honest: for those that are but greedy of themselves, do in all changes of fortune only consult the conservation of their own greatnesse.

The government of Susa, with the Castle and Treasure, he committed to his own Macedonians, making Abulites, who rendred it unto him, his Lieutenant, as he had done Mazeus and others, in giving them titles, but neither trust nor power; for he left three thousand old Souldiers in Garrison to assure the place; and Darius mother and her children to repose themselves.

It is said that Charles the first, having promised Charles of Bourbon the government of Marfeilles, if he could have forc'd it, and whereof he made sure accompt, told some of his nearest Counsellors, that he meant nothing lesse than the performance of that promise, because he should thereby have left the Duke (revolted from his Master) very well wherewithall to have recovered his favour.

§. XII.

How Alexander came to Persepolis and burnt it.

From Susa Alexander leadeth his Army toward Persepolis, and when he sought to passe those Mountains which sunder Susiana and Persia, he was soundly beaten by Ariobarzanes, who defended against him those Streights, called Pyle Perside, or Sesidae, and after the losse of many Companies of his Macedonians, he was forc'd to save himself by retreat, causing his Foot to march close together, and to cover themselves with their Targets from the stones tumbled on them from the Mountain top. Yet in the end he found out another path, which a Lycian, living in that Country, discovered unto him; and came thereby suddenly in view of Ariobarzanes, who being inforc'd to fight upon even ground, was by Alexander broken, whereupon he fled to Persepolis, but (after that they of Persepolis had refused to receive him) he returned and gave a second charge upon the Macedonians, wherein he was slain. In like manner did King Francis the first, in the year 1515, find a way over the Alpes, the Switzers undertaking to defend all the passages, who, if their footmanship had not saved them upon the Kings descent on the other side, they had been ill payd for their hard lodging on those Hills.

Four thousand Greeks, saith Curtius (Justin numbers them but at eight hundred) having bin taken prisoners by the Persians, presented themselves to Alexander now in sight of Persepolis. These had the barbarous Persians so maimed and defaced, by cutting off their hands, noses, ears, and other members, as they could no way have been known to their Country-men, but by their voyces; to each of these Alexander gave three hundred Crowns, with new garments, and such Lands as they liked to live upon.

Tiridates, one of Darius his false-hearted Grandes, hearing of Alexanders approach, made him know that Persepolis was ready to receive him, and prayed him to double his pace, because there was a determination in the people to spoyle the Kings treasure. This City was abandoned by many of her Inhabitants upon Alexanders arrivall, and they that stayed followed the worst counsell; for all was left to the liberty of the souldiers, to spoyle and kill at their pleasure. There was no place in the world at that time, which, if it had been laid in the ballance with Persepolis, would have weighed it down. Babylon indeed, and Susa, were very rich; but in Persepolis lay the bulk and main store of the Persians. For after the spoyle that had been made of money, curious plate, bullion, Images of gold and silver, and other Jewels, there remained to Alexander himself one hundred and twenty thousand talents. He left the same number of three thousand

Macedonians in Persepolis, which he had done in Susa, and gave the same formall honour to the traitor Tiridates, that he had done to Abulites; but he that had the trust of the place was Nicarides, a creature of his own. The body of his Army he left here for thirty daies, of which the Commanders were Parmenio and Craterus, and with a thousand horse, and certain troupes of chosen foot, he would needs view in the Winter-time those parts of Persia, which the Snow had covered; a fruitlesse and foolish enterprise, but as Seneca saies; Non ille ire vult, sed non potest stare: He hath not a will to goe, but he is unable to stand still. It is said and spoken in his praise, That when his Souldiers cryed out against him, because they could not endure the extreme frost, and make way, but with extreme difficulty, through the snow, that Alexander forsook his horse, and led them the way. But what can be more ridiculous than to bring other men into extremity, thereby to shew how well himself can endure it? His walking on foot did no otherwise take off their wearinesse that followed him, than his sometime forbearing to drink, did quench their thirst, that could lesse endure it. For mine own little judgement, I shall rather commend that Captain that makes careful provision for those that follow him, and that seeks wisely to prevent extreme necessitie, than those witlesse arrogant fools, that make the vaunt of having endured equally with the common Souldier, as if that were a matter of great glory and importance.

We find in all the Wars that Caesar made, or the best of the Roman Commanders, that the provision of victuals was their first care. For it was true saying of Coligni, Admirall of France, That who so will shape that Beast (meaning War) must begin with his belly.

Cwt. Lib. 5.

But Alexander is now returned to Persepolis, where those Historians that were most amorous of his vertues, complain, that the opinion of his valour, of his liberality, of his clemency towards the vanquished, and all other his Kingly conditions, were drowned in drink; That he smothered in carousing cups all the reputation of his actions past, and that by descending, as it were, from the reverend Throne of the greatest King, into the company and familiarity of base Harlots, he began to be despised both of his own and all other Nations. For being perswaded, when he was inflamed with wine, by the infamous Strumpet Thais, he caused the most sumptuous and goodly Castle and Citie of Persepolis to be consumed with fire, notwithstanding all the arguments of Parmenio to the contrary, who told him that it was a dishonour to destroy those things by the persuasions of others, which by his proper vertue and force he had obtained; and that it would be a most strong perswasion to the Asians, to think hardly of him, and thereby alien their hearts; for they might well beleeve that he which demolished the goodliest Ornaments they had, meant nothing lesse than (after such vastation) to hold their possession. Per vinolentiam crudelitas sequitur; Cruelty doth commonly follow drunkennesse: For it so fell out soon after, and often, in Alexander.

Sen. Ep. 8. 4.

The Treason of Bessus against Darius. Darius his death.

About this time he received a new supply of Souldiers out of Cilicia, and goes on to find Darius in Media. Darius had there compounded his fourth and last Army, which he meant to have increased in Bactria, had he not heard of Alexander's coming on, with whom (trusting to such companies as he had, which was numbered at thirty or forty thousand) he determined once again to try his fortune. He therefore calls together his Captains and Commanders, and propounds unto them his resolution, who being desperate of good successe, used silence for a while. Artabazus, one of his eldest men of War, who had sometime lived with Philip of Macedon, brake the yce, and protesting that he could never be beaten by any adversity of the Kings, from the faith which he had ever ought him, with firm confidence, that all the rest were of the same condition (whereof they likewise assured Darius by the like protestation) hee approved the Kings resolution. Two only, and those the greatest, to wit, Naburzanes and Bessus, whereof the later was governour of Bactria, had conspired against their Master; and therefore advised the King to lay a new foundation for the Warre, and to pursue it by some such person for the present, against whom neither the gods nor fortune had in all things declared themselves to be an enemy: this preamble Naburzanes used, and

and in conclusion advised the election of his fellow Traitor Bessus, with promise that the warre ended, the Empire should again be restored to Darius. The King swollen with disdain, prest towards Naburzanes to have slain him, but Bessus and the Bactrians whom he commanded, being more in number than the rest, withheld him. In the mean while Naburzanes with-drew himself, and Bessus followed him, making their quarter a-part from the rest of the Army. Artabazus, the Kings faithfull servant, perswaded him to be advised and serve the time, seeing Alexander was at hand, and that he would at least make shew of forgetting the offence made; which the King being of a gentle disposition, willingly yeelded unto. Bessus makes his submission, and attends the King, who removes his Army. Patron, who commanded a Regiment of four thousand Greeks, which had in all the former battels served Darius with great fidelity, and alwayes made the retreat in spite of the Macedonians, offered himself to guard his person, protesting against the Treason of Bessus; but it was not his destiny to follow their advice who from the beginning of the Warre gave him faithfull counsell; but hee inclined still to Bessus, who told him, that the Greeks, with Patron their Captain, were corrupted by Alexander, and practised the division of his faithfull servants: Bessus had drawn unto him thirty thousand of the Army; promising them all those things, by which the lovers of the World and themselves are wont to be allured; to wit, riches, safety, and honour.

Now the day following Darius plainly discovered the purposes of Bessus, and being overcome with passion, as thinking himself unable to make head against these ungrateful and unnatural Traytors, he prayed Artabazus his faithfull servant to depart from him, and to provide for himself. In like sort he discharged the rest of his attendants, all save a few of his Eunuches; for his Guards had voluntarily abandoned him: His Persians being most base cowards, durst not undertake his defence against the Bactrians, notwithstanding that they had four thousand Greeks to joyn with him, who had been able to have beaten both Nations. But it is true, that him, which forsakes himself, no man follows. It had been far more Man-like, and King-like, to have dyed in the head of those four thousand Greeks, which offered him the disposition of their lives, (to which Artabazus perswaded him) than to have lyen bewailing himself on the ground, and suffering himself to be bound like a slave by those ambitious Monsters that laid hand on him, whom neither the consideration of his former great estate, nor the honour he had given them, nor the trust reposed in them, nor the world of benefits bestowed on them, could move to pity: no, nor his present adversity, which above all things should have moved them, could pierce their viperous and ungratefull hearts. Vain it was indeed to hope it; for infidelity hath no compassion.

Now Darius, thus forsaken, was bound and laid in a Cart, covered with hides of Beasts, to the end that by any other ornament he might not be discovered; and to adde despight and derision to his adversity, they fastned him with Chains of Gold, and so drew him on among their ordinarie Carriages and Carts. For Bessus and Naburzanes perswaded themselves to redeem their lives and the Provinces they held, either by delivering him a prisoner to Alexander, or, if that hope failed, to make themselves kings by his slaughter; and then to defend themselves by force of Arms. But they failed in both. For it was against the nature of God, who is most just, to pardon so strange villanie, yea, though against a Prince purely Heathenish and an Idolater.

Alexander having knowledge that Darius was retired towards Bactria, and durst not abide his coming, hastened after him with a violent speed, and because he would not force his footmen beyond their powers, he mounted on horse-back certain selected companies of them, and best armed, and with six thousand other horse, rather ran than marched after Darius. Such as hated the Treason of Bessus, and secretly forsook him, gave knowledge to Alexander of all that had happened, informing him of the way that Bessus took, and how neer he was at hand: for many men of worth daily ran from him. Hereupon Alexander again doubled his pace, and his Vant-guard being discovered by Bessus his Rear, Bessus brought a Horse to the Cart, where Darius lay bound, perswading him to mount thereon, and to save himself. But the unfortunate King refusing to follow those that had betrayed him, they cast Darts at him, wounded him to death, and wounded the Beasts that drew him, and flew two poor Servants that attended his person. This done, they all fled that could, leaving the rest to the mercie of the Macedonian Swords.

Polystratus

Polystratus a Macedonian, being by pursuit of the vanquished preft with thirst, as hee was refreshing himself with some water that he had discovered, espying a Cart with a Team of wounded beasts breathing for life, and not able to move, searched the same, and therein found Darius bathing in his own blood: And by a Persian Captive which followed this Polystratus, he understood that it was Darius, and was informed of his barbarous Tragedy. Darius also seemed greatly comforted (if dying men ignorant of the living God can be comforted) that he cast not out his last sorrowes unheard, but that by this Macedonian, Alexander might know and take vengeance on those Traytors, which had dealt no lesse unworthily than cruelly with him, recommending their revenge to Alexander by this messenger, which he besought him to pursue, not because Darius had desired it, but for his own honour, and for the safety of all that did, or should after wear Crowns. He also having nothing else to present, rendered thanks to Alexander for the Kingly grace, used towards his Wife, Mother, and Children, desiring the immortal gods to submit unto him the Empire of the whole World. As he was thus speaking impatient death pressing out his few remaining spirits, he desired water, which Polystratus presented him, after which he lived but to tell him, that of all the best things that the world had, which were lately in his power, he had nothing remaining but his last breath, wherewith to desire the gods to reward his compassion.

How Alexander pursued Bessus, and took into his grave Darius his Captains.

It was now hoped by the Macedonians, that their travels were neer an end, every man preparing for his return. Hereof when Alexander had knowledge, he was greatly grieved, for the bounded earth sufficed not his boundlesse Ambition. Many arguments he therefore used to draw on his Army farther into the East, but that which had most strength, was, that Bessus, a most cruell traytor to his Master Darius, having at his devotion the Hircanians and Bactrians, would in short time (if the Macedonians should return) make himself Lord of the Persian Empire, and enjoy the fruits of all their former travels. In conclusion he wan their consents to go on: which done, leaving Craterus with certain Regiments of foot, and Amyntus with six thousand horse in Parthenia, he enters not without some opposition into Hircania; for the Mardons, and other barbarous Nations, defended certain passages for a while. He passeth the river of Zioborus, which taking beginning in Parthia, dissolves it self in the Caspian Sea: it runneth under the ledge of Mountains, which bound Parthia & Hircania, where hiding it self under ground for three hundred furlongs, it then riseth again; and followeth its former course. In Zadracarta, or Zendracarta, the same City which Ptolomy writes Hircania, the Metropolis of that Region, he rested fifteen dayes, banquetting and feasting therein.

Phataphernes, one of Darius his greatest Commanders, with others of his best followers, submit themselves to Alexander, and were restored to their places and governments. But of all other he graced Artabazus most highly for his approved and constant faith to his master Darius. Artabazus brought with him ten thousand and five hundred Greeks, the remainder of all those that had served Darius; He treats with Alexander for their pardon, before they were yet arrived, but in the end, they render themselves simply without promise or composition: he pardons all but the Lacedemonians, whom he imprisoned, their Leader having slain himself. He was also wrought (though to his great dishonour) to receive Nabarzanes that had joynd with Bessus to murder Darius.

Of Thalestris Queen of the Amazons; where, by way of digression, it is shewed, that just Amazons have been and are.

Here it is said that Thalestris or Minoshea, a Queen of the Amazons, came to visit him, and her sute was, (which she easily obtained) that she might accompany him till she were made with child by him: which done (refusing to follow him into India) she returned into her own Country.

Plutarch

Plutarch citeth many Historians, reporting this meeting of Thalestris with Alexander, and some contradicting it. But indeed, the letters of Alexander himself to Antipater, recounting all that befell him in those parts, and yet omitting to make mention of this Amazonian businesse, may justly breed suspicion of the whole matter as forged. Much more justly may we suspect it as a vain tale, because an Historian of the same time reading one of his books to Lyfimachus (then King of Thrace) who had followed Alexander in all his voyage, was laugh at by the King for inserting such newes of the Amazons; and Lyfimachus himself had never heard of. One that accompanied Alexander, took upon him to write his acts; which to amplify, He told how the King had fought single with an Elephant, and slain it. The King hearing such stuff, caught the book, and threw it into the river of Indus, saying, That it were well done to throw the writer after it, who by inserting such fables, disparaged the truth of his great exploits. Yet as we believe & know that there are Elephants, though it were false that Alexander fought with one; so may we give credit unto writers making mention of such Amazons; whether it were true or false that they met with Alexander; as Plutarch leaves the matter undetermined. Therefore I will here take leave to make digression, as well to shew the opinions of the ancient Historians, Cosmographers, and others, as also of some modern discoverers touching these warlike Women, because not only Strabo, but many others of these our times make doubt, whether or no there were any such kind of people. Julius Solinus seats them in the North parts of Asia the lesse. Pom. Melâ finds two Regions filled with them; the one on the River Thermodoon, the other neer the Caspian Sea; Quas (saith he) Sauromatidas appellant; Which the people call Sauromatidas. The former of these two had the Cimerians for their Neighbours, Certum est (saith Vadianus, who hath commented upon Mela) illos proximos Amazonibus fuisse; It is certain that the Cimerians were the next Nations to the Amazons. Ptolomy sets them farther into the Land North-wards, neer the Mountains Hippaci, not far from the Pillars of Alexander. And that they had Dominion in Asia it self toward India, Solinus and Pliny tell us, Where they governed a people called the Pandæans, or Piddæans, so called after Pandæ the Daughter of Hercules, from whom all the rest derive themselves. Claudian sometimes, That they commanded many Nations: For he speaks (largely perhaps as a Poet) thus:

Medus levibusque Sabais Imperat hic Sexus: Reginarumque sub armis, Barbaria pars magna jacet.

Over the Medes, and light Sabaean reigns
This female sex: and under arms of Queen, Great part of the Barbarian Land remains.

Didorus Siculus hath heard of them in Lybia, who were more ancient (saith he) than those which kept the banks of Thermodoon; a River falling into the Euxine Sea, neer Heractium.

Herodotus doth also make report of these Amazons, whom he tells us that the Scythians call Eorpatas, which is as much as Viricidas, or men-killers. And that they made incursion into Asia the lesse, sackt Ephesus, and burnt the Temple of Diana, Manethon, and Aventinus report, which they performed forty years after Troy was taken. At the siege of Troy it self we read of Penthesilea, That she came to the succour of Priamus.

Am. Marcellinus gives the cause of their inhabiting upon the River of Thermodoon, speaking confidently of the wars they made with divers Nations, & of their overthrow. Plutarch in the life of Theseus, out of Philochorus, Hellenicus, and other ancient Historians, reports the taking of Antiopa Queen of the Amazons by Hercules, and by him given to Theseus, though some affirm, That Theseus himself got her by stealth, when she came to visit him aboard his ship. But in substance there is little difference; all confessing, That such Amazons there were. The same Author in the life of Pompey speaks of certain companies of the Amazons, that came to ayd the Albanians against the Romans, by whom after the battell, many Targets and Buskins of theirs were taken up: and he saith farther, That these women entertain the Gela and Lelages once a year, Nations inhabiting between them and the Albanians.

But

part. 1. c. 28.

But to omit the many Authors, making mention of Amazons that were in the old times, Frán Lopez, who hath written the navigation of Orellana, which he made down the river of Amazons from Peru, in the year 1542. (upon which river, for the divers turnings, he is said to have sailed six thousand miles) reports from the relation of the said Orellana, to the Councell of the Indies, That he both saw those women, and fought with them, where they sought to impeach his passage towards the East-Sea.

It is also reported by Ulrichus Schmidel, that in the year 1542. when he sailed up the Rivers of Paragna and Parabol, that he came to a King of that Country, called Scherua, inhabiting under the Tropick of Capricorn, who gave his Captain Ermendo Rieffere, a Crown of silver, which he had gotten in fight from a Queen of the Amazons in those parts.

Ed. Lopez, in his description of the Kingdome of Congo, makes relation of such Amazons, telling us, That (agreeable to the reports of elder times) they burn off their right breasts, and live apart from men, save at one time of the year, when they feast and accompany them for one moneth. These (saith he) possesse a part of the Kingdome of Monamapa in Africa, nineteen degrees to the Southward of the line: and that these women are the strongest Guards of this Emperour, all the East-Indian Portugals know.

I have produced these authorities in part, to justify mine own relation of these Amazons, because that which was delivered me for truth by an ancient Cacique of Guiana, how upon the River of Papamena (since the Spanish discoveries called Amazons) that these women still live and govern, was held for a vain and unprobable report.

How Alexander fell into the Persian Luxurie: and how he further pursued Bessus.

NOW as Alexander had begun to change his conditions after the taking of Persia: so at this time his prosperitie had so much over-wrought his vertue, as he accounted clemencie to be but basenesse, and the temperance which he had used all his life-time, but a poor and dejected humour, rather becomming the instructors of his youth, than the condition and state of so mighty a King as the World could not equall. For he perswaded himself that he now represented the greatnesse of the gods; he was pleased that those that came before him, should fall to the ground and adore him, he wore the robes and garments of the Persians, and commanded that his Nobilitie should do the like: he entertained in his Court and Camp, the same shameless rabble of Curtians, and Sodomiticall Eunuchs, that Darius had done, and imitated in all things the proud, voluptuous, and detested manners of the Persians, whom he had vanquished. So licentious is felicity, as notwithstanding that he was fully perswaded, that the gods whom he served (detesting the vices of the invaded) assisted him in all attempts against them, he himself, contrary to the Religion he professed (which how Idolatrous soever it were, could not be but fearful unto him by neglecting it) became by imitation, & not by ignorance or education, a more foul and fearfull Monster than Darius, from whose tyrannie he vaunted to have delivered so many Nations. Yea, those that were dearest and neereest unto him, began to be alhamed of him, entertaining each other with this, and the like scornfull discourse. That Alexander of Macedon was become one of Darius his licentious Courtiers; That by his example, the Macedonians were in the end of so many travels, more impoverished in their vertues, than enriched by their victories; and that it was hard to judge whether the Conquerors, or the Conquered were the baser slaves. Neither were these opinions so reserved, but that the noise of them came to his ears. He therefore with great gifts sought to pacifie the better sort, and those of whose judgements he was most jealous, and making it known to the Armie, that Bessus had assumed the title of a King, and called himself Artaxerxes, and that he had compounded a great Armie of the Bactrians, and other Nations; he had arguments enow to perswade them to goe on, to the end that all already gotten, might not with themselves (so farre engaged) be cast away. And because they were pestered with the spoiles of so many Cities, as the whole armie seemed but the guard of their carriages, (not much unlike the warfare of the French) having commanded every mans fardels to be brought into the Market-place, he, together with his own, caused all to be consumed with fire. Certainly, this could not but have proved most dangerous unto him, seeing the common Souldiers had more interest in these things which they had bought with their painfull travells, and with their blood, than in the Kings ambition; had not (as Seneca often observed) his happy temerity overcome all things. As he was in his way, newes came to him, that Satibarcanes, whom he had established in his former government over the Arrians, was revolted; whereupon leaving the way of Bactria, he sought him out; but the Rebelle, hearing of his coming, fled to Bessus, with two thousand Horse. He then went on towards Bessus, and by setting a great pile of wood on fire, with the advantage of a strong wind, won the passage over an high and unaccessable Rock, which was defended against him with thirteen thousand foot. For the extremity of the Flame and smoak forced them from the place, otherwise invincible. I saw in the third civill warre of Rome, certain Caves in Lagudes, which had but one entrance, and that very narrow, cut out in the mid-way of high Rocks, which we knew not how to enter by any ladder or engine, till at last, by certain bundles of straw, let down by an yron chain, and a weighty stone in the midst, those that defended it, were so smothered, as they rendred themselves, with their plate, money, and other goods therein hidden. There were also some three years before my arrival in Guiana, three hundred Spaniards well mounted, smothered to death, together with their Horses, by the Countre-people, who did set the long dry grasse on fire to the Eastward of them, (the wind in those parts being alwayes East) so as notwithstanding their flying from the smoak, there was not any one that escaped. Sir John Burrowes also, with a hundred English, was in great danger of being lost at Margarita, in the West-Indies, by having the grasse fired behind him; but the smoak being timely discovered, he recovered the Sea-shore with the losse of sixteen of his men. I remember these things, but to give caution to those that shall in times to come invade any part of those Countries, that they alwayes, before they passe into the Land, burn down the grasse and siege to the East of them; they may otherwise, without any other enemy than a handfull of straw set one fire, dye the death of honey-Bees, burnt out of the Hive.

A Conspiracie against Alexander. The death of Philotas and Parmenio.

Alexander was, after he parted hence, no where resisted, till he came into Asia, to the East of Bactria, where the chief City of that Province, called Artacoana, was a while defended against him, by the revolt of Satibarcanes, but in the end he received the Inhabitants to mercie. At this place his Army was re-enforced with a new supply of five thousand and five hundred foot, and neer five hundred Horse, out of Greece, Thessalie, and other places. His journey out of Persia into these parts, is very curiously described: For having (as all his Historians tell us) a determination to find Bessus in Bactria, he leaves it at the very entrance, and takes the way of Hyrcania, from thence he wanders Northwards towards the obscure Mardi, upon the Caspian-Sea, and thence over the Mountain Corumus into Asia and Drangiana. At this time it was that the treason of Dimnus brake out, of which Philotas the sonne of Parmenio was accused, as accessory, if not principall. This Dimnus, having (I know not upon what ground) conspired with some others against the life of Alexander, went about to draw Nicomachus, a young man whom he loved, into the same treason. The Youth, although he was first bound by oath to secrecy, when he heard so foul a matter uttered, began to protest against it so vehemently, that his friend was like to have slain him for security of his own life. So, constrained by fear, he made shew as if hee had been won by perswasion; and by seeming at length to like well of the businesse, he was not more at large what they were that had undertaken it. There were nine or ten of them, all men of rank, whose names Dimnus (to countenance the enterprise) reckoned up to Nicomachus. Nicomachus had no sooner freed himself from the company of this traitor Dimnus, than he acquainted his own brother Ceballinus with the whole History: whereupon it was agreed between them, that Ceballinus (who might with least suspicion) should go to the Court, and utter all, Ceballinus, meeting with Philotas, told him the whole by-gone; desiring him to acquaint the King therewith: which he promised to do, but did not. Two dayes passed, and Philotas never brake with the King about the matter, but still excused himself to Ceballinus by the Kings want of leisure. This his coldness bred suspition, and caused Ceballinus to addresse himself to another, one Metran, Keeper of the Kings Armorie, who forth-with brought him to Alexanders presence. Alexander, finding by examination what had passed between Ceballinus and Philotas, did fully perswade himself that this concealment of the treason, argued his hand to have been in the businesse. Therefore when Dimnus was brought before him, he asked the Traitor no other question than this: Wherein have I so offended thee, that thou shouldst think Philotas more worthy to be King than I? Dimnus perceiving when he was apprehended, how the matter went, had so wounded himself, that he lived no longer, than to give his last groan in the Kings presence. Then was Philotas called, and charged with the suspition, which his silence might justly breed. His answer was, That when the practice was revealed unto him by Nicomachus, he judging it to bee but frivolous, did forbear to acquaint Alexander therewithall, untill hee might have better information. This error of his, (if it were onely an error) although Alexander, for the notorious services of his Father Parmenio, of his brother Nicanor lately dead, and of Philotas himself, had freely pardoned and given him his hand for assurance; yet by the instigation of Craterus, he again swallowed his Princely promise, and made his enemies his Judges. Craterus gives a note of Craterus in this businesse; How he perswaded himself, that hee could never find a better occasion to oppress his private enemy, than by pretending piety, and dutie towards the King. Hereof a Poet of our own hath given us a note as much better, as it is more generall in his Philotas.

*See how these great men cloathe their private hate,
In these fair colours of the publike good,
And, to effect their ends, pretend the State,
As if the State by their affection stood:
And, arm'd with power and Princes jealousies,
Will put the least conceits of discontent
Into the greatest rank of treacheries,
That no one action shall seem innocent:
Trea, valour, honour, bounty, shall be made
As accessaries unto ends unjust:
And even the service of the State must lade
The needfullst undertaking with distrust;
Saith base civillenesse, idle Luxurie, Seem safer farre, than to doe worthily, &c.*

Now although it were so, that the King, following the advice of Craterus, had resolved the next day to put Philotas to torment, yet in the very evening of the same night in which he was apprehended, hee called him to a banquet, and discoursed as familiarly with him as at any other time. But when in the dead of the night Philotas was taken in his lodging, and that they which hated him began to bind him, he cried out upon the King in these words, O Alexander, the malice of mine Enemies hath surmounted thy mercy, and their hatred is farre more constant than the word of a King. Many circumstances were urged against him by Alexander himself (for the Kings of Macedon did in person examine the accusations of treason) & this was not the least (not the least offence, indeed, against the Kings humour, who desired to be glorified as a God) That when Alexander wrote unto him concerning the title given him by Jupiter Hammon; He answered, That he could not but rejoyce that he was admitted into that sacred Fellowship of the gods, and yet he could not but withall grieve for those that should live under such a onus, so would exceed the nature of man. This was, (saith Alexander) a firm perswasion unto me, that his heart was changed, and that he held my glory in despite. See what a strange Monster Flatterie is, that can perswade Kings to kill those that doe not praise and allow those things in them, which are of all other most to be abhorred. Philotas was brought before the multitude, to hear the Kings Oration against him: hee was brought forth in vile garments, and bound like a Theefe; where he heard himself, and his absent Father, the greatest Captain of the World, accused; his two other Brothers, Haëtor and Antipater having been lost in the present Warre. Hee was so greatly oppress with grief, as for a while he could utter nothing but tears; and sorrow had so wasted his spirits, as he sunk under those that led him. In the end, the King asked him, In what language he would make his defence; he answered, In the same wherein he had pleased the King to accuse him; which he did, to the end that the Persians, as well as the Macedonians, might understand him. But hereof the King made his advantage, perswading the assembly, that hee defined the language of his own Country, and so with drawing himself, left him to his mercilesse enemies.

This proceeding of the Kings, Philotas greatly lamented, being the King, who had so sharply inveighed against him, would not vouchsafe to hear his excuse. But not his endlesse were emboldened thereby against him, but all the rest, having discovered the Kings disposition and resolution, contended among themselves, which of them should exceed in hatred towards him. Among many other arguments, which hee used in his own defence, this was not the weakest, That when Nicomachus desired to know of Dimnus, what men of mark and power were his partners in the conspiracie (as coming unwilling to adventure himself with mean and base Compositions) Dimnus named unto him Demetrius of the Kings Chamber, Nicanor, Antipater, and some others; but spake not a word of Philotas, who by being Commander of the Horse, would greatly have valued the party, and have encouraged Nicomachus. Indeed, as Philotas said well for himself, it is likely that Dimnus, thereby the better to have heartned Nicomachus, would have named him, though he had never dealt with him in any such practice. And for more certain proof, that he knew nothing of their intents that practised against the King, there was not any one of the Conspirators, being many, informed by torments, or otherwise, that could accuse him; and it is true, that adversity being seldom able to drag her own burden, is for the most part found so malicious, as she rather desires to draw others (not always deserving it) into the same danger, than to spare any that is can accuse. Yet at this last, however it were, to avoid the extremity of resistlesse and unnaturall torments, devised by his profest enemies, Craterus, Census, Ephesion, and others, Philotas accused his confederates, being perswaded that they would have slain him forthwith. But hee failed even in that miserable hope, and suffering all that could be laid on flesh and blood, he was forced to deliver, not what he knew, but whatsoever best pleased their ears, that were farre more mercilesse than death it self.

Of this kind of judicall proceeding St. Augustine greatly complaineth, as a matter to be bewailed, saith he, with Fountains of tears. Quid cum in sua causa quisque torquetur, & conqueritur utrum sit nocens, cruciatur; & innocens luit pro incerto scelere certissimam penam: non quia illud commississe dicitur, sed quia non commississe nescitur? What shall we say to it, when one is put to torture in his own cause, and tormented whilst yet it is in question whether he be guilty; and being innocent, suffers assured punishment for a fault, of which there is no certaintie: not because he is known to have committed the offence, but because others doe not know that he hath not committed it?

It had been enough for Alexanders safety; if Philotas had been put to death without torment; the rest would not much have grieved thereat, because he was greatly suspected. But Hemolans, who afterward conspired against him, made the Kings cruelty and delight in blood, the greatest motive of his own ill intent. Therefore, Seneca, speaking of Alexander, saith thus, Crudelitas minime humanum malum est, indignum tam missi animo; ferissimæ rabies est sanguine gaudere & vulneribus, & abjecto homine, in subiecto animal sensu delem. Cruelty is not a humane vice, it is unworthy of so milde a spirit: It is even a beastly rage to delight in blood and wounds, and casting away the nature of man, to become a savage Monster.

For the conclusion of this Tragedie, Curtius makes a doubt, whether the confession that Philotas made were to give end to the torments which he could not any longer endure, or that the same was true indeed; For (saith he) in this case, they that speak truly, or they that deny falsely, come to one and the same end. Now, while the Kings hands were yet wet in blood, he commanded that Lyncestes, son-in-Law to Antipater, who had been three years in prison, should be slain: The same dispatch had all those that Nicomachus had accused: others there were that were suspected because they had followed Philotas; but when they had answered for themselves that they knew no way so direct to win the Kings favour, as by loving those whom the King favoured, they were dismissed. But Parmenio was yet living; Parmenio, who had served with great fidelity as well Philip of Macedon the Kings Father, as himself, Parmenio, that first opened the way into Asia; that had dearest Attalus the Kings enemy; that had always, and in all hazards, the leading of the Kings Vant-guard; that was no lesse prudent in counsell, then fortunate in all attempts; A man beloved of the men of War, and, to say the truth, he that had made the purchase for the King of the Empire of the East, and of all the glory and fame he had: That he might not therefore revenge the death of his Son, though not upon the King, (for it was unlikely that he would have dishonoured his fidelity in his eldste age, having now lived threescore and ten years) yet upon those that by the witchcraft of flattery had possest themselves of his affection, it was resolved that he should be dispatched. Polydamas was employed in this business, a man whom of all others Parmenio trusted most, and loved best, who (to be short) finding him in Media; and having Cleander and other murderers with him, slew him walking in his Garden, while he was reading the Kings letters. Hic exitus Parmenionis fuit, militia domique clari viri, Multa sine Rege prospera, Rex sine illo nihil magna rei gesserat; This was the end of Parmenio (saith Curtius) who had performed many notable things without the King, but the King, without him, did never effect any thing worthy of praise.

Lib. 7.

How Alexander subdued the Bactrians, Sogdians, and other people. How Bessus was delivered into his hands. How he fought with the Scythians.

When these things had end, Alexander went on with his Army, and brought under his obedience the Araspans or Evergitans; he made Amendes (sometime Darius his Secretary) their Governour, then he subdued the Arachosians, and left Menon to command over them. Here the Army, sometimes led by Parmenio, finds him, consisting of twelve thousand Macedons and Greeks, with whom he past through some cold Regions with difficulty enough. At length he came to the foot of the Mountain Taurus towards the East, where he built a City, which he honoured with his own name, and peopled it with seven thousand of his old Macedons, worn with age and with travells of the war. The Arians, who since he left them were revolted, he subdued again by the industrie and valour of Caranus and Erigius. And now he resolves to find out the new King Bessus in Bactria. Bessus, hearing of his coming, prepares to passe over the great River of Oxus which divides Bactria from Sogdiana; Ariabazus is made Governour of Bactria abandoned by Bessus; The Macedonian Army suffereth for want of Water, inasmuch as when they came to the River of Oxus, there died more of them by drinking inordinately, than Alexander had lost in any one battell against the Persians. And it may well be, for (as Clytus did after object unto him) he fought against women, not against men, and not against their persons, but their shadows. He found on the banks of this great River no manner of Timber or other materials, to make either boats, bridges, or rafts, but was forc'd to sew together the hides that covered his carriages, and stuffe them with straw, and on them in six dayes to passe over his Army, which Bessus might easily have distrest, if he had dared but to behold the Macedonian Army afar off. He had formerly complained against Darius for neglecting to defend the banks of Tigris, and other passages, and yet now, when this traitorous slave had styled himself a King, he durst not perform any thing worthy of a slave. And therefore those that were nearest unto him, and whom he most trusted, to wit, Spitamenes, Dataphernes, Catanes, and others the Commanders of his Army, moved both by the care of their own safety, and by the memory of Bessus his Treason and cruelty against Darius, bound him in the like manner that he had done his Master, but with this difference, that he had the chain closed about his neck like a mastiffe Dog, and so was dragged along to be presented to his enemy.

In the mean while Alexander was arrived at a certain Town inhabited with Greeks of Miletum, brought thither by Xerxes, when long before hee returned out of Greece, whose issues had well neer forgotten their Country-language. These most cruelly (after they had received him with great joy) he put to the sword, and destroyed their City. At this place he reciev'd Bessus, and having rewarded Spitamenes with the rest that delivered him, he gave the Traitor into the hands of Oxatres, Darius his brother, to be tormented.

But

But while he now thought himself secure, some twenty thousand Mountaineers assailed his Camp; in repelling whom he received a shot in the leg, the arrow head sticking in the flesh, so as he was carried in a Horse-litter, sometime by the horsemen, sometime by the foot.

Soon after he came unto Maracanda, which Petrus Perindinus takes to be Samarkand, the regall City of the great Tamerlane. It had in compasse threescore and ten furlongs (Curtius saith.) Here he received the Embassadors of the Scythians (called A-dians) who offered to serve him.

The Bactrians are shortly again with the Sogdians stirred to rebellion, by the same Sythians and Catanes, who had lately delivered into his hands the traitor Bessus. Many Cities were resolutely defended against him, all which, after victory, hee defeated and razed, killing all therein. At one of these he received a blow on the neck, which struck him to the ground, and much disabled him for many dayes after. In the mean while Bessus had recovered Maracanda, against whom he employed Menandrus with three thousand foot, and eight hundred horse.

In the heat of these tumults Alexander marched on (if we may beleve Curtius and others) till he came to the River of Tarsus upon whose bank he built another Alexandria, threescore furlongs in compasse, which he beautified with houses within seventeen dayes after it was built. The building of this City is said to have bin occasion of a war between him and the Scythians; the Scythian King perswading himself, that this new Town was fortified of purpose to keep him under. I doe not well understand, why the Scythians, offering war in such terrible manner, that Alexander was judged by his own Soldiers to counterfeite sickness for very fear, should nevertheless make sure for peace, neither find I the reason why Alexander (not intending the conquest of those Northern parts, but only the defence of his own bank) should refuse to let them come, with whom he could not meddle further than they should agree to suffer him. For hereof is made a greater matter, and a victory described, in pursuit of which the Macedonians beyond the bounds and monuments of Bactria his expedition.

The truth is, that Curtius and others have greatly mistaken this River, which they call Tarsus. For it was the River of Jaxartes, that runs between Sogdiana and Scythia, which Alexander past over, while Menandrus was employed in the recovery of Samarkand. But Tarsus, which divides the River Oxus, is neer two thousand miles distant from any part of Bactria and Sogdiana, and the way desert and unknown. So that Alexander had besides Jaxartes, the great River of Volga, and many others to swim over, he could not recover Tarsus, which (from the place where he was) he could hardly have discovered with the Army that followed him, if he had employed all the time that he spent in Asia in that doyle.

Therefore it is enough to beleve, that the Asiaticke Scythians, making some offer towards the creation of his new City, which was like to give some hinderance to their excursions, were driven away by the Macedonians; and being made of defensive ramparts, were charged some ten or twelve miles, which is the substance of Curtius his report. As for the fables of Alexander his journey, like enough it is that Bessus (if in his lifetime he were as sober a man, as after his death he was held a drunken god) went to very far in that waste Country, where he could find nothing but trees and stones, no other business than to set up a Monument.

Three score of the Oxatres and his had to have bin slain, and one thousand one hundred men in this night, which might easily be in passing a great River, defended against them by good Archers. Of Scythian horses one thousand eight hundred were brought into the Camp, and many prisoners. It is forbidden by some Historians, and indeed it is hardly possible to set down the numbers of such as perish in battell: yet Caesar commonly did it. And where the diligence of the victors hath been so inquisitive into the greatness of their own success, the writers have been able to deliver such particulars by credible report, I hold it not unlawfull to set down what we find, especially when it serves to give light to the business in hand. The small number which the Macedonians lost, the omission of the number which they slew (saying not what in Curtius, who is so sparing in his praise, that may put out the greatness of Alexander) and the little booke that was given, doe make it probable, that this war was no better than the rebellion of the Scythians (the line being yearly performed by the Macedons, without any any boast) and therefore better omitted by some Historians, than so highly extolled as a great exploit, by others.

While Alexander was assuring himself of those Scythians bordering upon Jaxartes, he received the ill news that Menedemus was slain by Spitamenes, the Army (by him) broken, and the greatest numbers slain, to wit, two thousand foot; and three hundred horse. He therefore, to appease the rebellion, and to take revenge of Spitamenes, makes all the haste he can; but Spitamenes flies into Bactria, Alexander kills, burns, and lays waste all before him, not sparing the innocent children, and so departs, leaving a new Governour in that Province.

To repair this losse he received a great supply of nineteen thousand Souldiers out of Greece, Lycia, and Syria, with all which, and the old Army, he returns towards the South, and passeth the River of Oxus; on the South-side whereof hee built six Towns near, and passeth the River of Oxus; on the South-side whereof hee built six Towns near, each other for mutuall succour. But he findes a new start-up-Rebell, called Arimazes (a Sogdian) followed with thirty thousand Souldiers, that defended against him a strong piece of ground on the top of a high Hill; whom when Alexander had sought in vain to win by fair words, he made choice of three hundred young men, and promised ten talents to the first, nine to the second, and so in proportion to the rest, that could find a way to creep up to the top thereof. This they performed with the losse of some two and thirty of their men, and then made a sign to Alexander, that they had performed his commandement. Hereupon he sent one Cophes to perswade Arimazes to yeeld the place, who, being shewed by Cophes that the Army of Macedon was already mounted up, yeelded simply to Alexander's mercy, and was (with all his kinred) scourged and crucified to death; which punishment they well deserved for neglecting to keep good watch in so dangerous a place. For the place, as seems by the description, might easily have been defended against all the Armies of the World. But, what strength cannot doe, Mans wit, being the most forcible engine, hath often effected: Of which I will give you an example in a place of our own.

The Island of Sarkis, joyning to Garnsey, and of that government, was in Queen Maria time surprised by the French, and could never have been recovered again by any hand, having carrell and corn enough upon the place to feed so many men as will serve to defend it, and being every way so inaccessible, that it might be held against the Greeks. Yet by the industry of a Gentleman of the Netherlands, it was in this fort regaine. He anchored in the road with one Ship of small burden, and pretending the death of his Merchant, besought the French, being some thirty in number, that they would bury their Merchant in hallowed Ground, and in the Chappell of that Isle; offering present to the French of such Commodities as they had aboard; whereto (with consideration that they should not come ashore with any weapon, no nor so much as with a Knife) the French men yeelded. Then did the Flemings put a Coffin into their Boat, filled with a dead carcase, but with Swords, Targets, and Harquebusses. The French received them at their landings, and searching every of them so narrowly as they could, hid a Pen-knife, gave them leave to draw their Coffin up the Rocks with great difficulty; some part of the French took the Flemish Boat, & rowed aboard their Ship to fetch the commodities promised; and what els they pleased; but being entered, they were taken and bound. As the Flemings on the Land, when they had carried their Coffin into the Chappell, shut the door to them, and taking their weapons out of the Coffin, set upon the French; they run to the Cliff, and cry to their Company aboard the Flemings to come to their succour, but finding the Boat charged with Flemings, yeelded themselves and the place. Thus a Fox-tail doth sometimes help well to piece out the Lions skin, that els would be too short.

After these Sogdian and Scythian Wars, we read of Alexander's killing of a Le on, and other Fingulous matters, and that he committed the Government of Macedonia, and the Country about it, to Clytus, and how he slew him soon after, for valuing the virtue of Philip the father before that of Alexander the son, or rather because he objected to the King the death of Permenio, & denied the Oracle of Delphos for for therein he taught him to the quick, the same being delivered in publike, and at a drunken Banquet. Clytus, indeed, had deserved as much at the Kings hands, as any man living had done, and had in particular saved his life, which the King well remembered when he came to himself, and when it was too late. Yet to say the truth, Clytus his infolency was intolerable. As he in his Cups forgot whom he offended, so the King in his (for neither of them were themselves) forgot whom he went about to slay, for the grief whereof he tare his own face, and sorrowed so inordinately, as, but for the perswasions of Calisthenes, it is thought he would have slain himself.

Wine begat Furie, Furie matter of Repentance: but preceding mischiefs are not amended by succeeding bewailing: Omne vitium ebrietas & incendit, & detegit; abstinentia malis covariatur, verecundiam remouet, ubi possedit animum nimia vis vini, quicquid mali latebat, emergit: non facit ebrietas vitia, sed protrahit. Drunkenness both kindles & lays open every vice; it removes out of the way that shame which gives impediment unto bad attempts; where wine gets the mastery, all the ill that before lay hidden breaks out: drunkenness, indeed, rather discovers vices, than makes them.

Soon after this, Spitamenes, who slew Bessus and had lately revolted from Alexander, was murdered by his Wife, and his head presented to Alexander. Spitamenes being taken away, the Babians also seized upon his fellow-conspirator Dataphernes, and delivered him up. So Alexander being now freed from all these pettie Rebels, disposed of the Provinces which he past over, and went on with his Army into Gabaza; where it suffered some Hunger, Cold, Lightning, Thunder, and Storm, as he lost in one Tempest a thousand of his Train. From hence he invaded the Sacaris, and destroyed their Country. Then came he into the Territory of Cohortanes, who submitted himself unto him; fearing him greatly, and presented him with thirty beautiful Virgins, among whom Roxana, afterwards his Wife, was one: which although all the Macedonians disdained, yet none durst use any freedom of speech after Clytus his death. From hence he directed his course towards India, having so increased his numbers, as they amounted to an hundred and twenty thousand armed men, and great store of baggage.

In the mean while he would needs be honoured as a god: whereto that he might allure the Macedonians, he employed two pernicious Parafites, Hegis and Glaucias, whom Calisthenes opposed. For, among many other honest arguments used to the assembly, he told Glaucias, That he thought, that Alexander would disdain the gift of God-head from his Vassals; That the opinion of Sanctity, though it did sometime follow the death of those, who in their life-time had done the greatest things, yet it never accompanied any that is yet living in the world. He further told him, That neither Hercules nor Bacchus were Deified at a Banquet, and upon drink (for this matter was propounded by Glaucias for a scoffing feast); but that for the more than manly acts by them performed while they lived, they were in future and succeeding Ages numbred among the gods. Alexander stood behind a partition, and heard all that was spoken, waiting but an opportunity to be revenged on Calisthenes, who being a man of free speech, honest, learned, and a lover of the Kings honour, was yet soon after tormented to death; not for that he had betrayed the King to others, but because he never would condescend to betray the King to himself, as all his detestable flatterers did. For in a conspiracy against the King made by one Hermolpus and others (which they confess) he caused Calisthenes without confession, accusation, or trial, to be torn asunder upon the rack: This deed unworthy of a King, Seneca thus censureth. Hec est Alexandri crimen aeternum, quod nulla virtus, nulla bellorum felicitas redimet; Nam quoties quis dixerit, Occidit Persarum multa milia; occidit & Calisthenem; Quoties dictum erit, Occidit Darium; opponitur & Calisthenem. Quoties dictum erit, Omnia Oceano tenus viciit, ipsum quoque tentavit novis classibus; & imperium ex angulo Thraciae usque ad orientis terminos prae tulit; dicitur, sed Calisthenem occidit. Omnia licet antiqua Ducum Regumque exempla transierit, ac This que felicitas nihil magnum erit, quam scelus Calisthenis; This is the eternall crime of Alexander, which neither the felicity of his in War shall ever be able to redeem: For as often as any man shall say he slew many thousand Persians; it shall be replied, he did so, & he slew Calisthenes: When it shall be said, he slew Darius, it shall be replied, and Calisthenes. When it shall be said, he made all as far as the very Ocean, thereon also he adventured with his small forces, & extended his Empire from a corner of Thrace, to the utmost bounds of the Orient; it shall be said, but he killed Calisthenes. Let him have out-gone all the ancient examples examples of Captains and Kings; none of all his acts make so much to his glory, as his fidelity to his reproach.

§. XX.

Of Alexanders journey into India. The battell between him and Porus.

Vith the Army before remembered, of one hundred and twenty thousand foot and horse, Alexander did enter the borders of India, where such of the Princes, as submitted themselves unto him, he entertained lovingly, the rest he constrained, killing Man, Woman, and Child, where they resisted. He then came before Nisa built by Bacchus, which after a few daies was rendred unto him. From thence he removed to a Hill at hand, which on the top had goodly Gardens, filled with delicate fruit and Vines, dedicated to Bacchus, to whom he made feasts for ten dayes together. Now when he had drunk his fill, hee went on towards Dadula, and from thence to Acades, Countries spoiled and abandoned by the Inhabitants; by reason whereof, victuals failing, he divides his Army: Ptolemy led one part, Ceren another, and himself the rest.
They take many Towns, whereof that of greatest fame was Maza, which had in it three hundred thousand men; but after some resistance, it was yielded unto him by Cleopatra the Queen, to whom again he restored it, at the siege of this City he received wound in the legge. After this, Nora was taken by Polysperchon, and a Rock of great strength by himself: he wanted also a passage upon one Eryx, who was slain by his company, and his head presented to Alexander. This is the summe of Alexanders doing in those parts, before such time as he arrived at the River of Indus. Comming to India, he found there Ephesius, who (being sent before) had prepared boats for the transportation of his Army, and ere Alexanders arrivall, had perswaded Omphis King of that part of the Country, to submit himself to this great Conqueror. Therefore, soon upon Alexanders comming, Omphis presented himself with all the strength of his Country, and six and fifty Elephants, unto him, offering him his service and assistance. He made Alexander know, that he was an Enemy to the next two great Kings of that part of India, named Abisares and Porus; wherewith Alexander was not a little pleased, hoping by this dissension to make his own victory by far the more easie. He presented Alexander with a Crown of gold, so did he the rest of his Commanders, and withall four score talents of silver each; which Alexander not only refused, but to shew that he was conscious of glory, not of gold, he gave Omphis a thousand talents of his own treasure, besides other Persian rarities. Abisares, having heard that Alexander had received his cousin Omphis into his protection, resolved to make his own peace also: For, knowing that his own strength did but equal that of Omphis, and that there was no other difference between them; that which the chance of Warre gave, hee thought it an ill match, when Alexander, who had already beaten under foot all the greatest Princes of Asia, should make himself a Party and Head of the quarrell. So had Alexander no need to stand in his way but Porus, to whom he sent a commandement, that hee should attend him at the border of his Kingdoms, there to doe him Homage. But from Porus he received this manly answer: That he would satisfy him in his first demand, which was to attend him on his borders, and that well accompanied; but for any other acknowledgement he was resolved to take counsell of his Sword. To be short, Alexander resolves to passe over the River Hydaspes, and to find Porus at his own home. Porus attends him on the farther bank with thirty thousand foot, four score and ten Elephants, and three hundred armed Chariots, and a great troop of Horse. If Darus had done the like on Tigris, Alexander had surely staied somewhat longer ere he had seen India. The River was four furlongs broad, which makes half a mile, and withall deep and swift, it had in it many Islands, among which there was one well shadowed with wood, and of good capacity. Alexander sent Ptolemy up the River with a great part of the Army, showing the rest from the view of Porus: who by this device being drawn from his first camping, sent himself down opposite to Ptolemy, supposing that the whole Army of Alexander meant to force their passage there. In the mean while Alexander removed the farther shore without resistance. He orders his troops, and advanceth toward Porus, who at first rather believes, that Abisares his Confederat (but now the Confederat of fortune) had bin come over Hydaspes to his aid, than that Alexander had past it.
But

But he finds it otherwise, and sends his Brother Hagis with four thousand horse, and a hundred armed Waggon to entertain him. Each Waggon had in it four to fight, and two to guide it; but they were at this time of little use: for there had fallen so much rain, and thereby the fields were so moistned, as the horses could hardly trot. The Scythians and Dahans had the Vant-guard, who so galled these Indians, as they brake their rains, and other furniture, overturning the Waggon, and those in them. Perdicas also gave up the Indian horse-men, and the one and the other were forc'd to recoile. Porus moves forward with gresse of his Army, that those of his Vant-guard scattered might recover his Rear; Alexander being followed with Ephestion, Ptolemy, and Perdicas took on him to charge the Indian horse-men on the left wing, commanding Cenus or Cenon to invade the right; Antigonus and Leonatus, he directed to break upon Ptolemy his battell of foot, strengthened with Elephants, Porus himself being carried upon one of the greatest stature. By these beasts the Macedonian foot were most offended; but the Archers and Darters, being well guarded with the long and strong pikes of the Macedonians, so galled them, as being enraged, they turned head, and ran over the foot that followed them: In the end, and after a long and doubtfull fight, by the advantage of weapon, and by the courage and skilfulnesse of the Macedonian Captains, the victory fell to Alexander, who also far exceeded Porus in number: for besides the Macedonians and other Eastern and Northern Nations, Porus was assailed by his own Confederate and Countrie people. Yet for his own person he never gave ground otherwise than with his sword towards his enemies, till being weakened with many wounds, and abandoned by his Army, he became a prisoner to the Conqueror, from whom again he received his estate with a great enlargement.

§. XXI.

How Alexander finished his expedition; and returned out of India.

I forbear to trouble my self and others with a frivolous discourse of Serpents, Apes, and Peacocks, which the Macedonians found in these their travels: or of those petty Warres which Alexander made between the overthrow of Porus, and his sailing down the River of Indus: The descriptions of places about the head and branches thereof are better known unto us in this Age, by means of our late Navigations into those parts, than they were in any former times. The magnificence and riches of those Kings we could in no sort be perswaded to believe, till our own experience had taught us, that there were many stranger things in the World, than are to be seen between London and Stages.

Our great traveller Mandeville, who died in the year 1372, and had seen so much of the World, and of the East India, we accounted the greatest fabler of the World; yet had he another reputation among other Nations, as well able to judge as we. Witnesse the Monument made of him in the Covent of the Friars Guillimius in Liege, where the religious of that place keep some things of his, Comme pour honorable memoire de son excellence; Pour un honorable memoire of his Excellencie, saith Guichardine.

The Countries towards the Springs of Indus, and where those many Rivers of Hydaspes, Zaradris, Acesines, and the rest, fall into the main stream, are now possesd by the great Mogor, the ninth from Tamberlain, who commands all the tract between Persia and Indus towards the West, as also a great extent of Countrey towards Ganges. In the mouth of Indus, the Ascension, a Ship of London, suffered shipwrack, in the year 1609, and some of the company travelled over Land till they came to Agra, the same great Cite (as I take it) which our later Cosmographers call Nagra, being named of old Dionysopolis.

Philostratus in the life of Apollonius Tyanus, speaking of the expedition of Bacchus and Hercules into the East India, tells us, that those two great Captains (whom Alexander sought by all means to out-fame) when they endeavoured to subiect to them the Oxidracae, a people inhabiting between the Rivers of Hyphasis and Ganges, they were beaten from the assault of their Cities with thunder and lightnings. This may well be understood by the great Ordnance that those people had then in use. For it is now certainly known, that the great Kings of the uttermost East, have had the use of the canon many hundreds of years since, and even since their first civilitie and greatnesse, which was long before Alexanders

the Low Countries.

Alexander's time. But Alexander pierc'd not so far into the East. It sufficed, that having already over-wearied his Army, he discovered the rest of India by faime. The Indian Kings whom he had subdued, informed him, that a Prince called Aggramenes, who commanded many Nations beyond the River Ganges, was the powerfullst King of all those Regions: and that he was able to bring into the field two hundred thousand Foot, three thousand Elephants, twenty thousand Horse, and two thousand armed Chariots. With this report, though Alexander were more inflamed than ever to proceed in his discovery and conquest, yet all the art he had, could not perswade the Souldiers, to wander over those great Deserts beyond Indus & Ganges, more terrible unto them, than the greatest Army that the East could gather. Yet at the last contented they were, after many perswasive Orations, to follow him towards the South, to discover such part of the Ocean Sea, as was neerer at hand, whereunto the River of Indus was their infallible guide. Alexander seeing that it would be no otherwise, devised a pretty trick, wherewith he hoped to beguile posteritie, and make himself seem greater than he was. He enlarged his Camp, made greater trenches, greater cabbins for Souldiers, greater Horse-stalls, and higher mangers than Horses could feed in. He caused all furniture of men and horses to be made larger than would serve for use, and scattered these Armour and Bridles about his Camp, to be kept as reliques, and wondered at by the Savages. Proportionable to these he raised up twelve great Altars to be the monument of his journey's end. This was a ready way to encrease the fame of his bignesse; to his greatnesse it could add nothing save a supposition, that it was lesse than is thought, seeing he strove so earnestly to make it thought more than it was.

This done, he returned again to the bank of Acefines, and there determined to set up his fleet, where Acefines and Hydaspes encounter; where to testifie by a surer monument, how far he had past towards the East, he built by those rivers two Cities: the one he called Nican, and the other Bucephalon, after the name of his beloved Horse Bucephalus. Here again he received a fourth supply of six thousand Thracian Horse-men, seven thousand Foot; and from his Lieutenant at Babylon five and twenty thousand Armour, garnished with silver and gold, which he distributed among his Souldiers. About these Rivers he wain many Towns, and committed great slaughter on those that resisted; It is then written of him, that assaulting a Citie of the Oxidracans, he leapt from the top of the wall into it, and fought, I know not how long, against all the Inhabitants; tales like those of Bevis of Southampton, frivolous and incredible. Finally, he past down the River with his fleet, at which time also the newes came unto him of a rebellion in Bactria, and then of the arrivall of an hundred Embassadors from a King of India, vvho submitted himself unto him. He feasted these Embassadors upon a hundred beds of gold, with all the sumptuosity that could be devised, who soon after their dispatch, returned again with a present of three hundred Horses, one hundred and thirty Waggons, and to each of them four Horses, a Thousand Targets, with many other things rare and rich.

Their entertainments ended, he sailed towards the South, passed through many obscure Nations, which did all yeeld unto him either quietly, or compelled by force: among these he builded another Alexandria. Of many places which he took in this passage, Sathus was one, the Inhabitants whereof fought against him with poisoned swords, with one of which Protony (afterward King of Egypt) was wounded, and cured by an herb which Alexander dreamt he had seen in the mouth of a Serpent.

When he came neer the out-let of Indus (being ignorant of the tides of the Sea) his Gallies, as they were on a sudden shuffled one upon another by the Floud, so on the Ebbe they were left on the drie ground, and on the sandie banks of the River, wherewith the Macedonians were much amazed; but after he had a few daies observed well the course of the Sea, he past out of the rivers mouth some few miles, and after Sacrifices offered to Neptune, returned: and the better to inform himself, he sent Nearchus and Onesicritus, to discover the coast towards the mouth of Euphrates. Arrianus in the beginning of his six Book hath written this passage down the River of Indus at length, vvith the manner of the Vessels in vvhich he transported his Army, the Commanders that were used therein, and other the marvellous provisions made.

Neer the out-lets of this River, he spent some part of the Winter, and in eighteen daies march from thence recovered Gedrosia, in vvhich passage his Army suffered such miserie for want of food, that of a hundred and twenty thousand foot, and twelve thousand horse, which he carried into India, not the fourth part returned alive.

of Alexander's Riot, Cruelty, and death.

From Gedrosia, Alexander led his Army into Carmania, and so drawing neer to Persia, he gave himself wholly to feasting and drinking, imitating the triumphs of Rachbus. And though this Swinish vice be hatefull enough in it self, yet it always inflamed this King to Cruelty. For (saith Curtius) the Hang-man followed the feast, for Alpates, one of his Provinciaall Governors, he commanded to be slain, so as neither did the excuse of voluptuousnesse qualifie his cruelty, nor his cruelty hinder in ought his voluptuousnesse.

While he refreshed his Army in these parts, a new supply of five thousand foot and a thousand horse, was brought him by Cleander, and his fellows; that had bin employed in the killing of Parmenio. Against these Murderers great complaint was made by the Deputies of the Provinces, in which they had commanded; and their offences were so outrageous, as Alexander was perswaded, that, had they not altogether despaired of his religion, as Alexander was perswaded, that, had they not altogether despaired of his religion, remembering the virtue of him, whom they had slaughtered. The end was, That Cleander, and the other chief, with six hundred Souldiers, by them employed, were delivered over to the Hang-man: every one rejoycing that the Ire of the King was at last executed on the ministers of his Ire.

Nearchus and Onesicritus were now returned from the coast, and made report of an Island rich in gold, and of other strange things; whereupon they were commanded to make some farther discoverie: which done, that they should enter the mouth of Euphrates, and find the King at Babylon.

As he drew neer to Babylon, he visited the Sepulchre of Cyrus in Pasargada, now called Chalquesra, where he was presented with many rich gifts by Orsines, one of the Princes of Persia, of the race of Cyrus. But because Bagoas, an Eunuch in speciall favour with the King, was neglected, he not only practised certain loose fellows to witnesse against Orsines, that he had robbed Cyrus tombe, for which he was condemned to die; but he abused the Hang-man with his own hands in tormenting him: At which time also Alexander caused Phradites to be slain, suspecting his greatnesse. Caperas (saith Curtius) esteeming ad repraesentanda supplicia, item ad deterriore credenda, He began head-longly to be head, and to believe false reports. It is true, that he took a way to make all men weary of his government, seeing cruelty is more fearfully, than all adventures that can be made against it.

As his time it is said, that Calanus the Philosopher burnt himself, when he had lived threecore and thirteene years. Whether herein he followed the custome of his Countre, being an Indian, or fought to prevent the grief and incommoditie of elder age, is uncertain: but in this the Historians agree, that fore-seeing and fore-shewing Alexander's death, he promised to meet him shortly after at Babylon.

From Pasargada he came to Susa, where he married Statira, Darius his eldest Daughter, giving her younger sister to his beloved Ephesion, and fourscore other Persian Ladies to his Captains. There were six thousand guests invited to the feast; to each of which he gave a cup of gold. Here there came unto him three thousand young souldiers, out of his conquered Provinces; whereat the Macedonians greatly murmured. Harpalus, his Treasurer in Babylon, having lavishly consumed the monies in his keeping, got him going with five thousand Talents, and six thousand hired Souldiers; but he was rejoycing in Greece, and there slaine Alexander greatly rejoyced at the fidelity of the Greeks, whom Harpalus with these forces and treasures could not stir: yet he sent commendments, that they should again receive their banished men, whereunto (fearfull of his indignation) all submitted themselves (except the Athenians) though they resolved, that it was a manifest preparation towards their bondage. After this there followed a marvellous discontentment in his Army, because he had resolved to send into Macedonia all those old Souldiers which could no longer endure the travell of Warre, and to keep the Asian Asia. He used many Orations to satisfie them, but it was in vain during the tempest tempest of their fury. But afterward, as Whales are drawn to the Land with a twinethreed, when they have tumbled a while, so are the unconsiderate multitude easily conducted when their first passions are evaporate. With such as were licensed to depart, he sent Craterus, to whom he gave the Lieutenantship of Macedon, Thessaly, and Thraci, which Antipater had held from his first departure out of Europe, who had beaten the rebellious Greeks in his absence, discharged the trust committed unto him with great fidelity, and sent him so many strong supplies into Asia from time to time. Certainly if Alexander had not taken counsell of his cups, he would have cast some better colour on this alteration, and given Antipater a stronger reason for his remove, than to have im-ployed him in the conduction of a new supply to be brought him to Babylon, the Warre being now at an end. For Antipater saw nothing in this remove, but the Kings disposition to send him after Parmenio, and the rest. With this Antipater, the King, notwithstanding his great courage, had no great appetite to grapple: Princes, though jealous, doe not stand in doubt of every man ill affected, though valiant: but there is a kind of kindly courage, compounded of hardinesse and understanding, which is many times so fearful unto them, as they take leave both of Law and Religion, to free themselves thereof.

After he had sent for Antipater, he made a journey into Media to settle things there, where Ephesius, whom he favoured most of all men, dies. The King according to the greatness of his love, laments his losse, hangs his Physician, and bestowes upon his Monument twelve thousand talents: After which he returns to Babylon. Thither Antipater came not, but sent; and not to excuse himself, but to free himself. For if we believe Curtius (whom Plutarch and others gain-say) Antipater by his sons, Cassander, Philip, and Iolla, who waited on Alexanders cup, gave him poyson, Thessalus (who was of the conspiracie) having invited him to a drinking feast of purpose. For after he had taken a carouse in Hercules his cup, a draught of drink stronger than Hercules himself, he quieted the World within a few daies.

Certainly the Princes of the World have seldome found good, by making their Ministers over-great, and thereby suspicious to themselves. For he that doth not acknowledge fidelity to be a debt, but is persuaded, that Kings ought to purchase it from their Vassals, will never please himself with the price given. The only restorative, indeed, that strengthens it, is the goodness and vertue of the Prince, & his liberality makes it more diligent, so as proportion and distance be observed. It may be that Antipater, having commanded two or three Kingdomes ten or twelve years, knew not how to play any other part; no more than Caesar did, after he had so long a time governed the Gauls, where he exteriorly forgot the art of obedience. A most cruell and ungratefull traitor Antipater was, if Curtius do not belie him: For though he feared some ill measure upon his remove (the Tragedies of Parmenio, Clytus, and Callisthenes, having bin so lately acted) yet he knew nothing to the contrary, but that the King had resolved to have given him some other great government in Asia: The old Souldiers thence returned, having perchance desired to be governed by Craterus, whom they had followed in all the former Warre.

S. XXIII.

Of Alexanders person and qualities.

Howsoever it were, Alexanders former cruelties cannot be excused, no more than his vanitie to be esteemed the son of Jupiter, with his excessive delight in drink and drunkenesse, which others make the cause of his fever and death, in that he lamented his want of enterprising, and grieved to consider what he should doe when he had conquered the World. Augustus Caesar found just cause to deride him, as if the well-governing of so many Nations and Kingdoms, as he had already conquered, could not have offered him matter more than abundant, to busie his brains withall.
That he was both learned and a lover of learning, it cannot be doubted. Sir Francis Bacon, in his first book of the Advancement of Learning, hath proved it sufficiently.
His liberality I know not how to praise, because it exceeded proportion. It is said, That when he gave a whole Citie to one of his servants, He, to whom it was given, did out of modesty refuse it, as disproportionable to his fortune: to whom Alexander replied, That he did not enquire what became him to accept, but the King to give: of which Seneca
Animosa

*Animosa vox videtur & regia, cum sit stultissima. Nihil enim per se quoniam decet. Refert quid, cui, quando, quare, ubi &c. sine quibus facti ratio non constabit, habeatur personarum & dignitatum proportio, & cum sit ubiq; virtutis modus, equè peccat quod exce-dit, quam quod deficit; It seems a brave and Royal speech, whereas indeed it is very foolish.
For nothing simply considered by it self be seems a man. We must regard what, to whom, when, why, where, and the like; without which considerations no act can be approved. Let honours be proportioned unto the persons: for whereas vertue is ever limited by measure, the excesse is as faulty as the defect.*

For his Person, it is very apparent, That he was as valiant as any man, a disposition taken by it self, not much to be admired; For I am resolved that he had ten thousand in his Army as daring as himself. Surely, if adventurous natures were to be commended simply, we should confound that vertue with the hardinesse of Theeves, Ruffians, and maddest Dogs. For certainly it is no way praise-worthy but in daring good things, and in the performance of those lawfull enterprises, in which we are employed for the service of our Kings and Common-weales.

If we compare this great Conquerour with other troublers of the world, who have bought their glory with so great destruction and effusion of blood, I think him far inferi-our to Caesar, & many other that lived after him, seeing he never undertook any warlike Nation, the naked Scythians excepted; nor was ever encountered with any Army of which he had not a most mastering advantage, both of Weapons & Commanders, every one of his Fathers old Captains by far exceeding the best of his Enemies. But it seems Fortune and Destinie (if we may use those termes) had found out and prepared for him, without any care of his own, both heaps of Men, that willingly offered their necks to the yoke, and Kingdomes that invited and called in their own Conquerours. For conclusion, we will agree with Seneca, who speaking of Philip the Father, and Alexander the Son, gives this judgement of them: Quod non minores fuere pestes mortalium, quam inun- ditio, qua pluvium omne perfusum est, quam conflagratio, qua magna pars animantium exa-ruit. They were, no lesse plagues to mankind, than an overflow of waters, drowning all the le-vell, or some burning drought, whereby a great part of living creatures are scorched up.

The reign of Aridæus.

S. I.

Of the question about succession to Alexander.

HE death of Alexander left his Army (as Demades the Athenian then compared it) in such case, as was that monstrous Giant Polyphemus, having lost his only eye. For that which is reported in fables of that great Cyclops, might well be verified of the Macedonians: their force was intolerable, but for want of good guidance uneffectual, and harm-full chiefly to themselves. The causes whereof (under the divine ordinance) were partly the uncertainty of Title to succession in the Kingdom of Mace- don, partly the stubborn pride of Alexander himself, who thinking none worthy to be his heir, did refuse to establish the right in any one, leaving every one to his own fortune; but especially the great ambition of his followers, who all had learned of their Master to suffer no equals; a lesson soon taught unto spirits reflecting upon their own worth, when the reverence of a greater object faileth.

It hath formerly been shewed, That Philip (the Father of Alexander) governing in Macedon as Protector, assumed unto himself the Kingdom, not rendring it unto Amyntas, (the Son of his elder brother Perdiccas) when he grew to mans estate; but only bestowing upon him in marriage a Daughter of his own: by which bond, and much more by his own proper strength, hee assured the Crown unto himself:
Amyntas never attempting ought against Philip, though (with price of his life) he did against

against Alexander in the beginning of his reign. Wherefore Eurydice, the sole issue of this marriage, ought in reason to have been acknowledged Queen after Alexander; as having better Title thereto, than either He or Philip had, when they lived; unless (per adventure) some Law of that Nation forbad the reign of Women. But the excellent vertue of these two Princes had utterly defaced the right of all Pretenders, not claiming from their own bodies: and so great were their conquests, that Macedon it self was (in regard of them) a very small Appendix, and no way deserving to be laid in ballance against the demand of their posterity, had they left any able to make challenge of the Royall seat.

Alexander having taken many wives, had issue by none of the principall of them. Bar-Jine the Daughter of Artabazus a Persian, had born unto him a young Son: and Roxane the Daughter of Oxyartes (whom he had more solemnly married) was left by him great with child. But the baseness of the Mothers, and contempt of the conquered Nations, was generally alleged in Barre of Plea made for them, by some that would (perhaps) have wrought out their own ends, under the name of Alexanders children.

Cleopatra a sister of Alexander, widow to the King of Epirus, and Arideus his base brother (son to Philip by a Concubine of no account) who had married the Lady Eurydice before mentioned, were next in course. Of Cleopatra there was no speech, which may give suspicion, that either Law or Custome had made that sex incapable of the Sovereignty: Arideus (besides his bastardy) was neither for person nor quality fit to rule as King; yet upon him the election fell, but slowly, and (as happeneth often) for lack of a better: when the Counsellors having over-laboured their disagreeing was in devising what was best, were content for very weariness to take what comes next to hand.

Ptolomy (soon after King of Egypt) concurring with them who rejected all mention of the half-Persian brood, King Alexanders children, was of opinion, that the rule of all should be given to the Captains; that going for law which by the greater part of them should be decreed: so farre was he from acknowledging any one as true Heir to the Crown.

This Ptolomy was called the sonne of Lagus, but reputed of Philip: who having used the company of Arfinoe Ptolomie's mother, delivered her in marriage to Lagus, being great with child. Therefore, whether it were so that he hoped well to work his own fortune out of those dissensions, which are incident unto the consultations of many ambitious men, equall in place, forcing them at length to redeem their quiet with subjection to one, deserving regard by his blood, and trust for his, even carriage; or whether he desired only to get a share to himself, which could not have come to passe, had all been given to one: plain enough it is, that he thought not on preferring Arideus before himself; and therefore gave such counsell as fitted his own and other mens purposes. Yea, this device of his took place indeed, though not in form as he had propounded it; For, it was in effect all one, to have assembled at Alexanders empty chair, as Ptolomy had conceived the form of their consultations, or to set in the chair such a King as Arideus, no wiser than the chair it self. Also the controversies arising were determined by the greater part of the Captains; by the greater part, if not in number, yet in puissance.

But as these counterfeit shewes of dissembling aspirers doe often take check by the plain-dealing of them who dare to go more directly to work: so was it like to have fared with Ptolomy and the rest, when Aristonous another of the Captains, interpreted the very words of Alexander, saying, That he left his Kingdom to the worthiest, as designing Perdiccus, to whom (lying at the point of death) he delivered his ring. It seemed good in reason, that Alexander should be disposer of his own purchases: and those tokens of Alexanders purpose appeared plain enough, so long as no man would interpose anothers construction: every one being uncertain how the secret affections of the rest might be inclined. Many therefore, either out of their love, or because they would not be of the latest, urged Perdiccus to take upon him the estate Royall. He was no stranger to the Royall blood; yet his birth gave him not such reputation, as the great favour of his dead King, with whom he had bin very inward, & that especially since the death of Ephestion (a powerful Minion) into whose place he was chosen. For his own worth he might wel be commended, as a good man of War, and one that had given much proof of his private valour. But very surly he was: which quality (joyned with good fortune) carried a shew of

Majesty:

Majesty: being checkt with misadventure, it was called by a true name, Pride; and rewarded with death.

In the present businesse a foolish over-weening did him as great harm, as it had been great happiness to have succeeded Alexander. For, not content to have the acclamation of the Souldiers, approving the sentence of Aristonous, he would needs counterfeit modesty; thinking that every one of the Princes would have intreated him to take the weighty burden of an Empire, which would be the lesse envious, the more solemnity he used in the acceptance. It is truly said, He that feigneth himself a Sheep, may chance to be eaten by a Wolf. Melenger, (a man by nature envious, and bearing a particular hatred to Perdiccus) took advantage of his irresolute behaviour, and very bitterly envied against him. In conclusion, he pronounced, That whosoever was Heir to the Crown, the Souldiers ought to be Heirs to the Treasure; and therefore he invited them, who were nothing slow, to share it. This disturbed all the Consultation. The Captains were left alone, farre enough from agreeing, and not able to have brought any conclusion to good effect without consent of the Souldiers, who greedy of spoyl, thronged about Melenger.

S. II.

The Election of Arideus, with the troubles there-about arising; the first division of the Empire.

During this up-roar, mention was made of Arideus by some one, and entertained with good liking of many, untill at last it grew to the voyce of the Army. Melenger having with-drawn himself tumultuously from the company of the Lords, was glad of so faire an occasion to make himself great: therefore he produced Arideus, commended him to the Souldiers, who called him by his Fathers name Philip, and brought him into the Palace, investing him in Alexander's robes, and proclaiming him King. Many of the Nobles withstood this election, but in vain: for they could not refuse what course to follow, rejecting this. Only Pythen, a hoar-headed man, took upon him to proclaim the Son of Alexander by Roxane, according to the counsell which Perdiccus at first had given, appointing Perdiccus and Antonus his Protectors. But this was not yett born, which made that attempt of Pythen vain. Finally, Perdiccus with six hundred men, and Ptolomy with the Kings Pages, took upon them to descend the place where Alexander's body lay: but the Army conducted by Melenger, who caused the new King about whether he liked easily take in upon them, and intreated them to accept Arideus for their Sovereign Lord. Then by the intercession of the ancient Captains, a reconciliation was propounded and admitted, but on neither side faithfully consent.

Antonus, who was of Royall blood, a goodly Gentleman and valiant, issued out of Antonia, being followed by all the horse, which consisted (for the most part) of the Nobles: Perdiccus abode in the City (but standing upon his guard) that he might be ready to take the opportunity of any commotion that should happen among the infantry. The King (who was governed by Melenger) commanded, or gave leave to have Perdiccus made away: which attempt succeeded ill, being neither secretly carried, nor committed to sure executioners. Their coming was not unexpected: and they were by Antonus rebuked with such gravity, that they departed henceforth when they came, being sorry for their had enterprise. Upon the news of this attempt, the Camp was in some roar, which the King seeking to pacifie, wanted authority, as having newly got the crown by them, and holding it by their courtesy. The matter it self afforded no good excuses, and his indignation made them worse. He said that no harm was done; Perdiccus was alive: but their exclamations were against the tyrannous enterprise, which by Melenger, shunning the surety of his friends to the rage of the multitude, who were not appeased, untill the King by offering to resign his estate unto them, renewed out of their pity that favourable affection, which had moved them to set him up at the first.

Perdiccus having now joyned himself with Leonatus, kept the fields, intending to cut off all provision of victuals from the Citie. But after sundry Embassies passing between the King and the Nobles, (they requiring to have the Authors of sedition given up into their hands; the King, that Meleager might be joyned with Leonatus and Perdiccas, as a Third in government of the Army) things were compounded according to the Kings desire. Meleager should have done well to consider, That such men as had one day demanded his head, were not like the day following to give him a principall place among them without any new occasion offered, had not some purpose of treachery lurked under their great facility. Generall peace was renewed, and much love protested where little was intended. The face of the Court was the same which it had been in Alexanders time: but no longer now did the same heart give it life; and windy Spirits they were which moved in the arteries. False reports were given out by appointment of Perdiccas, tending to his own disgrace, but in such termes as might seem to have proceeded from Meleager: who finding part of the drift, but not all, took it as an injury done to himself; and (as desirous of a true friendship) desired of Perdiccas, that such authors of discord might be punished. Perdiccas (as a lover of peace) did well approve the motion; and therefore agreed that a generall Muster should be made, at which time the disturbers of the common quiet should receive their punishment (as was the manner for Souldiers offending) in presence of the Army. The plot was mischievously layd. Had Meleager given way to seditious rumours, he must needs have incurred the general hatred of all, as a sower of dissention, & thereby with a publike approbation might have bin cut off, as having often offended in that kind: his Prince being too weak a Patron. Now seeking redresse of these disorders, he hastened his own ruine, by a lesse formall, but more speedy way. This kind of Muster was very solemn, and practised with many ceremonies, as for cleansing of the Army. The Horse-men, the Elephants, the Macedonian toot, the Mercenaries were each according to their quality set in array, apart from others, as if they had bin of sundry sorts, met at adventure: which done, the manner was to skirmish (as by way of exercise) according to the direction of their severall Captains. But at that time the great battell of Macedonian Pikes, which they called the Phalanx, led by Meleager, was of purpose bestowed in a ground of disadvantage; and the countenance of the Horse and Elephants beginning to give charge upon them, was such, as discovered no jesting pastime nor good intent. Kings were alwayes wont to fight among the horse-men: of which custom Perdiccas made great use that day, to the utter confusion of his enemies. For Aridaus was alwayes governed by him, which for the present had him in possession. Two or three dayes before, he sought the death of Perdiccas at the instigation of Meleager: now he rides with Perdiccas up and down about the foot-men, commanding them to deliver unto the death all such as Perdiccas required: Three hundred they were who were cast unto the Elephants, and by them slain, in the presence of the King (who should have defended them) and of their affrighted companions. But these three hundred were not the men whose punishment Meleager had expected: they were such as had followed him, when he disturbed the first consultation that was held about the election of a new King; and some of them his especiall friends. Having therefore kept himself quiet a while, as unwilling to give offence to them which had the advantage; when he saw their proceedings tend very manifestly to his destruction, he fled away into a temple, which he found no Sanctuary: for thither they sent and slew him.

The Army being thus corrected, was led into the City, where a new Councell of the Princes was held, who finding what manner of man their King was, divided all the Provinces of the Empire among themselves, leaving to Aridaus the office of a Visitor, and yet making Perdiccas his Protector, and Commander of the forces remaining with him. Then were the funerals of Alexander thought upon; whose body having bin seven dayes neglected, was opened, and embalmed by the Egyptians: no sign of poyson appearing, how great soever the suspicion might be. The charge of his buriall was committed to Aridaus: one of the Captains, who was two years preparing of a great and costly shew, making a stately Chariot in which the corps was laid; many coarces of his friends being layd in the ground before that of Alexander was bestowed in Alexandria, a City of his own building, in Egypt.

The beginning of the Lamian Warre.

W Hilest these things were in doing, or presently after, Antipater and Craterus, two principall Noble-men, and inferiour to none of Alexanders followers, if not greater than any of the rest, were busied in Greece with a war, which the Athenians more bravely than wisely had begun in Alexanders life, but now did prosecute more boldly than before, upon the courage which they had taken by his death. Alexander not long before he died, had commanded that all the banished Greeks (few excepted) should be restored unto their former places. He knew the factious quality of the Grecian Estates, & therefore thought so to provide, that in every City he would have a sure party. But it fell out otherwise: For he lost the hearts of many more than he won by this proud injunction. His pleasure indeed was fulfilled; yet not without great murmuring of the whole Nation, as being against all order of Law, and a beginning of open tyranny. The Athenians greatly decayed in estate, but retaining more than was needfull of their ancient spirits, forbad the execution of this decree in their Dominions; so did also the Ætolians, who were valiant men, and inhabited a Region well fortified by nature: yet neither of them took Armes, but seemed to bear themselves, as men that had done no more than they might well justifie by reason: nevertheless to prevent the worst, the Athenians gave secret instructions to Leosthenes, a Captain of theirs, willing him to levie an Army, but in his own name, and to keep it in a readinesse for their use. This was no hard thing for Leosthenes to doe: great numbers of Greek Souldiers being lately returned from the Asian War in poor estate, as defrauded of their pay by the Captaines. Of these he had gathered up eight thousand, when the certain newes were brought of Alexanders death: at which the City of Athens declared it self, and more honourably than wisely, proclaimed open War against the Macedonians for the liberty of Greece. Hereupon Leosthenes drew in the Ætolians and some other Estates, gave battell to the Beotians, who sided with Antipater, and overthrew them; growing so fast in reputation, and so strong in adherents, that Antipater (arming in all haste, yet suspecting his own strength) was faine to send into Asia to Craterus for succour.

Nothing is more vain than the feares and hopes of men, shunning or pursuing their destinies a farre off, which deceive all mortall wisdom, even when they seem near at hand. One moneth was scarcely past, since nothing so heavily burthened the thoughts of Antipater as the return of Craterus into Macedon; which he then feared as death, but now desired as the most likely assurance of his life. Craterus, whom Alexander held as of all men the most assured unto him, was sent into Macedon to convey home the old Souldiers (that was the pretence) & to succeed Antipater in the government of Macedon and Greece. The suspicions were strong that he had a privie charge to put Antipater to death: neither did that which was commonly published sound much better, which was, That Antipater should be sent unto the King, as Captain of the young Souldiers, newly to be levied in Europe. For Alexander was much incensed against him by his Mother Olympias: and would sometimes give out speeches, testifying his own jealousie and hatred of him; but yet he strove to smother it, which in a cruell Prince betokeneth little good. Few of Alexanders Lieutenants had escaped with life: most of them indeed were mean persons in regard of those who followed him in his Indian expedition, and were therefore (perhaps) removed to make place for their betters. But if the Kings rigour was such, as could find rebellious purposes (for so hee interpreted even lewd government) in base persons; little might Antipater hope for, who having sitten Vice-roy ten years in the strongest part of the Empire, was called away to the presence of so fell a Master, and the envie of a Court, wherein they had been his inferiours, which would now repine to see him their equall. Therefore whether his fear drew him to prevention, working first the Kings death by poyson, given by his son Iolaus, Alexanders Cup-bearer; or whether it brake not forth untill opportunity had changed it into the passion of revenge, which was cruelly performed by his son Cassander: great cause of much fear he had; which I note in this place, as the ground of effects to be produced in very few years.

At the present Craterus was sent for, and all the Captaines of companies lying near, solicited solicited to make haste. Not without cause: For in Macedon there could not at that time be raised more than thirteen thousand foot, and six hundred horse; which Muster was of raw Souldiers, all the force of the Country being emptyed into Asia. The Thessalians indeed who had long stood firm for Philip & Alexander, who also were the best horsemen of Greece, furnished him with very brave troupes, that might have done great service, had their faith held out, which they changed for the liberty of Greece. With these forces did Antipater in Thessaly try the fortune of a battell with Leosthenes; rather (as may seem) fearing the increase of his enemies power, and rebellion of the Greeks, (were they not checkt at the first) than presuming on his strength. For Leosthenes had of Athenians, Etolians, and Mercenaries, two and twenty thousand foot, besides the assistance of many petty Signories, and of some Illyrians and Thracians: of horse he brought into the field about two thousand and five hundred; but over-strong he was that way also, when once the Thessalians had revolted unto him. So Antipater lost the day; and his losse was such, that he neither was able to keep the field, nor to make a safe retrait into his own Country: therefore he fled into the Town of Lamia, which was well fortified, and well provided of all things necessary to bear out a siege. Thither did Leosthenes follow him, present him battell again, and upon refusall close up the Town with earth-works, and a wall. There will we leave him for a while, travelling in the last honourable enterprife that ever was undertaken by that great City of Athens.

How Perdiccas employed his Army.

King Aridaus living under the rule of Perdiccas, when all the Princes were gone each to his own Province, kept a naked Court: all his greatnesse consisting in a bare title, supported by the strength of his Protector, who cared not for him otherwise than to make use of him. Perdiccas had no Province of his own peculiar, neither was he like to be welcome to any whom he should visit in his government. A stronger Army that any of the rest he had, which he might easily hope in that unfetled condition of things to make better worth to him than many Provinces could have bin. The better to accomplish his desires, he closely sought the marriage of Cleopatra, the sister of Alexander; yet about the same time he either married Nicæa the daughter of Antipater, or made such love to her as blinded their eyes, who did not somewhat narrowly search into his doings.

Ariarathes the Cappadocian, the second of that name, and tenth king of that Country, had continued faithfull to the Persian Empire as long as it stood: following the example of his forefathers, even from Pharnaces the first that reigned in Cappadocia, who married Atossa sister to the great Cyrus. Some of his Ancestors had (indeed) been oppressed by the Persian: but what Fortune took from them at one time, Vertue restored at another, and their faithfull Princes had much encreased all. But now in the fatal Period of so great an Empire, with much wisdom, and (Darius being slain) with sufficient honour, he might have acknowledged the Macedonian in the Persians room. This he did not; neither did Alexander call him to account, being occupied with great cares. But Perdiccas, who had no greater business wherein to entertain his Army, found it expedient both for the honour of the Empire, to take that in-land Kingdome, surrounded with Provinces of the Macedonian conquest, and for his own particular, to have one opportune place of sure retrait, under the government of a stedfast friend. Therefore he entred Cappadocia, fought with Ariarathes, who drew into the field thirty thousand foot, and fifteen thousand horse (a strong Army, had it not encountered a stronger, and better trained) won the victory, and thereby the whole Kingdome. But with much cruelty did he use the victory: for having taken Ariarathes prisoner, with many others, he crucified him, and as many of his Kindred as he could light upon; and so delivered that Province to Eumenes, whom of all men living he trusted most.

Another part of his forces he had committed to Python, rather as to the most honourable of such as remained about him, than as to the most assured. Python was to subdue the Greeks rebelling in the high Countries of Asia. About twenty thousand foot, and three thousand horse they were, (all old Souldiers) who, planted in Colonies by Alexander, to bridle the barbarous nations, were soon weary of their unpleasant habitations, & the rude people people, among whom they lived: and therefore took advantage of the present troubles to seek unto themselves a better fortune. Against these Python went, more desirous to make them his own, than to destroy them: which intent of his, Perdiccas discovering, did both give him in charge to put all those Rebels to the sword, giving the spoyles of them to his Souldiers, and further enjoined it unto Pythons Captaines (his own creatures) that they should see this commandement executed. These directions for use of the victory, might have proved needlesse; so uncertain was the victory itself. A Captain of the Rebels commanding over three thousand, corrupted by Python, did in the heat of the fight (which was very doubtfull) retire without necessity to a hill not farre off. This dismayed the rest, and gave the day to Python: who being far enough from Perdiccas, offered composition to the vanquished, granting unto them their lives and liberty, under condition of laying down their armes; and hereupon he gave them his faith. Being master of these Companies, he might well have a good opinion of his own power: all power being then valued by strength in followers, when as none could vaunt himself as free Lord of any Territory. He had thirteen thousand foot, and eight thousand eight hundred horse, besides these new Companions, whom needlesse fear without great losse had caused to leave the field: but in true estimation all the greatnesse whereof Python might think himself assured, was (and soon appeared to be) inherent in Perdiccas. For by his command were ten thousand foot, and eight thousand horse, of those which followed Python, levied; the Rulers of the Provinces carefully obeying the letters of Perdiccas, by which they were enjoined to give assistance to that business: and by vertue of the precept given unto them by Perdiccas, did the Macedonians cut in pieces all those poor men who had yeelded themselves; leaving Python as naked as he came forth to return unto his great Master.

Now was Perdiccas mighty above the mighty, and had fair leasure to pursue his hopes of marriage with Cleopatra, and thereby to make himself Lord of all: but this must be secretly carryed for fear of opposition. How it succeeded, will appear when the Lamian War taketh ending.

S. V.

The proceffe of the Lamian War.

We left Antipater hardly besieged, wanting means to free himself without succours from his friends in Asia. Those helps not appearing so soon as he expected, he came to parley with Leosthenes, and would have yeelded unto any termes of reason, wherewith men possessed with hope of victory, do seldome limit their desires. Leosthenes willed him without further circumstance to submit himself to discretion. This was too much for him that had once commanded over them, who now required of him such a dishonourable composition. Wherefore knowing that the extreme, from which as yet he was farre enough, could bring no worse with it, Antipater prepared for the defence; and the other for winning the Town, which felt great want of victuals.

In this lingering War the Etolians (whether weary of sitting still at a siege, or having business which they pretended at home) took their leave, and returned into their own Country. Their departure left the trenches so thinly manned, that Antipater found meanes to fallly out upon his enemies to their great losse: for many were slain, and Leosthenes himself among them, ere he could be repulsed into the Town. Yet hereby the Macedonians were nothing relieved, their victuals wasted, and they were not strong enough to deal with the Greeks in open fight. Craterus was long in coming. Lyfimachus, who was nearest at hand in Thrace, had work too much of his own, leading no more than four thousand foot, and two thousand horse, against Seuthas the Thracian King, who brought into the field above foure times that number; and though Lyfimachus, not without losse had gotten one victory, yet the enemy abounding in multitude, felt not the blow so much as might abate his courage. Therefore Leonatus was earnestly solicited by Antipaters friends, to make all haste to the rescue. He had the government of Phrygia the lesse, and was able to raise an Army of more than twenty thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse, whether levied out of his province, or appointed unto him out of the main Army, it is uncertain. Certain it is, that he was more willing ling to take in hand the journey into Greece, than Antipater was to have him come. For Cleopatra had written unto him, desiring his presence at Pella, the chief Citie of Macedonia, and very kindly offering her self to be his wife; which letters he kept not so close as had bin requisite, and therefore brought himself into great suspicion, that soon ended with his life, Antipater, chosen Generall by the Athenians in place of Leosthenes, hearing of his approach, forsook the siege of Lamia, and took the ready way to these great Conquerors of Asia, with purpose to give them an evill welcome home, before Antipater and they should joyn in one. He had (notwithstanding the departure of the Etolians) the advantage of Leonatus in horse, by the ods of 2000. Thessalians; in other things he was equall with him; in cause he thought himself Superiour; in the fortune of that day he proved so: for he wan a great victory (chiefly by vertue of the Thessalians) which appeared the greater by the end of Leonatus himself; who fighting valiantly, was driven into a marshy piece of ground, where he found his death, which he desperately had ven into among the Indians, but it waited for him at home, not far from the place of his nativity. He was the first of Alexanders Capitaines which dyed in battell, but all, or most of the rest shall follow him the same way. After this day, the Athenians did never any thing suitable to their ancient glory.

The vanquished Macedonians were too weak to renew the fight, and too proud to flee. They betook themselves to high grounds, unfit for service on horse-back, and so abode in the sight of the enemy that day; the day following Antipater with his men came into their Camp, and took the charge of all. The Athenians perceiving their strength to be at the greatest, and fearing lest that of the enemy should increase, did earnestly seek to determine the matter quickly by another battell. But still Antipater kept himself on ground of advantage, which gave more than reasonable confidence to the Greeks, many of whom departed to their homes, accounting the enemy to be vanquished. This wretchedness (incorrigible in an Army of voluntaries) was very inexcusable; seeing that the victories by Land were very much defaced by losses at Sea, where the Athenians, labouring to have made themselves once again Masters, were put to the worst.

But now the fatal captivity of Greece came on, of which the never could be delivered unto this day. Craterus with a strong Army having made great marches from Cilicia, passed over into Europe, and coming into Thessaly, joyned himself with Antipater. The forces of Leonatus, Antipater, and Craterus being joyned in one, contained forty thousand weightily armed, three thousand light-armed men, and five thousand horse; of which numbers the Greeks wanted a thousand and five hundred in horse, in foot, eighteen thousand. Carefully therefore did Antipater labour to avoyd the necessity of a battell, untill such time as the Towns confederate should return unto the Camp those bands which had straggled from it. But those companies were so slow in coming, and Antipater so urgent upon the Greeks, that compelled they were to put the matter in hazard without further attendance. Like enough it is, that with a little more help they had carried away the victory: for the Thessalians had the upper hand, and held it, untill such time as they perceived their battels (over-laid with multitude) retire unto the higher ground, which caused them also to fall back. So the Macedonians became Lords of the field, having little else to boast of, considering that with the losse of an hundred & thirty men, they had only purchased the death of some five hundred enemies. Yet hereof was great use made: For the Greeks, as not subject unto the full command of one General, and being every one desirous to preserve his own estate and City, concluded to make a treaty of peace with Antipater; who being a subtle Artificer, and well understanding their aptnesse to division, refused to hearken to any generall composition, but willed every City to deal apart for it self. The intent of his device was so apparent, that it was rejected; the Greeks choosing rather to abide the coming of their assistants, whose unreasonable carelesse betrayed the cause. Antipater and Craterus besieging and winning some Towns in Thessaly, which the Army of the Confederates wanted means and courage to relieve, wearied that Nation from attending any longer upon other mens unlikely hopes, with their own assured and present calamity.

Of the peace granted to Athens by Antipater. of Demosthenes his death.

The Thessalians falling off, all the rest soon followed severally, and sued for peace; the gentle conditions given to the most forward, inviting such as were slack. Only the Athenians and Etolians held out. Little favour could they hope for, having been Authors of this tumult; and their fear was not great; the seat of the war being far from them. But the celerity of Antipater confounded all their imaginations; who late still at Athens, devising upon courses of prosecuting the War to come, which came to their dores before their consultation could find issue. He was ready to enter upon their Frontiers; they had no ability to resist, and were as heartlesse as friendlesse. All that remained was to send Embassadors, desiring peace upon some good termes: necessity enforcing them to have accepted even the very worst. Phocion, with Demades the Orator, and Xenocrates the Philosopher, were chief of this Embassage; Phocion, as the most honourable, Demades, a strong perswader (both of them well respected by Antipater); and Xenocrates, as one admired for wisdom, gravity of manners, and vertue; but all these ornaments consisting in speculation, and therefore of lesse regard, when their admiration was to cost them much in real effects.

Antipater calling to mind the pride of Leosthenes, required of the Athenians, that they should wholly submit themselves to his pleasure; which being (perforce) granted; hee commanded them to defray the charges of the War past, to pay a fine, and entertain a Garrison. Further, he abrogated the popular estate, committing the government of the City to those of most wealth, depriving of the right of suffrage all such as wanted a convenient proportion of riches.

About nine thousand they were, all men of good substance; to whom the administration of the Common-wealth was given; a number great enough to retain the name and form of a Democratic. But the rascall multitude of beggarly persons, accustomed to grudge their livings out of the common troubles, being now debarred from bearing offices and giving their voyces, cryed out, that this was a meer Oligarchie, the violent usurpation of a few in reaching upon the publike right. These turbulent fellows (of whom King Philip had been wont to say, That war to them was peace, and peace war) Antipater planted in Thrace, and gave them lands to manure; leaving as few of them as he could to molest the quiet of Athens.

To the same end (yet withall for satisfying his own suspicions and hatred) he caused Demosthenes and Hyperides, famous Orators, with some others, to be slain. Had the death of these two, especially of Demosthenes, been forborn, the rest of his proceedings in this action might well have passed for very milde: whereas now, all such as either are delighted with the Orations of Demosthenes, or have surrendered their judgments to Authors justly admiring him, as the most eloquent of all that ever did speak and write, condemn him utterly, calling him a bloody tyrant. Such grace and reputation doe the learned arts find in all civill Nations, that the evill done to a man, famous in one of them, is able to blemish any action, how good soever otherwise it be, or honourably carried.

Demosthenes had taken Sanctuary in the Temple of Neptune, in the Isle of Calauria; there did Archias (sent with Souldiers by Antipater for the purpose) find him, and gently perswaded him to leave the place; but not so prevailing, he threatened violence. Then Demosthenes entreating a little respite, as it had been to write somewhat, secretly took poison, which he had kept for such a necessity, and so died; rather choosing to doe the last execution upon himself, than to fall into the hands of such as hated him. Only this act of his (commendable perhaps in a Heathen man) argued some valour in him; who was otherwise too much a coward in Battell, howsoever valiant in perswading to enterprises; wherein the way to very honourable ends was to be made through passages exceeding dangerous. He loved money well, and had great summes given him by the Persians, to encourage him, in finding work for the Macedonians at home. Neither did heill (me thinks) in taking from the Persians which loved not his Countrey, great reward; for speaking such things as tended to his Countreys good; which he did not cease cease to procure, when the Persians were no longer able to give him recompence. Such as in tender contemplation of his death can endure no honourable, though true, mention of Antipater, may (if they can) beleeye Lucian, who tels us, That it was Antipaters purpose to have done him great honour. Sure it is, that he was a stedfast enemy to the Macedonians; therefore discretion required that he should be cut off.

The matters of Athens being thus ordered, the chief command was left in the hands of Phocion, a vertuous man, and lover of his Countrey, yet applying himself to the necessity of the times; by which commendations he had both at other times done the Greeks much good, and now procured this peace, which (though grievous to free-men, yet favourable to the vanquished) he endeavoured carefully to preserve.

How Craterus and Antipater were drawn from their Etolian wars into Asia. The grounds of the first civill war between the Macedonian Lords.

SO Antipater with Craterus returned into Macedonia, where they strengthened their friendship with a new alliance; Craterus taking Phila, the Daughter of Antipater, to Wife.

Shortly after they went against the Etolians, whose povertie was not so easily damaged, as the luxurious wealth of the more powerfull State of Athens had bin. Their Countrey was rough and mountainous, having many places of great fastness, into which they conveyed such of their goods as they most esteemed, and of their people, as were least fit for war: with the rest they fortified the strongest of their Cities, and so abode the coming of the Macedonians, whom they manfully resisted. With great obstinacie did the Macedonians contend against the difficulties of the places, which the Etolians made good as long as their victuals held out. But when Craterus had shut up all passages, and utterly debarred them of relief, then were they put to a miserable choice; either to descend from their strong holds, and fight upon equall ground, with unquall numbers, or to endure the miseries of hunger and cold, against which they could make no long resistance, or to yeeld themselves to the Macedonians, who, incensed by the losse of many good Souldiers, were not like to leave so stubborn enemies in places which might give confidence to rebellion. In cases of extremitie, much fineness of wit apprehending all circumstances of danger, commonly doth more hurt than a blunt consideration of that only, which at the present is in hand. These Etolians did not as yet want meat; but their enemies daily molested them: wherefore as yet they thought upon nothing but fighting. Fortune was gracious to their courage. For such newes came out of Asia into the Macedonian Camp, as made Antipater and Craterus think every hour a moneth, till they had rid their hands of these Etolians, giving them whatsoever conditions they would ask: yet with purpose to call them to severe account; yea, to root them out of Greece by death, or by captivity, when once they should have settled the affairs of Asia, as they hoped and desired. But of mens purposes God is disposer: in whose high counsell it was ordained, that this poor Nation should continue a troublesome bar to the proceedings of Macedon and Greece, and (when time had ripened the next Monarchie) an open gate to let the Roman Conquerors into those and other Provinces. Likewise concerning the matters of Asia, the information intended by Antipater and Craterus, was so far from taking effect, that it served merely as an introduction to all the civill wars ensuing.

The grounds of the Asiaticke expedition, which did set the world in an uproar, were these. Antipater and Craterus were of Alexanders Captains the mightiest in reputation; The one, in regard of his ancient precedencie, and the present rule which he bore in the parts of Europe. The other, as of all men the best beloved, and most respected, both of Alexander and of the whole Army. Next unto these had Perdiccas been; whom the advantage of his presence at the Kings death did make equall, or superiour, to either of these, if not to both together. The first intents of Perdiccas were, to have consorted with these two, and to have been with them a third partner in the government of all, to which purpose hee entertained the discourse of marriage with one of Antipaters Daughters. But feeling in short space the strength of that gale of wind which bore him up, he began to take wing and soar quite another way. Antipater was a very simple man, yet served well enough to wear the title of that Majestic, whereof Perdiccas being Administrator, and hoping to become proprietary, the practice was more severe than had been in the dayes of Alexander: the desire to seem terrible, being very familiar with weak Princes, and their ambitious officers, who know no other means of preserving themselves from contempt, and of giving such a fiery lustre to their actions, as may dazle the eyes of the beholders. How cruelly the poor Greeks in the higher Asia were all put to the sword; and how tyrannously the King and Princes of Cappadocia were crucified hath already been shewed. The Pisidians were the next who felt the wrath of these counterfeit Alexanders. One City of theirs was utterly razed; the children sold for slaves, and all the rest massacred. The Isaurians by this example grown desperate, when after two or three dayes triall they found themselves unable to continue the defence, lockt themselves into their houses, and set the Town on fire, into the flame whereof the young men did throw themselves, after that they had a while repelled the Macedonians from the walls.

These exploits being performed, the Army had no other work than to sift the ashes of the burnt City for gold and silver; but Perdiccas had business of greater importance troubling his brains. Nothing was more contrary to his ends, than to sit still without employment, letting his Souldiers grow idle about him, whilst others grew great, and took deep root in their severall Provinces. He purposed therefore to transport his forces into Europe, under pretence of bringing the King into Macedonia, the seat of his Ancestors, and head of the Empire. The Kings presence would make the Offices of his Vice-Kings (during the time) actually voyd; Antipater with Craterus being once in case of private men, and only Perdiccas holding authority, the match with Cleopatra might easily be made. So should greatnesse meet with a good title; and what more could be wished? Some impediment the power of Ptolomy might give, who held Egypt well fortified with men, but much better with love of the people; yet if the business prospered in Macedonia, like enough it was that either Ptolomy would follow of himself, or be driven to come to reason. Antigonus likewise then governing in Phrygia, a buisie-headed man, and affected to the side, was to be looked into and made away, for fear of further trouble. So thought Perdiccas, and was deceived in so thinking. Antigonus was as good a man of War, as of deep a judgement, as high a spirit, and as great an undertaking, as any of Alexanders Captains. His employments had been lesse than some of theirs, which made him altho the lesse respected. But his thoughts were as proud as theirs: for he valued himself by his own worth, not by the opinions of other men; with carefull attention had hee watched Perdiccas, and sounded the depth of his purposes, which it was now high time to discover. For Perdiccas having with a jealous eye pryed into the demeanour of Antigonus, and finding him no way fit for his turn, caused him to be charged with such accusations, as might suffice to take away his life, especially by a Judge that sought his death. This device Antigonus would not seem to perceive, but prepared himself in shew to make answer, indeed, to make escape; which easily he did, putting himself and his Son Demetrius aboard of some Athenian Gallies, that carried him to Antipater, laden with such tidings as finished the Etolian War before mentioned.

As the coming of Antigonus made Craterus and Antipater manifestly perceive their own danger: so his flight gave Perdiccas to understand that his intentions were layd open, and must now be justified by the sword. Therefore he prepared as fast as he could, not onely for defence, but (as having on his side the Kings name) to meet with them at home, who were nothing slack in providing to encounter him. Ptolomy being advertised of these proceedings, and considering how neerly they concerned him, sided with Antipater. To his government of Egypt he had annexed the Dominion of Cyrene, not without consent of the chiefe Citizens; and now in the midst of these garboyles he celebrated the funeral of Alexander with great solemnity, purchasing thereby to himself much good will and many partakers, notwithstanding the terrible report of the Kings Army comming against him.

§. VIII.

Perdiccas his voyage into Egypt, and his death.

Perdiccas, uncertain which way to bend his main power, at length resolved to go upon Ptolomy; leaving Eumenes to keep to his use, against Craterus and Antipater, the parts of Asia bordering upon Europe. It may seem strange, that he did not rather make head against those who were to come out of Greece with a great number, and of more able men than Ptolomy could bring; but he thought to make a quick end with Ptolomy, or believed that Craterus would not be ready for him soon enough. Sure it is, that he took a bad course, and made worse with ill handling.

Ptolomy by his sweet behaviour allured many to his party, without help of any arts. Perdiccas contrariwise was full of insolencie, which never failed to be rewarded with hatred: that is truly defined, An affection founded upon opinion of an unjust contempt. The whole storie of his proceedings in Egypt is not worth relation: for it is nothing of importance; but (as a wilfull man) tired his followers, and wasted their hard enterprizes without success. His most forceable attempt was upon a little Town called the Camels Wall: thither he marched by night, with more haste than good sense, for Ptolomy preventing him, did put himself into the place, where behaving himself not only as a good Commander, but as a stout Souldier, he gave the foil to Perdiccas, causing him to retire with losse, after a vehement, but vain, assault continued one whole day. The night following, Perdiccas made another journey, (which was his last) and came to the divisions of Nilus, over against Memphis. There with much difficulty he began to passe over his Armie into an Island, where he meant to incamp. The current was then the water deep, and hardly fordable. Wherefore he placed his Elephants above the passage, to break the violence of the stream, and his horse-men beneath it; to the which as were carried away by swiftnesse of water. A great part of his Armie being saved on the further bank, the channell began to wax deep; so that whereas the former companies had waded up to the chin, they who should have followed could find nothing. Whether this came by the rising of the water, or sitting away of the ground, the earth being broken with the feet of so many Men, Horse, & Elephants) no remedy was, but such as had passed must repasse again, as well as they might: for they were too weak for the enemy, and could not be relieved by their followers. With great confusion therefore they committed themselves to the river, wherein above two thousand of them perished; a thousand were devoured by Crocodiles, a miserable spectacle even to such as were out of danger; such as were strong and could swim, recovered the Camp, many were carried down the stream, and driven to the contrary bank, whereby they fell into the hands of their enemies.

This misfortune exasperated the Souldiers against their Generall, giving liberty to their tongues, which long time had concealed the evil thoughts of their hearts. While they were thus murmuring, newes came from Ptolomy, which did set them in an uproar. Ptolomy had not only shewed much compassion on those who fell into his hands alive, but performed all rights of funerall to the dead carcases, which the river had cast upon his side: and finally, sent their bones and ashes to be interred by their Kinsmen or Friends. This did not only move the common Souldiers, but made the Captains fall to mutinie, thinking it unreasonable to make warre upon so vertuous and honourable a person, to fulfill the pleasure of a Lordly ambitious man, using them like slaves. The faction growing strong, wanted only a head, which it quickly found. Pythion was then, who inwardly hated Perdiccas, for the disgrace which he had suffered by his proeminent, after the victorie upon the rebellious Greeks. Pythion had lived in honourable place about Alexander; he was in the division of the Provinces made Governour of Asia, he had followed Perdiccas, and being in all things (the Protectorship excepted) equal to him, had nevertheless been scornfully used by him, which now he requited. Drawing together a hundred of the Captains, and a good part of the Horse, which consisted of the Gentrie, (the footmen having declared themselves before) he entred the Tent of Perdiccas, where without further circumstance they all ranne upon him, and slew him. Such end had the proud mis-governing authoritie of Perdiccas. Hee might have lived as great as any, could he have suffered any as great as himself; yea, peradventure master of all, had he not been too masterly over those which were already his.

The next day Ptolomy came into the Camp, where he was joyfully received; he exalted himself of things past, as not having been Author, or given cause of the warre, and was easily believed: the favour of the Aemie being such toward him, that needs they would have made him Protector in the room of Perdiccas. But this hee refused. He was an Office fit for one that would seek to increase his greatness with his trouble; Ptolomy was well enough ready; wherefore, for his own quiet he forbore to accept it, and for their well-deferving of him, he procured that honourable charge to Pythion, and Pythion the Captain, who having had some companies of Souldiers, to furnish with their attendance the solemnities of Alexanders Funerals, did with them adhere to him against Perdiccas.

In the midst of these busineses came news of two great victories obtained by Eumenes, which newes, had they arrived two or three dayes sooner, had been entertained with joyfull acclamations; and would have given such reputation to Perdiccas, as had caused both his private maligners to continue his open flatterers, and his open enemies to have accepted any tolerable composition. But these good tidings coming in ill time, when death had stopped the ears which would have given them welcome, found bad acceptance, as shall be shewed hereafter.

Victories of Eumenes in the lower Asia.

Before we proceed in the relation of things happening about the person of the King, it is meet that we speak of those busineses in the lower Asia, which were handled by Eumenes with notable dexterity, whilst Perdiccas was occupied in the European Wars. Alcetas the brother of Perdiccas, and Neoptolemus had received command from Perdiccas to be assistant to Eumenes, and to follow his directions. But Alcetas made fit answer that he would not, alleging the backwardnesse of his own to bear the against so great a person as Antipater, and a man so much honoured as Craterus. Neoptolemus was content to make fair shew, but inwardly he repined at the precedence given to Eumenes, as thinking himself the better man. Eumenes discovering through the counterfeited looks of Neoptolemus, the mischief lurking in his heart, wisely dissembled with him, in hope to win him by gentle behaviour, and sweet language, that commonly doth, when bestowed upon arrogant creatures. Yet the better to fortifie himself, that he might stand upon his own strength, he raised out of the Countreies under his jurisdiction about six thousand horse, giving many privileges to such as were serviceable; and winning them well up. Not without great need. For when upon advertisement of the warre preparations made by Craterus and Antipater (who had newly passed the Helle-Point) for the invasion of his Provinces, he willed Neoptolemus to come to him with all his power; Neoptolemus did (indeed) advance; but in hostile manner, though unprovoked, presented him battell. Neoptolemus had secretly covenanted with Antipater to lay open the way for him to the conquest of Asia, which now intending to perform, hee was heartily disappointed. For though his footmen, being all Macedonians, had much the better, and prevailed far upon Eumenes his battels; yet were his horse driven out of the field, and himself compelled, with a few of them, to run away, leaving naked the backs of his Macedonian foot-men to be charged by Eumenes, who forced them in such wise, the casting down their Pikes, they cryed for mercy, and gladly took their oath to doe him faithfull service. Antipater and Craterus endeavoured with many goodly promises to draw Eumenes into their society, who contrariwise offered himself as a mean of reconciliation, between Perdiccas and Craterus, whom he dearly loved; professing that his hatred to Antipater, and constant faith to the cause which he had undertaken to maintain.

Whilst these negotiations were on foot, Neoptolemus came with his broken crue to Antipater, and his Associates, visiting Eumenes, & calling him a Scribe (at which foolish thing they laughed) but extolling the vertue of Craterus (as well he might) with high commendations; assuring them, that if Craterus did but once appear, or that his voyce was but heard by any Macedonian in Eumenes his Camp, the victory was wonne; for they they would all forth with revolt unto him. Earnestly therefore he desired them to stay him ayd against Eumenes, and especially requested that Craterus might have the leading of the Armie to be sent. Their own affections did easily lead them to condescend to his motion: and good hope there was, that the reputation of Craterus might prevail as much as the force which he drew along. For he had in the midst of Alexanders vanities, when others (imitating their King) betook themselves to the Persian fashions of garments and customes, retained the ancient Macedonian form of behaviour, and apparel, whereby he became very gracious with the common Souldiers, who beheld these new tricks of Asia with discontented eyes, as reproachfull and derogatory to the manners of their native Countrey. So Antipater took the way toward Cilicia, to hold Perdiccas at bay, and to joyn with Ptolomy. Craterus used great celerity, to have taken Eumenes revelling (as hee hoped) according to the common fashion of Captains, after a great victory. But he had a wary and well-advised enemy to encounter, who kept good espiall upon him, and with much wisdom fore-law all that was to be feared, and the means of prevention, which his courage did not fail to execute. Eumenes was not ignorant that Craterus was able to defeat him without battell, yea without stroke: him therefore he feared more than the Army following him: (yet the Army following him was such, as much exceeded his own in foot-men, but was inferiour in horse-men) and thought it more uneasy to keep the Macedonians from revolting to him, than from knowing him. Hereupon he took in hand a strange piece of work, which desperation of all courtesie taught him, and wife managing prosperously accomplished. He gave out reports, that Neoptolemus was returned with such company as he could gather together, & had gotten Pi-gres (a Captain of no great estimation, who lay not far off) to joyn with him. Having animated his men against Neoptolemus, whom he knew to be despised & hated among them, (as having bin vanquished by some of them, and forsaken others in plain field, whilst they valiantly fought in his quarrel) he took great care to keep them from receiving any intelligence of the enemies matters. Peremptorily he commanded that no messenger nor trumpeter should be admitted; & not herewith satisfied, he placed against Craterus no one Macedonian, nor any other that much would have regarded him had he bin known: but Thracians, Cappadocians and Persians, under the leading of such, as thought more highly of none, than of Perdiccas and himself. To these also he gave in charge, that without speaking or hearkning to any word, they should run upon the enemy, and give him no leisure to say, or do any thing but fight. The directions which he gave to others, he did not fail to execute in his own person: but placing himself in the right wing of his battell, opposite to Neoptolemus, who (as he understood) conducted the left wing on the contrary side, he held the Macedonians arranged in good order, and ready to charge the enemy as soon as the distance would give leave. A rising piece of ground lay between them, which having ascended, the Armies discovered each other: but that of Eumenes every way prepared for the fight, the other wearied with long journeys, which over-hastily they had made, seeking the deceitfull issue of frivolous hopes. Then was it high time for Craterus (having failed in surprizing them as enemies) to discover himself to his old friends, and fellow souldiers, of whom he could see none. Phenix a Tenidian, & Artabazus a Persian, had the leading of that side, who mindfull of their instructions, began to give upon him, with such countenance as told him his error, which to redeem, he bad his men fight, and redeem the day, and take the spoyle to themselves; but the Bear whose skin he fels, is not yet caught. The ground whereon the battell was fought gave most advantage to the horse, who encountred very roughly on all parts: especially about Eumenes and Neoptolemus, who as soon as they had discovered one another, could not contain themselves, but with great rage met body to body, & letting loose their bridles, grappled so violently together, that their horses ran from under them, leaving both of them tumbling on the ground. Neoptolemus rose first up, but Eumenes had his sword first drawn, wherewith he houghed the other, causing him to fall down & fight upon one knee. In this conflict they received many wounds, but Neoptolemus giving slight ones, took such as were deadly, by which he dyed in the place, and was there (being half-dead, half-alive) stripped by his mortal enemy, whose revilings he requited, lying even at the last gasp, with one wound in the groin, dangerous had it not wanted force. The death of Neoptolemus caused his followers to run away upon the spur, and seek shelter behind the battels of their foot. They were arranged hotly pursued. For Eumenes pained himself to carry to his left wing, which he suspected much to be distressed, but found account perillous with the same fortune, that had afflicted him when he fought in person. Craterus had borne himself a while, and sustained the impression of Artabazus and Phenix with more courage than force: holding it nothing agreeable with his honour to retire, and retreat from the fight, when he was charged by men of like estimation or note. Other what it is not unlikely, that he might have either carried the day, or preserved himself by a better adventure by giving ground, as the rest (when he and Neoptolemus were slain) did. But whilst he sought to preserve his reputation, he lost his life by the fall of his horse, or his falling from his horse, through force of a wound received upon which back he was trampled under foot by many that knew him not, and so perished unknown, all was too late to know it. Eumenes coming to the place where he lay, made great lamentation, as having alwaies loved and honoured Craterus, of whose death he was become the instrument. The vanquished Army entertained a treaty of peace with Eumenes, making shew of willingness to become his followers, but their intent was only to refresh themselves, which (by his permission) having done they sold away by night, and fled toward Antipater.

This battell fought within ten dayes of the former, was so Eumenes more reputation than good will: for his own Souldiers took the death of Craterus heavily, and the Armie lying further off were enraged with the news. But other matters there were which incited men against him, besides the death of Craterus, whereof it manifestly appeared, that he was as sorry as any that pretended greater heaviness. His Army wanted pay. This was a great fault, which he wisely amended by giving to them the spoyle of such Towns as were ill-affected to him. So he redeemed the love of his own men, who of their meer motion appointed unto him a Guard for defence of his person. Others were not so easie to be reconciled. They who had been Traytors to Perdiccas, hated him for his faithfulness, as greatly, as they thought he would hate them for their faithfulness. Neither found they any fairer way of excusing their late revolt, than by accusing and condemning the side which they had forsaken. Wherefore they proclaimed Eumenes a Traytor, and condemned him to die: but it was an easier matter to give that sentence, than to put it in execution.

Quarrels between Eurydice the Queen, and Python the Protector. Python resigns his office, into which Antipater is chosen.

Python and Arideus being chosen Protectors of King Arideus, and the children of Alexander, took the way to Asia the lesse, conducting the Armie through Syria. Of these two, Python was the greater in reputation, yet far too weak to sustain so important a charge. For Eurydice wife to King Arideus, was come to her husband, a Lady of a masculine spirit, well understanding what she was or should be, and thinking herself able to support the weight which fortune layd upon her foolish husband, being due to her own title. Her Mother Cyna, sister to Alexander, by her Father King Philip, was married (as hath been shewed) to Amyntas, who was the right Heir to the Kingdom of Macedon, being the only son of King Perdiccas, Philip elder brother. This Cyna was a warlike woman, she had led Armies, and as a true sister of Alexander, fighting hand to hand with Caria Queen of the Phrygians, a Virago like unto her self, had slain her. She brought up this Eurydice in the same unwomanly Art of Warre, who now among the Souldiers began to put in practice the rudiments of her education to the small contentment of Python, that could not brook her too curious interference in his charge. Whether it were so, that Python had some purpose to advance the son of Alexander by Roxane, to the Kingdom, (as once he had sought to do) or whether the Queen did suspect him of some such intent, or whether only desire of rule urged her to quarrell with him, quarrell she did, which disturbed the proceeding against Eumenes. The Army having shaken off such a rank-rider as Perdiccas, would not afterward be reigned with a twined thread. Python bearing himself upon his office, took upon him to give directions in the Kings name, which the Queen did oftentimes quarrell, using the same name, with more authority, and better liking of the Souldiers.

Python,

By this seeing this, would needs resign his office, whether upon wearinesse of the contentions daily growing, or on purpose to bring the Queen into envie, it is uncertain. Perhaps he thought, that now being the far worthiest man in the Camp, he should be intrusted to retain the place, and have his authority confirmed, or (as might be merited) were it but for want of a fit Successor. Barydice was nothing sorry at this course, for now she thought to manage the affairs of the Empire at her own will, being freed from the trouble some assistance of a Protector. But the souldiers disappointed both her & Barydice of their contrary expectations, choosing Antipater, the only powerfull man of Alexander's Captains, then living, into the room of Pythion. Here at the Queen Elected exceeding joy, and began to deal earnestly with the Macedonians, that they should acknowledge no Lord save only the King their Sovereign. Yee she failed of her purpose, being hindered (as may seeme) by three things: the apparent weaknesse of her husband; the growth of Alexander's children, who (though born of out-landish women) were bred in the Macedonian Camp; and the mightinesse of Antipater, who commanding a great Army year at hand, arrived in few daies at the Camp, and enforced Eurydice to hold her self content. Antipater was of such power, that he needed not to work by any close devices as Perdiccas had done: he had no concourers, all the Governors of Provinces that remained alive, acknowledged him their better; yea many of them he displaced out of hand, putting others in their rooms. This done, he took the King, Queen, and Princes along with him into Macedonia, leaving Antigonus Generall of the Royall Army: to whom for his good services done, and to be done against Eumenes, he gave the rule of Susiana, besides his former Provinces; and committed into his hands the government of Asia during that War.

§. XI.

Antigonus Lieutenant of Asia, wins a battell of Eumenes, and besiegeth him in Nora: He conquers other followers of Perdiccas.

Here begins the greatnesse of Antigonus, whose power in few years over-growing the rest, wanted little of spreading it self over the whole Monarchie. He was to make War upon Eumenes, Alcetus the brother, and Attalus the brother-in-law to Perdiccas: work enough to keep his Army employed in the publike service, till such time as he might find occasion to make use of it in his own business. The first of these which he undertook was Eumenes, with whom Alcetus and Attalus refused to joyn, having unseasonably contended with him in time of common danger about the chief place. Eumenes had an Army strong in number, courage, and all needfull provisions; but obedient only at discretion. Therefore Antigonus tried all ways of corrupting his Souldiers; tempting first the whole Army with letters: which practice failing by the cunning of Eumenes (who made shew as if he himself had scattered abroad those letters to try the faith of his men) he dealt apart with such Captains as he thought most easie to be won. Of these Captains one rebelled, breaking out too hastily before any help was near him; yet looking so carelesly to himself, that he and his were surprised; when he thought his enemies far off. Another follower of Eumenes (or rather of good fortune, which he thought now to be in company with Antigonus) kept his treachery secret, reserving it for the time of execution. Upon confidence of the treason which this false man Apollonides had undertaken, Antigonus presented battell to Eumenes, in the heat whereof Apollonides, General of the horse to Eumenes, fled over to the contrary side, with such as he could get to follow him: but was closely followed by some, whose company he desired not. Eumenes perceiving the irrecoverable mischief which this traitorous practice had brought upon him, pursued the villain, & cut him off before he could thrust himself into the troups of Antigonus, and boast of his treachery. This was some comfort to Eumenes in the losse of that battell, which disabled him utterly to keep the field, & left it very hard for him to make a safe retreat. Yet one thing he did which much amazed his enemies, and (though a matter of small importance) caused Antigonus himself to admire his high resolution. It was held no small part of the victory to get possession of the dead bodies. Eumenes, whilst Antigonus held him in chase, turned out of the way, and fetching a compasse, returned to the place where the battell had been fought; there he burned (according the manner of the time) the bodies of his own men, men, and interred the bones and ashes of the Captains and common Souldiers apart, raising up heaps of earth as mountains over them, and so went his way. As this bold adventure bred in the Macedonians (returned to their Camp) great admiration of his brave spirit: so the newes which Menander (who was set to look unto their carriages) brought and published among them, enticed them to love him as their honourable friend. Hee had found Menander in an open Plain, carelesse, as after an assured victory, and laden with the spoyle of many Nations, the rewards of their long service; all which he might have taken: but fearing lest such a purchase should prove a heave burden to him, whose chief hope consisted in swift expedition, he gave secret warning to Menander to flee to the mountains, whilst he detained his men (whom authority could not have restrained) by this sleight, setting them to bait their horses. The Macedonians excelled him for this courtesie, as a noble Gentleman, that had forborn when it lay in his power to strip them out of all their wealth, and make their children slaves, and to ravish their wives: but Antigonus told them, that he had not forborn to do this out of any good will to them; but out of meer subtilty had avoyded those precious fetters, which would have hindered his speedy flight. He told them true. For Eumenes did not only think all carriages to be over-burden some, but the number of his men to be more troublesome than available in his intended course. Wherefore he sent them from him as fast as he could, willing them to shift for themselves, and retaining only five hundred horse, and two hundred foot. When he had wearied Antigonus a while in following him up and down, he came to Nora: where again keeping no more about him than necessitie required to make good the place, he lovingly dismissed all the rest. Nora was a little fortresse in the borders of Lyconia and Cappadocia, so strongly situated, that it seemed impregnable, and so well victualled and stored with all necessaries, that it might hold out for many years. Thither did Antigonus follow him, with more desire to make him his friend, than to vanquish him in War. To this purpose he entertained parley with him, but in vain. For whereas Antigonus offered him pardon and his love; Eumenes required restitution of his Provinces, which could not be granted without Antipaters consent. Then was Nora closed up; where Antigonus leaving sufficient strength for continuance of the siege, took his journey into Pisidia, against Alcetus and Attalus, with whom he made short work. He came upon them unexpected, and seized on passages, which wanted not men, but such a Captain as Eumenes, to have defended them. Alcetus and Attalus, as they had been too secure before his coming, so were they too adventurous, in fighting at the first fight, upon all disadvantages: and their folly was attended with suitable event. Attalus with many principall Captains was taken; Alcetus fled to the City of Termessus, where the love of the younger sort toward him was so vehement, that stopping their ears against all persuasions of the ancient men, they needs would hazard their lives and their Country in his defence. Yet this availed him nothing: for the Governors of the Town having secretly compounded with Antigonus, caused the young men to fall out; and using the time of advantage, they with their servants did set upon Alcetus, who unable to resist, slew himself. His dead body was conveyed to Antigonus, and by him barbarously torn, was cast forth without buriall. When Antigonus was gone, the young men interred the carcase with solemn funerals, having once been minded to set on fire, their own town in revenge of his death. Such favour had he purchased with courteous liberality: but to make an able Generall, one vertue, how great soever, is insufficient.

§. XII.

Ptolomie wins Syria and Phoenicia. The death of Antipater.

Whilst these things were in doing, the rest of the Princes lay idle, rather seeking to enjoy their Governments for the present, than to confirm or enlarge them. Only Ptolomie looking abroad, wan all Syria and Phenicia: a nation of great importance, but not remarkable for any circumstance in the managing. He sent a Lieutenant with an Army who quickly took Laomedon prisoner, that ruled there by appointment of Antipater, and formerly of Perdiccas; but (as may seeme) without any great strength of Souldiers, far from assistants, and vainly relying upon the authority which had given him that Province, and was now occupied with greater cares, than with seeking to maintain him in his Office.

Antipater was old and sickly, desirous of rest, and therefore contented to let Antigonus pursue the dispatch of those businesses in Asia. He had with him Polysperchon, one of the most ancient of Alexanders Captains, that had lately suppressed a dangerous insurrection of the Atolians, which Nation had stirred in the quarrell of Perdiccas, prevailing far at the first, but soon losing all that they had gained, whilst Antipater was abroad in his Cilician expedition. In this Polysperchon Antipater did repose great confidence; so far forth, that (suspecting the youth of his own Son Cassander of insufficiency in so great a charge) he bequeathed unto him on his death-bed the government of Macedon and Greece, together with his office of Protectorship. So Antipater died, being fourscore years old, having always travelled in the great affairs of mighty Princes, with such reputation, that Alexander in all his greatness was jealous of him, and the successors of Alexander did either quietly give place unto him, or were unfortunate in making oppositions. In his private qualities he was a subtle man, temperate, frugal, and of a Philosophicall behaviour, not unlearned, as having been Scholar to Aristotle, and written some Histories. He had been much molested by Olympias, Alexanders mother, whom after the death of her Son, he compelled to abstain from coming into Macedonia, or entermeddling in matters of Estate: yea, at his own death he gave especial direction, that no woman should be permitted to deal in the administration of the Empire. But this precept was soon forgotten; and yet ere long, by sorrowfull experience approved to have been sound and good.

§. XIII.

Of Polysperchon, who succeeded unto Antipater in the Protectorship. The insurrection of Cassander against him.

Polysperchon was very skilfull in the Art of Warre, having long time been Apprentice in that occupation; other qualities, requisite in so high an Office as hee under-went, either Nature had not given to him, or Time had robbed him of them. He managed his business more formally than wisely, as a man of a second wit, fitter to assist, than command in chief. At the first entrance upon the stage, he called to counsell all his friends, wherein for weighty considerations (as they who weighed not the contrary reasons held them) the Queen Olympias was revoked out of Epyrus into Macedon, that the presence of Alexanders mother might countenance and strengthen their proceedings. For, the condition of the times requiring, that the Governours of Provinces abroad should keep greater Armies, than were needfull or easie to be retained about the person of the King in Macedonia; it seemed expedient, that the face of the Court should be filled with all Majesty, that might give authority to the Injunctions from thence proceeding, and by an awfull regard contain within the limited bounds of dutie such as could not by force have been kept in order, being strong, and lying too farre off.

Such care was taken for prevention of imaginary dangers and out of sight, whilst present mischiefs lay unregarded in their bosomes. Cassander, the Sonne of Antipater, was not able to discover that great sufficiency in Polysperchon, for which his father had reposed in him so much confidence: neither could he discern such odds in the quality of himself and Polysperchon, as was in their fortune. Hee was left Captain of one thousand; which Office by practice of those times was of more importance, than the title now seems to imply. Hee should thereby have been as Camp-master, or Lieutenant generall to the other: a place no way satisfying his ambition, that thought himself the better man. Therefore hee began to examine his own power, and compare with the forces likely to oppose him. All that had relied on his father, were his own assured, especially such as commanded the Garrisons bestowed in the principall Cities of Greece. The like hope was of the Magistrates, and others of principall authority, in those Common-weals, whose forms had been corrected by Antipater, that they would follow the side, and draw in many partakers: it concerned these men in their own particular to adhere unto the Captains, by whom their faction was up-held; and by whom the rascall multitude, covetous of re-gaining the tyrannous power which they had formerly exercised over the principall Citizens, were kept in order, obeying their betters perforce. Besides all these helps, Cassander had the secret love of Queen

Eurydice,

Eurydice, who had in private rendered him such curtesie, as was due onely to her husband. But neither the Queens favour, nor all his other possibilities, gave him confidence to break out into open rebellion; because he saw Polysperchon much revered among the Macedonians, and strong enough to suppress him, before he could have made head. Therefore he made shew of following his pleasures in the Countrey, and calling many of his friends about him, under pretence of hunting, advised with them upon the safest course, and most free from all suspicion. The necessity was apparent of raising an Armie, before the business was set on foot; and to doe this, opportunitie presented him with fair means. Ptolomie had by fine force, without any commission, annexed Syria to his government of Egypt and Cyrene: this was too much either for the King to trust him with, or for him to part with. Antigonus upon the first newes of Antipaters death, began to lay hold upon all that he could get, in such sort, that he manifestly discovered his intent of making himself Lord of all Asia. These two therefore stood in need of a civill war; which Cassander wel noted, & presumed withall, That the friendship which had passed between his father and them, would avail him somewhat. Whereupon he secretly dispatched messengers to them both, and within a little while conveyed himself on a sudden over the Hellespont, that he might in person advance the business with greater speed. Much persuasion is needlesse in winning a man to what he desireth. Antigonus coveting nothing more, than to find Polysperchon work, by raising some commotion in Greece. Yet (as formalities must not be neglected) Cassander did very earnestly presse him, by the memorie of his Father, and all requisite conjurations, to assist him in this enterprise; telling him, that Ptolomie was ready to declare for them, and urging him to a speedy dispatch. Antigonus on the other side repaid him with the same coin, saying, That for his own sake, and his dead Fathers, whom he had very dearly loved, he would not fail to give him all manner of succour. Having thus feasted one another with words, they were nothing slack in preparing the common means, leading to their severall ends.

§. XIV.

The unworthy courses held by Polysperchon, for the keeping down of Cassander.

Great necessity there was of timely provision. For, Polysperchon needed no other instructions to inform him of Cassanders drift, than the newes of his departure. He was not ignorant of the ready disposition, which might be found in Antigonus and Ptolomie, to the strengthening of rebellion; and well he knew that one principall hope of Cassander was reposed in the confidence of such as ruled in the Grecian Estate. Therefore (loving to work circumspectly) he called another Councell, wherein it was concluded, That the Popular form of Government should be erected in all the Cities of Greece; the Garrisons withdrawn; and that all Magistrates and principall Men, into whose hands Antipater had committed the supreme authoritie, should forthwith be either slain or banished. This was a sure way to diminish the number of Cassanders friends, and to raise up many enemies to him in all quarters. Yet hereby was disclosed both an unthankfull nature in Polysperchon, and a factious malice in his adherents. For, how could he be excused of extreme ingratitude, that for hatred of the son went about to dishonour the Fathers actions, whose onely bounty had enabled him to doe it? Or what could be said in their defence, who sought to destroy many worthie men, friends to the State, by whom the Greeks were held restrained from stirring against the Macedonians? and in opposition to their private enemie, gave the rule of things to base Companions, and such as naturally malign'd the Empire? But as in mans body, through sinews newly issuing from one branch, a finger is more vexed by inflammation of his next neighbour, than by any distemper in the contrary hand: so in bodies politique, the humours of men, subdivided in faction, are more enraged by the disagreeable qualities of such as curb them in their neereest purposes, than they are exasperated by the general opposition of such as are divided from them in the main trunk. Hereby it comes to passe, that contrary religions are invited to help against neighbour Princes; bordering enemies drawn in, to the part in civill warres; and ancient hatred called to counsell against injurious friends. Of this fault nature is not guiltie, hee hath taught the arm to offer it self unto manifest losse in defence of the head: They are depraved affections affections, which render men sensible of their own particular, and forgetfull of the more generall good, for which they were created.

The decree, whereby the Greeks were presented with a vain shew of libertie, ran under the Kings name; but so, as one might easily discern, that Polyperchon had guided his pen. For the main point was, That they should follow such directions, as Polyperchon gave, and treat with him about all difficulties. In the rest it contained such a deal of kindeesse, as proceeding on a sudden from those who had kept them in hard subjection, might well appear to have some other root than the pretended good will; and was of itself too base and unfit for a King to use toward his conquered Subjects, and often subdued Rebels.

s. XV.

Of the great commotions raised in Athens by Polyperchons decree. The death of Phocion.

NEvertheless the Athenians with immoderate joy entertained this happy-seeming Proclamation, and sought how to put it in execution without further delay. But Nicanor, Captain of the Garrison, which kept one of their Havens, called Munychia, in the lower part of the Town, would needs take longer time of deliberation, than was pleasing to their hasty desires.

Nicanor, as a trustie follower of Cassander, was by him shifted into the place, and Menyllus (that was Captain there before) discharged, when Antipater was newly dead. His coming to Athens was no way gratefull to the Citizens, who soon after hearing the newes of Antipater's death, cried out upon Phocion, saying, That he had sufficient intelligence of that accident, and might, by advertising them in due time, have put into their hands a fair opportunitee of thrusting out the Macedonians. But these exclamations argued no more than a desire to shake off the Macedonian yoke. Farre more grievously would they have been offended, had they known the instructions which Cassander had given to Nicanor, and his resolution to follow them. It was concluded, That he should not onely retain Munychia, any injunction to the contrary notwithstanding; but that hee should find means to thrust some companies into Piræus, and fortifie that also, which was the principall haven, against the high-town. How to accomplish this, he rather wanted some reasonable pretence, than good abilitie. But the Athenians were not long in giving him sufficient cause to do that, which he would have done without any cause given. They desired him to come unto their Councell, assembled in the Piræus, there to consider of the Kings Proclamation: whither upon Phocions word and safe conduct he came, and earnestly pressed them to hold with Cassander in the war which was ready to break forth. Contrariwise, they urged him first of all, to make them masters of their own, which how to use, they might consult afterwards. Each of them refusing to condescend unto the others demand, the Athenians (who did alwayes measure justice by profit, yet seldom thrived by that course) practised with Dercillus, a Captain following Polyperchon, and then lying neer at hand; that he should enter into the Town, and take Nicanor prisoner. But Phocion, who then governed in Athens, a man very unlike to the rest of the Citizens, being nothing pleased with such a trick of politick dishonestie, did quietly suffer him to depart and save himself.

Nicanor hereupon began to devise upon taking Piræus; not as following now the project of Cassander, but prosecuting his own just revenge. He levied as many Souldiers as he could, and drew them closely into Munychia; which done, he issued into Piræus, took it, and intrenched himself therein, to the exceeding discomfort of the Athenians, who lately impatient of his keeping the one Haven, saw him now Master of both. Alexander, the son of Polyperchon, came thither shortly after with an Armie. Then were the Citizens in great hope of recovering all, and addressed themselves unto him; who made fair shewes, intending meer mischief, which they perceived not, being blinded with the vain Epistles of his Father, and of Olympias the old Queen. Olympias, taking upon her to command, before she durst well adventure to return into Macedon, had peremptorily charged Nicanor to restore to the Athenians the places which hee held: but hee would first consider more of the matter. Polyperchon had further ordained, that the Isle of Samos should be rendred unto them: a goodly offer, had it accorded with his power and and meaning. He was (indeed) so far from purposing to let them have Samos, that as yet he did not thoroughly intend to let them have themselves. The commoditie of their Havens was such, as he would rather get into his own hands, than leave in theirs; yet rather wished in theirs, than in Cassanders. His Son Alexander, not ignorant of this, made fair shew to the Athenians, and spent much labour in communing with Nicanor, but suffered not them, for whom he seemed to labour, to intermeddle with the businesse. Hereupon the Citizens grew jealous, and the displeasure they conceived against him, they poured out upon Phocion, depriving him of his office. This was done with much tumult: banished men and strangers thrusting themselves into the assembly of the Citizens, who were distracted with sundrie passions, growing out of their present misfortunes, thought every one that best could inveigh against things past, a most likely man to find some remedie for the evill threatening them. In this hurly-burly was Alexander devising how he might come to some good point of composition with Nicanor, & held much privie conference with him, which he could not so secretly carry, but that his negotiation was discovered, whereby the uproare in the Town was so far increased, that Phocion with many of his friends were accused, and driven to seek safeguard of their lives by flight. So they came to Alexander, who entertained them gently, and gave them his letters of commendation to his Father, desiring him to take them into his protection.

Polyperchon was in the Countrie of Phociæ, ready to enter with an Army into Attica. Thither came Phocion with his companions, hoping well that the letters which they brought, and their own deserts, (having alwayes been friends to the Macedonians, as far as the good of their Countrie gave leave) should be enough to get patronage to their innocence. Besides all this, Dinarchus a Corinthian, Polyperchons familiar friend, went along with them (in an evil hour) who promised to himself and them great favour, by means of his acquaintance. But Polyperchon was an unstable man, very earnest in what he took in hand; yet, either for want of judgement in following them, or of honestie in looking the best of them, easily changing his intended courses, and doing things by the eaves, which made him commonly fail of good success. For fear of Cassander he had offered wonderfull kindeesse to the Athenians; this had caused them to love him: out of their love hee gathered hope of deceiving them, which made him to change his mind, and seek how to get into his own hands those keys, with which Cassander held them fast lockt up: finding himself disappointed of this purpose, and suspected as a false dishonourable man, he stood wavering between the contrary allurements of profit and reputation. To keep the Athenians perforce at his devotion, would indeed have done well; but the effecting of this began to grow desperate; and many Towns of importance in Greece began to cast their eyes upon his proceeding in that action. Wherefore hee thought it the wisest way to redeem their good opinion, by giving all contentment unto the popular faction, which was then grown to be Master of that Citie. And in good time for this purpose were the Athenian Embassadors come, treading (as one may say) upon Phocions heels, whom they were sent to accuse. These had some audience given to them in the Kings presence, who was attended by many great Lords, and for ostentations sake was glorified with all exteriour shewes of Majestie; yet all too little to change Arideus into Alexander: for he did nothing there, but either laugh or chafe, as he saw others doe. For beginning of the businesse, Polyperchon commanded that Dinarchus should be tortured and slain. This was enough to testifie his heartie affection to the Commonaltie of Athens, in that he spared not his old acquaintance for their sake; whose Embassadors he then bad to speak. When their errand was done, and answer to it made by the accused, who had no indifferent hearing, Phocion and the rest were pronounced guilty of treason; but to give sentence, as doe the execution upon them, was (for honours sake) referred unto the Citie of Athens, because they were Burgesses. Then were they sent away to Athens; where the rascall multitude, not suffering them to speak for themselves, condemned them to dye. So they perished being innocent. But the death of Phocion being very conspicuous, made the fortune of the rest to be of the lesse regard. Five and fortie times had he been chosen Governour of the Citie, never suing for the place, but sent for when he was absent, so well was his integritie known, and so highly valued; even of such as were no pretenders to the same vertue. He was a good Commander in War, wherein though his actions were not very great, yet were they of good importance, and and never unfortunate. Never did the Cite repent of having followed his counsell: nor any private man of having trusted his word. Philip of Macedon highly esteemed him; so, and much more did Alexander, who (besides other signs of his love) sent him two hundred talents of silver, and offered to bestow upon him of four Cities in Asia any one which he would choose. But Phocius refused these and other gifts, howsoever importunately thrust upon him, resting well contented with his honest poverty: wherein he lived above four score years, and then was compelled by the unjust judgment of wicked men, to drink that poison, which by just judgment of the righteous God, so infected the Cite of Athens, as from that day forwards it never brought forth any worthy man resembling the vertue of their Ancestors.

Of Polyperchon his vain expedition against Cassander.

Not long after these things were done, Cassander, with such forces as Antigonus lent him, entered into Piræus; which newes drew Polyperchon headlong into Attica, with a great Armie, but so ill victualled, that he was faine to depart without any thing done. Only he had given some impediment to the enemy, who, not contented with defending what he held, began to look out, and make new purchases abroad. Finding therefore himself unable to drive Cassander out of Athens, he left his son Alexander, with such number of men as exceeded not the proportion of victuals, to withstand his further incroaching. The greatest part of his Armie he carried into Peloponnesus, to make the Countie sure to himself, wherein Cassander had many Friends.

His doings in Peloponnesus were such, as they had been in other parts of Greece. First, he began to fight with Edicts, restoring the Democratic, or Popular form of government. He commanded that the principall Citizens, that had by Antipater been made Rulers, should be either slain, or driven into exile. This decree took immediate effect in most places: The vulgar sort being very readie to seal the Charter of their freedom, and authoritie, with the blood of those who had kept them in subjection. Yet many Cities there were, which delighted in the rule of the chief Citizens; and many which wished well to Cassander, especially they of Megalopolis, on whom Polyperchon meant to inflict an exemplarie punishment of disobedience to him, which he termed Rebellion. Megalopolis had in it fifteen thousand serviceable men, well furnished of necessaries, and resolved to endure the worst. And need there was of such resolution. For Polyperchon comming thither with all his power, did so much, that he overthrew, by a Mine, three of their Bulwarks, and all the space of wall between them. But the Defendants manfully repelled the Macedonians which came up to the breach; and at the same time with great labour they raised up an inner wall, to bear out the next assault. The Assailants having failed to carry the Town at the first attempt, took much pain to clear the ground, and make fair way for their Elephants, whose violence was likely to overthrow all that came in their way. But the Towns-men perceiving their drift, prepared boords driven through with long nails, which they used as gal-throps, bestowing them sleightly covered, with the points upwards, in the way by which the beasts were to passe. Neither did they let any to encounter them in front, but appointed certain light-armed men to beat upon their sides with arrows and Darts, as they were instructed by some that had learned the manner of that fight in the Asian Wars. Of these provisions they made happy use in the next assault. For, by them were the Elephants (wherein the enemy chiefly trusted) either sorely hurt, or driven back upon the Macedonians, whom they trampled under feet. Polyperchon came as ill furnished for long abode to Megalopolis as before to Athens. Therefore being neither able to dispatch the businesse quickly, nor to take such leasure as was requisite, he forsook the siege, with some losse, and much dishonour, leaving some part of his Army to lye before the Town for his credit.

After this he sent Clitus, his Admirall, to Sea, to joyn with Arideus that was come out of Phrygia, and to cut off all succour which might come to the enemy out of Asia. Cassander also sent his whole fleet under Nicanor, who taking along with him some ships of Antigonus, came to the Propontis, where he fought with Clitus, and was beaten. But Antigonus hearing of the overthrow, gathered together the ships that were escaped, and and manning them very well, sent out Nicanor again, assuring him of the victorie, as well he might. For he sent out sufficient numbers of light-armed men, whom he caused to be wafted over the streights in small Vessels by night; these before day-light setting upon Clitus, drave his men, that lay securely on the land, head-long into their ships; in which tumult Nicanor arriving did assail them so lustily, that few or none escaped him.

This losse at Sea, together with his bad successe by Land, brought Polyperchon into great contempt. He had a good facultie in penning bloudie decrees, but when the execution was referred to his own sword, he could find the matter more difficult. Wherefore the Athenians, perceiving that he had left them to shift for themselves, and was not able to give them protection against the enemy which lay in their bosomes, came to agreement with Cassander, accepting a governour of his appointment; and restoring all things to the same state wherein Antipater had left them. The like inclination to the partie of Cassander, was found in very many Cities of Greece, which daily and willingly revolted unto him, as to an industrious man, and likely to prevail in the end. Thus was the whole Countie set in a combustion, uneasie to be quenched; which presented unto Antigonus an opportunitie, that he neglected not, of making himself Lord of Asia.

Antigonus seeks to make himself an absolute Lord: and thereupon treats with Eumenes, who disappointeth him, Phrygia and Lydia won by Antigonus.

Antigonus had in Antipaters life-time a firm resolution, to make unto himself the utmost benefit that he might of the Armie committed to his charge. And in fair season for advancement of his purposes came the newes of Antipaters death; even then, when all the businesse in Pisidia was dispatched, and no more employment for the Armie remaining, save onely the continuance of the siege of Nora, a small thing of it self, but as hard as a greater matter; and requiring few men, but much time; when time of all things was most precious. Eumenes lay in that Fort of Nora, able to make the place good, and hoping that the mutabilitie, to which the present Estate was manifestly subject, would in continuance of some years (which he might abide) work more for him, than his enemies in that space could work against him. His most fear was, that for want of exercise in that narrow Castle, his men & hories might grow sickly and unserviceable: which made him to practise many devices of keeping them in health and lustie. But when he had continued shut up in this manner about a year, his hopes came to good passe, and he was eased of his cares by Antigonus himself, whose forces held him besieged.

Antigonus knowing the great sufficiencie of Eumenes, and considering his fidelity shewed unto Perdiccas, thought that he could not find in all the world a fitter man than him, to employ in managing those high designs, wherein he doubted not that he should be withstood by the mightiest Princes of the Empire. He sent therefore to Eumenes by one that was friend to them both, acquainting him with some part of his intent, and promising to make him a better Lord than ever he had bin, and the next man to himself, if things fell out as he desired: in regard whereof he required only his friendship, & therupon sent him an oath to take, which done, he might at his good pleasure issue safely out of Nora, and enjoy his perfect libertie. Eumenes perusing the form of the oath, did perceive the meaning of Antigonus, which was, rather to make him his follower than his fellow. For whereas in a few words, it mentioned the King and Princes of the blood, rather to keep the Decorum, than upon any loyall intent; the binding words and sum of all were such, as tied him fast only to Antigonus, omitting all reservation of duty to the King or any other. This he liked not, holding it unseemly to become a sworn man to him, with whom he had fought so long, and being assured that his voluntarie assistance, which way soever he gave, would be more acceptable, and farre more honourable, than the course propounded. Yet would he not therefore break off the negotiation, and wait for some better occasion of enlargement, which might perhaps be long in coming: but seeming to be well agreed with Antigonus, he prepared to give up his Hold and depart. As for the oath itself, when he came to take it, he made shew of dislike, in that it was not solemn enough.

enough for such personages as they were, who could not be too ceremonious in testifying their allegiance. The Macedonians which lay incamped before Nora, liked his words, and gave him leave to put in Olympias, and the children of Alexander, binding himself to them and their adherents, as well as to Antigonus, and so he departed.

Antigonus had taken upon him, as soon as he came down to the Sea-side, to remove some of the Governours of the Provinces, behaving himself according to the authority which he had received of Antipater, to exercise in the time of war. Neither did he want sufficient pretence whereby to justify his proceedings. For if Polyperchon might lawfully hold the Protectorship, which the old man dying on his death-bed bequeathed unto him, as a legacie, without consent of the Princes and Souldiers; why might not he himself as well retain the Lieutenantship of Asia, that was granted unto him for the generall good of the State, in presence of the whole Armie, by the King, and by Antipater, who had power to ordain what should seem convenient whilst he lived, not to dispose of things that should happen after his death? To give a fair colour to his ambition, this was enough: if any were not herewith satisfied, hee had threecore thousand footmen, ten thousand horse, and thirtie Elephants in a readinesse to answer them.

The first that perceived his drift, and provided to resist him, was Arideus Governor of Phrygia; who fortified the Towns of his own Province, and sought to have won Cizicus, a fair Haven Town, and seated very conveniently for him, but was faine to goe away without it. Hereupon Antigonus took occasion to command him out of the countie. Arideus was so far from obeying him, that he sent forces to relieve Eumenes. Nevertheless finding that he was unable of himself to make long resistance, he took such companies as he could draw along with him, and so passed over into Europe, to complain at the Court. The like fortune had Clitus, who ruled in Lydia, and sought the like remedy of his fortune, with some hope at the first (for both of them were entertained with very good words) which quickly vanished, and grew desperate, when they were beaten at Sea, as hath already been declared.

Antigonus pursues Eumenes. Eumenes having authority from the Court, raiseth great war against Antigonus in defence of the Royall house.

Antigonus having thus gotten into his hands all, or most of all Asia the lesse, was able to have entered Macedon, and seized upon the Court; which that he forbore to doe, it proceeded (as may seem) from some of these reasons. It would have bred as much jealousy in Cassander, as fear in Polyperchon, which might have brought them to termes of reconciliation; It would ask more time than he could spare; and the envie which followed the Protectorship was such, as he that had power enough without the office, ought rather to shun, than to pursue. Besides all this, it was manifest that Eumenes would not only refuse to take his part, but would make war upon him in defence of the Royall house, to which it was found that Antigonus did not stand well affected. Against him therefore he bent his course, and with an Armie of twenty thousand foot, and four thousand horse, made great haste toward Cilicia, hoping to suppress him before he should be able to make head.

Eumenes was one of those few that continued faithfull to their dead master, which being well known in the Court, he had commission sent unto him from thence to raise an Armie, and make war upon Antigonus, taking of the Kings treasure as much as he should need. Other letters also there were directed to all the Governours of Provinces, requiring them to give assistance to Eumenes, and be ordered by his direction: especially to the Captains of the old Souldiers, called the Argyraspides, or silver-shielded bands, commandement was given to be at his appointment. He had of his old followers gathered together two thousand foot, and five hundred horse, before this authority was given him: but now he purposed with all the strength which he could make, to fight with Antigonus in defence of the Royall blood. Olympias had written to him, desiring him to bring help to her, and her Nephew the son of Alexander; and in the meantime to give her his advice in that which Polyperchon required of her: for shee was desirous to return into Macedon, but suspected her ambition, as not contained within lawfull bounds. Eumenes therefore counselled her to remain in Epirus, till such time as he could bring the warre to a good issue; which done, he promised that his faith and care should not be wanting to the feed of Alexander.

Strange it is to consider, that in all the Empire, scarce any one could be found among the Noble-men, in whom Alexanders mother, wives, and children, might repose firm confidence, saving onely this Eumenes, a stranger to the Macedonian blood, born at Gardis, a Citie of Thrace. His reputation was no more than his own vertue had made it, his followers obeyed at their own discretion; and compelled he was to travell as farre as Persia, to gather together an Armie sufficient to resist the enemies that pursued his heels.

How the Princes of Macedon stood affected mutually. Olympias takes Aridaeus and Eurydice, whom she cruelly puts to death.

Now, forasmuch as in this present Warre all the Rulers of the Provinces did intermeddle; and great alterations happened, not onely in the parts of Asia, but Macedon it self, which brought a new face unto the State, by the extirpation of the Royall house of Philip and Alexander: I hold it convenient in this place, before we enter into the particulars of the Warre it self, to shew briefly how the great ones did mutually stand affected; and by what passions they were drawn into those courses, which over-threw most of them; and out of their ruines built the greatness of a few: as likewise to what extremity the faction brake out in Macedon it self, about the main controversie of the title to the Crown, whereupon all other quarrels were or should have been depending.

Aridaeus the King, being simple and fearfull, did onely what he was biddin. Polyperchon, desirous to continue long in Office, had a purpose to advance the son of Alexander by Romane to the Kingdome, and become Governour to a King of his own making.

Eurydice the Queen discovering plainly this intent, and meaning nothing lesse than to let her husband serve as a Stale, keeping the throne warm till another were grown old enough to sit in it, grew acquainted with Cassander, who hated the memory of Alexander, and was therefore the fitter for her turn.

Cassander held fresh in mind the danger wherein his family had been through Alexanders malice, together with the indignity offered to himself by Alexander, who knocked his head against a wall for deriding one that adored him after the Persian manner. The displeasure heresof, and the pleasure which he took in the amorous Queen, made him to resolve, both to suppress the linage which he hated, and to maintain his beloved mistresse, either by supporting her weak husband; or by taking her to be his own wife.

The rest of the Lords held it a thing indifferent who reigned over all, so as they might reign in their severall Countries, and establish their authority in such wise, that it might not be taken from them.

Among these, Ptolomy and Antigonus were well enough already, if their ambition would have suffered them to see it.

Lisbo and Selenus lying farre off, and being strong, had some good hope to encroach upon their neighbours. Against these, Pentestes, and some others, which much adoe hardly made resistance, untill such time as Eumenes came to them; who propounded to himself great matters, which he lived not to accomplish.

Olympias the old Queen (as it is common with step-dames) hated the children of her husband by his other wives. It was thought that she had given poison to Aridaeus, which failing to take away his life, had much impaired both his body and wits. Now she considering, that Eumenes was too full of business to come home so soon as she wished that he should; and that Cassander daily prevailed in Greece: thought it the best way to join with Polyperchon; & set up, as King, her Nephew Alexander, the son of Romane, removing Aridaeus before Cassander were able to defend him. To this intent she procured men among her kindred in Epirus, and so took her way towards Polyperchon, who

Eurydice hearing these news, wrote very earnestly to Cassander, praying him to set aside all other businesse, and come to succour her. She her self by entreaty, gifts, and promises, drew to her partie as many of the Macedonians as she could, untill she thought her own side strong enough; and then taking her husband with her, went boldly forth against Olympias, and the Traitor Polysperchon.

These two Queens met armed, as if the matter should have been determined by their own hands, which ended without any stroke stricken, by the revolt of those who followed Eurydice. For as soon as the Macedonians beheld Olympias; calling to mind her former Estate, and the victorious reigns of her husband and son, they refused to lift any weapon against her. Eurydice finding her self thus forsaken, fled towards Amphipolis, but was intercepted, and made prisoner with her husband.

Olympias having obtained this victory without blood, thought that all things would succeed as easily, and upon the same considerations for which they had refused to bear Arms against her, the Macedonians would not stick to maintain her, whatsoever her proceedings were. Having therefore shut up Arideus and his wife in a close room, where they could scarce turn round, she fed them through a little hole, till after a while it came in her head (for fear lest the people should have commiseration of him, that had reigned almost six years and a half) to put them to death. So she delivered Arideus to some barbarous Thracians; who took away his life by cruell torments: to Eurydice she sent a sword, a halter, and a cup of poison, willing her to choose the instrument of her own death; who praying that the like presents might one day be sent to Olympias, yeilded her neck to the halter, having spent her last curses not in vain. Nicanor the brother of Cassander, and a hundred the chief of his friends, did Olympias then choose out, all whom she commanded to be slain. His brother Iolaus that was already dead and buried, she accused of poison given to Alexander, and thereupon caused his Tomb to be thrown down, and his bones to be scattered abroad. The Macedonians wondring at this fury, began to condemn themselves, and the folly of Polysperchon, who had, quite contrary to Antipaters charge given on his death bed, called this outrageous woman to the government of the Empire.

How Cassander was revenged upon Olympias.

The great expedition of Cassander. Olympias shuts her self into Pydna, where Cassander besieged her. Acides King of Epirus, coming to succour Olympias, is forsaken, and banished by his own Subjects.

Cassander at that time lay before Tegea, in Peloponnesus; whither when all these tidings were brought to him, he never staid to take the City, nor to give order for the State of things in that Countrey, (though Alexander the son of Polysperchon were there with an Armie) but compounding with them of Tegea, he willed his associats to look to themselves as well as they could, till his return; and so in all haste he took his journey towards Macedon, carried headlong with the greedie desire of just revenge. The Aetolians had taken the Streights of Thermopylae, in favour of the Queen & Polysperchon, to hinder his passage, but he, not willing to mispend any time in dealing with them, got together as many ships as he could, great and small, with which he transported his Army into Thessaly. There he divided his companies, appointing some under Callas, a subtle Captain, to hold Polysperchon busied, who then lay incamped neer to Perbabis; with the rest he marched directly against Olympias. She, having once prevailed by the respect given to her dignity, took more care how to appear Majestically, than to make her self strong. To this end she made a solemn progresse to Pydna, a Sea-town, and well fenced, having in her company all the flower of the Countrey, especially the great Ladies, among whom was Roxane, and her young son Alexander; her to the great Alexander, by his grand-mothers designment: who during his minority kept kept his Sovereign power in her own hands. But all this pomp served to little use, against the violence of the enemy, that soon presented himself before the walls; only it fed the besieged with a vain hope of succour, that would from all parts arrive, to rescue persons of their quality. And hereof there soon appeared fair likelihood, which as soon vanished, and went away in smoke.

For Acides King of Epirus, made great haste to bring succour to Olympias his cousin, with whom Deodamia his daughter was also shut up. Nevertheless, his Subjects were nothing forward in this expedition; but finding certain passages taken in the way by Cassander's men, they called upon him to retire, & quit the enterprise. The Kings importunities urging them to proceed, and the obstinate refusal of the Army, brake out at length into such termes, that when he had raged in vain against the multitude, his authority, with which he thought to have prevailed upon them, was by them taken from him, and he compelled to forsake his Kingdom, and to wander up and down in forraign Countries a banished man, his people joyning with the enemy, against whom he had led them forth to war.

Pydna in the mean time was closed up streightly, both by Sea and Land, so that neither any could issue out of the City, nor any relief be conveyed into it, but it held out as long as any food was left, no memorable service being done there, whilst great actions were managed abroad.

†. II.

A continuation of Olympias her story. Polysperchon defeated. Extreme famine in Pydna. Olympias yeelds to Cassander.

Now, though order of time require it, that we should rehearse the doings of Eumenes & Antigonus in this place, leaving Olympias yet a while to the hour of her destiny; which grows the faster upon her, because she may discern it coming: yet that we may not be compelled to interrupt the course of our narration, by inserting her Tragedie in the midst of things not manifestly coherent with it, we will here (as elsewhere we have done, and elsewhere must) continue to an end one History, that we may not be therewith distracted, when we shall come to the relation of another. All the hope of the besieged, remaining in Polysperchon, was in like manner disappointed, as their former trust had bin, which was repoted in the succours of the Epirat. For Callas, who was sent against him, found the means to corrupt the greatest part of his Army with money, leaving him within a little while so slenderly accompanied, that he was fit for no other businesse of war, than a swift retreat. When famine had so far prevailed in the City, that the horses were killed as a precious food, many men feeding on the dead carcases of their fellows, and saw-dust being given to the Elephants for provender; some of the Souldiers obtaining the Queens leave, (who could not deny it) others, without asking leave, yeilded themselves to the enemy, and were by him gently relieved, and sent abroad into the Country. The news of the Queens affairs, dispersed by these men, did so affright her well-willers, that such as had reserved themselves to the event, came in space, and submitted them to Cassander. At length, when the mortalitie was so great in the Town, that the living were even poisoned with the noysome sent of the dead, Olympias bethought her self of stealing away by Sea in a Galley that she had; wherewith her successe was as bad as in the rest. For God had appointed this Town, by her chosen as a place of refuge, to be unto her as a house of torment, and a Jail, out of which she should not be delivered, but unto an evill death. Being therefore utterly broken with miserie, which did afflict her, and the other Ladies, unaccustomed to so wretched a kind of life, she offered composition, & with much labor hardly obtained of Cassander (who having fercht her Gally out of the Haven, accounted himself as good as master of her body) a grant of her own life. Immediately upon her apprehension, Pella, the chief City of the Kingdome, was yeilded to Cassander. Amphipolis did stand out: for Aristonous (to whom Olympias had given charge of such forces as were left abroad in the Country, taking courage from the successe of some petty services wherein he had prevailed) began to promise himself great unlikelyhoods. But Olympias, to win Cassander's favour, very earnestly required him upon his faith to her, that he should give it up. He did so; and presently after was killed by his private enemies, that were set on by Cassander, who partly hated him upon old respects, partly doubted him, as a man likely to seek innovation.

f. III.

The death of Olympias, and her conditions.

Vhen Olympias had now heard sorrowfull tidings of all her friends, she herself was called into question, & accused in an assembly of the Macedonians, for the murders (they were so stiled in her affliction, which in time of prosperity she called justice) by her committed. There was she (being not heard, nor called to speak) condemned to die. The site was commenced and prosecuted against her, by the kindred of those whom she had slain. But it was at Cassander's instigation, who (to hasten the execution) sent her word, that he would furnish her with a ship, and other necessities, to save her self by flight: which when she refused, saying, that she would plead for her self, and tell her own tale, he dissembled no longer, but sent unto her such men, as hated her most, who took away her miserable life. She was daughter, and sister, unto two Kings of Epirus, wife, and mother, unto two the mightiest Kings, of that, or many other ages; a stout Lady, and of unproveable chastity; but her ambition was boundless, her hatred unappealable, and her fury in revenge most unwomanly. Her perverse conditions made her husband seek other wives and Concubines, which caused her to hate both him, and them. She was thought privy to her husbands death; after which, very cruelly she slew his late wife Cleopatra, having first murdered one of her two children in her arms, and with a beastly fury broiled the other alive in fire, in a copper basin. For these things, her son Alexander (otherwise loving her well) forbade her to meddle in the government of Macedon. But God, more severe unto cruell Tyrants, than only to hinder them of their wils, permitted her to live, and fulfill the rest of her wickedness, (which was his justice upon the adulteries of Philip, and the oppression done by him and others,) after all which, He rewarded her malice, by returning it upon her own head.

f. IV.

Cassander celebrates the funerall of Arideus and Eurydice; and seeks to make himself King of Macedon.

After her death, Cassander gave honourable buriall to Arideus and Eurydice, among their Progenitors, Kings of Macedon. And looking further into his own possibilities of greatnesse, he married the Lady Thessalonica, whom he had taken at Pydna, being the daughter of King Philip, by another of his wives, that by her he might have some title to the Crown. For the same end he committed Roxane, and her young son to close prison, removing thereby some part of his impediment. And, the better to encrease his fame, and purchase love, built a City, called by his own name Cassandria, that soon grew to be very great and powerfull. He re-edified likewise Thebes in Greece, and restored it unto the old inhabitants, after it had lain twenty years waste, being utterly razed by Alexander. By these means, especially by the restoration of Thebes, whereunto all Greece voluntarily contributed, he grew so strong, that few remained enemies unto him; and they, with much labour, hardly could resist him. Leaving him therefore daily prevailing in Greece, we will return to them, who contended in Asia, for lesser titles, but larger Provinces, with greater forces.

CHAP. III.

Of the great Lordship which ANTIGONUS got in Asia.

f. I.

The journey of Eumenes into Persia. His wife dealing with those that joyned with him.

EUMENES, having joyned unto his company the Argyraspides, made haste into the Eastern parts, to take possession of those Countries, according to his commission, and strengthen himself against Antigonus. He took his journey through Celofryia and Phoenicia, hoping to reclaim those Provinces, usurped with the rest of Syria (as hath been shewed) by Ptolomy, to the Kings obedience. But to effect this, his haste of his passing forward was too great, his Army too little, and the tenderness of the people, to stur their due obedience, none at all. Besides all which impediments, one inconvenience troubled him in all his proceedings, making them the lesse effectuall. The Captains of the Argyraspides were so forward, that they scorned to report to him, and take his directions; and their fidelity was so unsteady, that he might more easily have dealt with open stalkers. It was not expedient, that he, being General, should weaken his authority, by touching them; rather lay it in his power to keep them in order by opposition. Therefore he feigned that Alexander had appointed unto him, in a dream, a place for their meeting, namely, in a high pavilion, wherein an emptie throne was placed, as if Alexander himself had been present, to receive their consultations. Thus he freed himself from their vaill prides, but of their faith he could have no assurance. Yet when Pytho requested them, and Antigonus bribed them to forsake him, they continued (though not without considering of the matter) to take his part. So he marched on, landing before him the Kings warrant; which Pytho and Seleucus refused to obey; not as rejecting the Kings authority, but excepting the person of Eumenes, as a man condemned to die by the Macedonian Army, for the death of Craterus. Eumenes, knowing well that he was not to rely upon their assistance, who stood otherwise affected than his affairs required, and were not to be dealt with by persuasion, sought passage by strong hand through the Country of Bithyon, in such wise that Seleucus, having in vain assaid to hinder him, by opening the fluxes of Euphrates, was glad at length to grant him friendly way, as desirous to be rid of him. Thus he came to Percespes and the rest of the Eastern Lords, who were glad of his company, because of the differences between Pytho, Seleucus, and themselves. Yet the contention about superiority grew very hot among them, every one finding matter enough to feed his own humour of self-worthinesse. But the former device of assembling in one pavilion, made all quiet, the conclusion ever being sure to follow that which Eumenes propounded, who was both wisest in giving advice, and best able to reward, by means of the authority given him, to take what he pleased of the Kings treasures. By these means he won to himself many of those, who had most power to doe good or hurt.

f. II.

How Antigonus, coming to set upon Eumenes, was driven off with loss.

ANTIGONUS, hearing that Eumenes lay in the Province of Susa, had an earnest desire to follow him, and drive him further from the Kings treasures, which were kept there. To which end, as soon as he had made himself strong enough, he removed out of Mesopotamia, where he had wintered; and taking to him Pytho and Seleucus, with their men, he marched directly against the enemies, with intent to give them battell. Eumenes had fortified the Castle of Susa, and was retired back toward Persia, keeping the River of Tigris between him and his pursuers. The passages of the River were well guarded, and good espiall kept upon Antigonus, to observe which way he took:

Before he came to Tigris it self, he was to passe over Coprates, a great River, and not foordable, which he fought to doe by small vessels, whercof he had no great store. A great part of his Army had gotten over, when Eumenes, who kept a bridge upon Tigris, came with a thousand horse, and four thousand foot, to see their demeanour: and finding them out of order, charged them, brake them, and drave them headlong back into Coprates, wherein most of them were drowned; very few escaping with life, except four thousand that yielded themselves prisoners in sight of Antigonus, that was not able to relieve them. This losse made Antigonus glad to fall off; and the heat of that Countre in the dog-dayes, breeding diseases in his Army, by which many perished, caused him to remove as farre as into Media. So he took Pytho with him; (leaving Selencus to besiege the Castle of Susa) and seeking to go the neereest way, passed through savage Nations, that continually vexing him with skirmishes, slew great numbers of the men; before he could arrive in Media, with his troups that were quite heart-broken.

§. III.

Of Eumenes his cunning. A battell between him and Antigonus.

After his departure, Eumenes with his associates fell into consultation; about the remainder of their businesse. Fain he would have had them to enter upon those Provinces, vvch Antigonus had left behind him; to vvch also the Captains of the Argyraspides or Silver-shields, were very inclinable, as desiring to draw neerer to Greece. But Pencestes; and the rest, whose dominions lay in the high Countries, had more care of their own particular Estates, and would needs march Eastward. They carried it, for the Army was not strong enough to divide it self into parts.

When they came into Persia, Pencestes, ruling there, feasted them royally, and sought by all means to win the Souldiers love to himself. Eumenes perceiving whereunto those doings tended, suffered him a while to keep good cheer, till the time of war drew neer. Then did he feign an Epistle, directed, as from Orontes Governor of Armenia, to Pencestes himself: The purport whereof was, that Olympus had vanquished Cassander, and left over a great Army under Polyperchon, to joyn with Eumenes. These newes, as they filled the Camp with vain joy, so they wrought in all mens minds a great willingness to obey Eumenes, by whom was the likeliest appearance of their preferment; wherein they dealt wisely, hee being farre the most sufficient Commander, as they found soon after. For when Antigonus, comming out of Media, drew neer unto them, Eumenes by some mischance was fallen sick, and fain to be carried in a Litter; the Army marched in very bad array, and was likely to have been forced to take battell in that disorder. But Eumenes, when the rest of the Captains were amazed, was carried about the Army in his Litter, and upon the sudden did cast his men into so good form, that Antigonus, perceiving him a far off, could not refrain from giving him deserved commendations. Yet he did not cease to promise great rewards to the Captains, and all sorts of men, if they would forsake Eumenes: which hopes deceiving him, he came to the triall of a battell. Eumenes had more Elephants than Antigonus; otherwise, he was inferiour in number both of horse and foot by a third part. The battell was fought with variable successe, and great losse on both sides, continuing a great part of the day, and of the night following. Yet the victory was uncertain. For Eumenes could not force his men to lye farre from their carriages; by which means Antigonus (who had a more absolute command over his) incamping on the ground whereon they fought, had in his power the dead bodies, which was accounted the sign of victory; for he buried his own, and gave leave to his enemies craving it, to do the like. But a greater sign of victory had Eumenes. For he abode still in the same place, and not only buried his men very honourably, at great leisure, but held the Countre round about; whereas Antigonus was glad (having tarried but one day) to steal away by night, and return into Media, from whence he came.

§. IV.

§. IV.

Of divers stratagems practised by Antigonus, and Eumenes, one against the other.

Thus did the Warre continue doubtfull; and was protracted to a greater length, each part having stout Souldiers, and skilfull Generalls: but the side which had hitherto prevailed, being hindered by the equal authority of many, from pursuing all advantages to the best, Antigonus grew daily weaker, in men and reputation, so that to repair himself he could find no way safer, than to put all to adventure. He knew that his enemies lay in their wintering places, quartered far asunder, so that if hee could suddenly come among them, he was likely to put them in great distresse. Between him and them, the way was not long, being only nine daies journey, but very bad, through a rough drie wildetnesse, hardly passable. Another way, fairer and leading through a Country well peopled, but requiring 25. daies journey, he forsook, partly for the length, partly and chiefly because he would come undiscovered. So therefore taking his journey in the dead of winter, he forbade unto his men, the use of fire by night, because he would not have them deferred a farre off. This commandment had been well observed four or five daies, when continuance of time (as commonly) breeding negligence, and the cold weather pinching them, they were bold to cherish themselves, being neer to their waies end. The light of these fires gave notice of their commings, which being reported to Pencestes, and other Captains, they were so astonished with the sudden danger, that in all haste they betook themselves to flight. But Eumenes, meeting with the newes, began to hearken his affrighted companions, promising to make Antigonus march leisurely, and willing them to abide, and draw up their men together. They could scarce believe him; yet they were content to be ruled, and did as he appointed, who failed not in making his word good. He took with him some companies of the readiest men, where with hee occupied certain tops of mountains, looking toward the Camp of Antigonus: there he chose a convenient ground to incamp upon, and made great store of fires in sundry places, as if the whole Armie had been present. This was a sorrowfull spectacle to Antigonus, who thought himself prevented of his purpose, and began to fear lest he should be compelled to fight, whilst his men were tired with a long and painful journey. Therefore he resolved to turn aside, and take the way to such places, as might better serve to refresh his Army. This he did with great care and circumspection, at the first, as knowing how ready Eumenes would be upon all advantages. But after a while, considering that no enemy stirred about him, he began to pause, and think in himself, that somewhat or other was not fallen out according to his opinion. To be the better informed in the matter, he caused some Inhabitants of that desert to be taken, and brought before him; of whom hee learned, that they had seen no other Army than his thereabout, but onely a few men that kept fires on the hill tops. It vexed him exceedingly to find that hee had been so deluded. Therefore he went against these troups with great fury, meaning to take sharp vengeance on them, for having so deceived him. But by this time, sufficient strength was arrived there, which could not be forced without much businesse, and long stay. All the Army was come, save only Eudamus, Captain of the Elephants, who, besides those beasts, had no more than four hundred horsemen in his company. Antigonus hearing of this supply comming to his enemies, sent above two thousand horse, and all his light-armed foot-men, to cut it off by the way. Eudamus being fallen into this danger; was faine to place his Elephants round about his carriages, and so to defend himself as well as hee could; for his horsemen, overlaid with multitudes, were quickly broken, and driven to run away upon the spur. Neither knew they, who fate upon the Elephants, which way to turn them; for on all sides they received wounds, and were not able to requite them with the like. In this extremity, there appeared brave troups of horse and foot, that came unexpected to the rescue; and charging the assailants upon the back, drave them to seek their own safety by speedy flight. These were sent by Eumenes; who though he knew not what his adversary meant to do, yet he knew very well what was fittest for him to doe: and therefore, playing both games himself, provided the remedy.

The conspiracy of Peucestes and others, against Eumenes his life.

BY these means Eumenes wonne great honour, and was by the whole Army acknowledged a most expert Generall, and well worthy of the chief command. But Peucestes, and the other Captains, guilty of their own much insufficiency, were so transported with envie, that they could no longer contain their vile thoughts, but held communication, as upon a necessary point, how they might find means to murder him.

Surely, it is great injustice to impute the mischief contrived against worthy men, to their own proud carriage, or some other ill deserving: For, though to often happen, that small vices do serve to counterpoise great virtues; (the sense of evil being more quick and lasting than of good) yet he shall bewray a very foolish malice, that, wanting other testimonie, will think it a part of wisdom, to find good reason of the evils done to vertuous men, which oftentimes have no other cause than vertue itself. Eumenes, among many excellent qualities, was noted to be of singular courtesie; of a very sweet conversation among his friends, and carefull by all gentle means to win their love, that seemed to bear him any secret ill affection. It was his meere vertue that overthrew him; which even they that fought his life acknowledged. For they concluded that he should not be slain, before the battell were fought with Antigonus, wherein they confessed that it stood best with their safety, to be governed by his direction. Of this reason he was quickly advertised by Eudamus, to whom he had done many pleasures, and by some others of whom he used to borrow money when he needed not, to the end that they should be carefull of his good, for fear of losing their own. Considering therefore, and discoursing with himself of the villany intended against him, he made his last Will, and burnt all his Writings that contained any matter of secret: which done, he revolved many things in his mind; being doubtful what course he were best to follow. All the Nobles of the Empire stood ill affected to the Royall blood, excepting those which were with him, that were more in number than in worth. How things at that time stood in Macedon and Greece, either he knew not, or, knowing the truth, knew nothing that might encourage him to seek their help, that needed his. To make his own peace with Antigonus, had been against his faith to Olympius, and the Princes, that had committed this great power into his hands. For which cause also it may be thought, that he forbore either to lose the battell willingly, or to flee into Cappadacia, and make shift for himself among his old friends. At length he resolved to do his best against the common enemy, and afterwards to look to himself as well as he might.

S. VI.

The last battell between Antigonus and Eumenes.

THE Souldiers, especially those old bands of the Silver-shields, finding Eumenes perplexed, and not knowing the cause, entreated him not to doubt of the victory, but onely to bring them into the field, and set them in array; for the rest, they alone would take sufficient order. The like alacritie was generally found in the common Souldiers faces; but the chief Commanders were so mischievously bent against him, that they could not endure to think of being beholding to him for the victory. Yet he ordered the battell so well, that, without their own great fault, they could hardly fail of getting the upper hand.

Before the Armies came to joyning, a horse-man from the side of Eumenes, proclaimed with a loud voice unto the followers of Antigonus, That their wickedness in fighting against their own Fathers, would now be punished, as it well deserved. This was not spoken in vain. For the Silver-shields were men of threescore or seventy yeers old, and strengthened more by continuall exercise, than decayed by age, and excelling in courage, as having passed through greater dangers, than any like to be presented in that fight.

Therefore Antigonus his men (who had often been beaten by them, and were now to trye their last hope with these resolute warriors, the most Ancient and best regarded of all all Alexanders Souldiers) grew very pensive, and advanced heavily, suspecting their own cause, and fearing that the threatnings uttered would prove true.

Antigonus was now again far the stronger in horse, which gave him cause of great hope; the ground, on which they were to fight, being a plain levelled field. Placing therefore himself and his son Demetrius in the right wing, and committing the left wing to Python, he did set forward courageously against the Enemies, that were ready to give him a sharp entertainment.

Eumenes took unto him Peucestes, with the rest of the Lords, and stood in the left wing of his battail, in the face of Antigonus; meaning both to prevent the Traitors, his Companions, of all means to make head against him on the sudden; and (withall) to give proof of his own valour, which perhaps he should no more doe, in the face of all his Enemies. In the right wing, opposite unto Python, he bestowed the weakest of his horse and Elephants, under one Philip, an honest man, and (which was enough at such a time) obedient: commanding him to protract the fight, and make a reasonable retreat, expecting the event of the other side.

So they joyned very fiercely; Antigonus, labouring to make himself master of all; Eumenes, to die an honourable death, or to win such a victory upon his open enemies, as might give him leisure and opportunity to deal with his false friends.

The footmen of Antigonus, being even in their own opinions, far inferior to those whom they must encounter, were at the first brunt presently defeated by the Silver-shields, who slew above five thousand of them, losing of their own not one man. But in Horse, Eumenes was so over-matched, that he could not repell Antigonus, who pressed him very hard, but was faine to stand wholly upon defence. Yet his courage wrought so well by example, among his followers, that the Enemy could not win one foot of ground upon him, untill such time as Peucestes, with one thousand five hundred Horse, withdrew himself out of the battell, leaving his companions fighting to defend his back.

Then did Eumenes desperately rush amongst his Enemies, labouring to break open the way unto Antigonus himself. And though he fasted of his purpose, yet with great slaughter he did so beat upon them which came in his way, that the victory hung long time in suspense, uncertain which way to incline.

The ground whereon they fought, being of a slight sandie mould, through the trampling of horses, men, and Elephants, did cast up such a cloud of dust as hindered the prospect, so that no man could see what was done a little from him; Antigonus finding this advantage, dispatched away some companies of horse, that passed undiscovered beyond Eumenes his battails, and came to his carriages, which lay about half a mile from the place of fight, slenderly guarded; (For that the whole body of the Army lay between them and danger) and therefore easily taken. Had Peucestes retired himself no further than unto the carriages, he might not onely have defended them, but peradventure have surprised those which came to surprise them, and so have done as good a piece of service as a better man. But he was gotten somewhat further, to a place, where out of danger he might expect the event; and Eumenes was so over-laboured both in body and mind, that he could not possibly give an eye to every place, being not well able to continue where he was.

It happened so, that the Elephants meeting together, those of Antigonus had the better hand; whereupon Eumenes, finding himself every way over-charged, began to give back, and withdrew himself and his companies in good order, to the other side of the battail, where Philip (as he was directed) had by fighting and retiring together, kept that wing from losse. The Antigonians had felt so much of Eumenes that day, that they were well content to let him depart quietly, and wished not to see him come again, as faine he would have done.

The losse of the carriages was reported unto him, as soon as he had any leisure to hear how things went: whereupon he presently ordered his men for a fresh charge, and sent for Peucestes that was not far off, requesting him to bring in his men, and renew the fight, whereby he trusted, not only to recover their own goods, but to enrich themselves with the spoils of the enemies. Peucestes not onely refused to joyn with him, but immediately withdrew himself into a safer place, where he might be further from such dangerous temptations.

By this the night grew on; and both Armies, wearied with fighting, were desirous to return into their Camps. Yet Antigonus conceived hope of doing somewhat more, and therefore taking half his horsemen, he waited upon Eumenes a part of his way homeward, but found no opportunity to offend him: the other half he committed to Python, willing him to see upon the Silver-shields in their retreat, which yet he forbore to do, because it appeared too full of danger. So the battail ended; wherein Antigonus had not so much the better in horse, as the worse in foot: but the spoil which he got, by surprising his enemies' carriages, made amends for all his other losses.

How Eumenes was betrayed to Antigonus, and slain.

Eumenes, coming into his Camp, and finding the Silver-shields extremely discontented with their misfortune, began to cheer them up, and put them in hope of recovering all with advantage. For their brave demeanour that day had so crushed the enemy, that he had no power left, wherewith to abide them in open field, and was much lesse able to draw their Carts after him, through that great wilderness, over the high mountains.

But these persuasions availed nothing. Peucestes was gone, the other Captains would needs return into the high Countries; and the Souldiers had no desire either to fight, or to fight, but only to recover their goods. Wherefore Antigonus, one of the two Captains of the Silver-shields, (who had in former times readily consented unto traitorous motions, in hope of gain, but was lured by his partner Antigenes) finding, as he thought, a fit occasion of making himself great, and winning the love of those bands, dealt secretly with Antigonus, requesting him to restore unto those old Souldiers their goods, which he had taken, being the only reward of their services, in the wars of Philip and Alexander.

Antigonus, as a subtle man, knew very well, that they which requested more than they had reason to expect, would also with little entreatie, perform a great deal more than they promised; and therefore he lovingly entertained the messengers, filling them with hopes of far greater matter than they desired, if they would put Eumenes into his hands, by whom they were seduced to make war against him. This answer pleased them so well, that they forthwith devised how to deliver him alive. Wherefore coming about him, as at other times, to do their duties, and pretending more joy of their victory, than sorrow of their loss, which they said they would redeem by another fight; in the midst of this goodly talk, they leapt upon him, caught hold of his sword, and bound him fast. So they haled him away, and stopping their ears against all persuasions, would not yeeld so far, as to loosen one of his hands, and let him kill himself, but brought him alive (that was their own Generall, under whom they had obtained many victories) as it had been in triumph, into the Camp of their enemies.

The presse of men, running out of the Camp to see him, was so great, that Antigonus was faine to send a guard of horse-men and Elephants, to keep him from being smothered; whom he could not suddenly resolve, either to kill or save. Very few there were that sued for his life, but of these, Demetrius, the son of Antigonus was one; the rest were desirous to be rid of him quickly; thinking belike, that if he were saved, he would soon be the chief in reputation, for his great ability. So after long deliberation, Antigonus concluded that it was the safest way to put him to death; which intending to have done by famine (perhaps because he would keep it a while in his own power, to reverse the sentence, as desiring, if it might be, to have him live his friend) haste of other business made him do it by the sword.

To this end came all the travails of that worthy Generall Eumenes, who had with great wisdom, fidelity, and patience, laboured in vain to uphold the family which God had purposed to cast down. He is reckoned among the notable examples of Fortunes mutability, but more notable was his government of himself, in all her changes. Adversity never lessened his courage, nor prosperity his circumspection. But all his virtue, industry, and wit, were cast away, in leading an Army, without full power, to keep it in due obedience. Therefore it was not ill answered by Gaspard de Coligny, Admirall of France in our daies, to one that foretold his death, which ensued soon after in the same sacre of Paris; That rather than to lead again an Army of Voluntaries, he would die a thousand times.

Antigonus himself gave to the body of Eumenes honourable Funerall; and rewarded the Treason, wrought against him, with deserved vengeance. One chief Captain of the Silver-shields he burnt alive; many of the other Captains he slew; and to the whole multitude of the Silver-shields, that had betrayed so worthy a Commander, he appointed a Leader that should carry them into far Countries, under pretence of wars; but with a privie charge, to consume them all, as perjured wretches, letting none of them return alive unto his friends and kindred, or so much as once behold the Seas that beat upon the shores of Greece and Macedon.

How Antigonus slew Python, and occupied Media. How he removed Governours of Provinces, and made himself Lord of Persia, carrying away Peucestes.

The two Armies being joyned thus in one, were carried into Media, where they spent the rest of the Winter: the common Souldier idly; the principall men intently bent unto the business ensuing. Python began to consider his own deservings; for the whole war had been chiefly maintained by the strength and riches of his Province. Besides, he thought himself as good a man as Antigonus; unless it were in the Souldiers opinion, which he judged easie to be purchased with gifts, and therefore spared not to assay them with great liberality. But in following this course he was driven by necessity to trust many, of whom he stumbled upon some, that were unsecret, and others, bearing him no sincere affection. Thus was his purpose discovered to Antigonus, who (nothing like to Python) dissembled his indignation, and rebuked the informers, as breeders of dissention between him, and his honourable friend, unto whom he meant to commit the Government of all those Countries: his own business calling him into the lower Asia. These reports, coming daily to his ears, did finely delude Python. By his greatnesse with Alexander, his authority in that Province where they lay, whereof he was Governour, and the love of the Souldiers which he had bought with money; he was strong enough to maintain, even an offensive war. But what need had he to use the sword, when he was likely without contention, to obtain more than his own asking? Therefore he came as soon as he was sent for, to take his farewell of Antigonus, and to divide the Provinces with him, that meant nothing lesse than to yeeld to any such division. As soon as he came, he was taken, and accused; condemned to die, and slain out of hand. For Antigonus, having begun with Eumenes his ancient friend, was not afterward restrained by any consideration of old acquaintance, from cutting down indifferently all that stood in his way: but swam carelessly through the blood, where in at the first he doubtfully waded.

When this business was ended, he appointed a new Governour in Media, to order the Province, and a Captain, to suppress all commotions: thinking belike, that the power and authority, so divided, would hardly agree in one against him, from whom both were derived.

After this he marched into Persia, where he was entertained as absolute Lord of Asia. There began he to shew how well he understood his own mightinesse. For he placed and displaced at his own pleasure, Governours in all Provinces, leaving none in Office, that were not his own creatures, except such as lay too far off to bee dislodged easily.

Peucestes, who ruled in Persia, thought with good cheer to redeem old offences, but was deceived, having to doe with one that could not be taken with such baits: hee was carried away, and feasted with goodly words of promise, that never after took effect. Thus he, that envied the virtue of his friend, was driven to flatter (in vain) the fortune of his enemy, after which he led a most contemptible life, till he died obscurely and forgotten.

How Seleucus was chased out of Babylon by Antigonus. The great riches of Antigonus.

Seleucus was the next in this visitation; one that had from time to time continued in the same tenor of good will to Antigonus, and now gave proof of his hearty affection toward him, by making the Captain of the Castle of Susa to meet him on the way, rendering unto him that strong Peece, and all the treasures therein bestowed. This offer was so great, that Antigonus (though having in his hands the Keeper of the place) could hardly beleieve it, but used him with excessive kindnesse, for fear so good a mood should change. In that Castle he found all the treasures of Alexander, with the Jewels of the Persian Kings, which, added to his former store of money made up 35 thousand talents. Having all this, he might well account himself a happy man, if riches were sufficient to happinesse. But large dominion was the mark at which he aimed; therefore he proceeded, with intent to leave no Country behind his back, that should not acknowledge him for Sovereign Lord. Comming to Babylon, he was entertained by Seleucus with all possible demonstration of love, and honoured with presents becomming the Majesty of a King. All this he accepted with great gravity, as being due to him; and began to require an account of the revenues of that Province. This demand Seleucus held unreasonable, saying, That it was not deedfull for him to render unto any man an account of that Province, which was given unto him, in respect of his many good services to the State. But whether he spake reason or no, it sufficed, that Antigonus was powerfull; who urged him daily to come to a reckoning. Manifest it was, that neither want of money, nor any other necessity, moved Antigonus to presse him thus, but onely the desire to pick matter of quarrell against him, whereof it was likely that he should find such issue, as Pytho and Pencestus had done. Therefore taking with him only fifty horse, he conveyed himself away, and fled into Ptolomies Dominions; desiring him to prove him from such a man as went about to oppresse all, that in former times had been his betters, or at least his equalls. Antigonus was glad of his flight, for now all those Countries were yielded unto him without battail, whereas to fight with Seleucus for them, he wanted all pretence, and to kill him it was not his desire, having received many benefits of him, and those not intermixed, as commonly it happens, with any injuries. Yet it is reported, that the Chaldeans brought a strange Prophecie to Antigonus, bidding him look well to himself, and know, that if Seleucus did escape his hands, he should recover Babylon, yea, win all Asia, and kill Antigonus in battail. Easie beleivers may give credit to this tale. Had it been true, methinks, Antigonus rather should have hanged those Chaldeans, for giving him no warning till it was too late, than sent pursuers (as they say that he did) after him, whom the destinies preserved for so great purposes. When he had settled things at Babylon, he took his journey into Cilicia, where he wintered. There he took up ten thousand talents more of the Kings treasures, and casting his accounts, found his yearly in-come to amount unto eleven thousand Talents.

CHAP. V.

Of the great War between ALEXANDERS Captains, and how they asserted the name and state of Kings.

S. I.

The combination of Ptolomy, Cassander, and others against Antigonus: Their demands, and his answer.

His great riches, and the rest of his power, made Antigonus dreaded, envied, and suspected, whereby he quickly was embarked in a new War: Ptolome, Cassander, and Lysimachus, had privily combined themselves together, intending to hinder his further growth, and bring him to more reason than of his own accord he seemed like to yeeld unto. Of their practices he had some notice; the good good entertainment given unto Seleucus, giving him sufficient cause of mistrust. Therefore he sent Embassadors to them severally, entreating them to continue firm in their love toward him; that would be ready to requite them with the like. The cold answers which they made, occasioned his hasty preparation against the most forward of them, which was Ptolomy, it being likely that a good Army should prevail more than a fair message. Therefore, as soon as the season of the year would permit, he took the way toward Syria, & was encountered by Embassage from them all. These told him, that their Lords did much rejoyce at his victory, obtained against Eumenes their common enemy, and the honour that he had thereby gotten. In which war, forasmuch as they being his Confederates, must have endured great losse, with hazard of their whole Estates, if the contrary faction had prevailed; they held it very just, that all should be partakers in the fruits of that voyage, wherein they had been all adventurers. Wherefore they desired him, that making between them all an equall division of the treasures that were in his hands, (a thing easie to be done) he would also take some convenient order for enlarging their Dominions, according to the rate of his new purchases. This might best be to everyones liking, if he would make over Cappadocia, with Lycia, to Cassander; and Phrygia, bordering upon the Hellespont, to Lysimachus; for whereas his own Dominions were so much extended Eastward by his late victory, he might well spare some of those Western Provinces, to those that were seated in the West. As for Ptolomy, he would not crave any new addition, but rest contented within his own Territories. Provided alwaies, that Seleucus their common friend, and partner in the late warre, might be restored to his own, out of which he had been driven so injuriously, that all of them were forced to take it deeply to heart; requiring amends, with his friendly consent unto their demands, which otherwise they must labour to obtain with armed hands.

Antigonus knew, that after many losses received, hee should yet be able to redeem peace whensoever he listed, with these, or perhaps with easier conditions. Neither was hee so weak, to give away quietly any part of his strength into the hands of such bad friends, for fear only, lest it should be taken from him perforce. Rather he hoped that he should be able to find them work, more than enough to defend their own. Therefore he roundly answered the Embassadors, that it was no part of his meaning to communicate with other men the profit of that victory, which he alone without other mens help had obtained. Though indeed they had already sufficiently gained by him, if they could see it, having by his means kept their governments, whereof they were like to be dispossessed by Polisperchon, and the councill of estate in Macedon. But what marvell was it, if they considered not how he had saved them, seeing one of them had forgotten the same, when comming to him as a fugitive, and begging succour, he was by his meer bounty relieved, and enabled to get all that he now held? Cassander did not (said he) in those dayes command me to surrender Provinces, and give him his equall share of my treasures; but (for his Fathers sake) desired me to pity him, and help him against his enemies; which I did, by lending him an army, and Fleet, on confidence whereof hee now presumes to threaten me. As for Seleucus, how can he complain of wrong, that durst not stay to plead his right? I did use him well; but his conscience told him that he had deserved ill: else he would not have fled. Let them that so curiously search into my doings, consider well their own, which some of them can hardly justify. I am now in the way to Syria, meaning to examine Ptolomies proceedings, and after him to deal with others, if they continue to provoke me.

The preparation and beginnings of the Wars.

Vhen the Embassadors were dismissed, with this answer, nothing was thought upon but Warre. Antigonus perceiving that he should be invaded from Europe, as soon as he was entred into Syria, left his Nephew Ptolomy to guard the Sea-coast, and hinder Cassander from landing in Asia: giving him also charge, to drive out of Cappadocia some that were already sent over to molest him. Likewise he dispatched Messengers into Greece and Cyprus, not unfurnished of money; to draw friends to his side, and raise up troubles to his enemies. Especially, he laboured to make himself the strongest by Sea; to which purpose he rather hastened, than forewore his journey into Syria, that he might get possession of Mount Libanus, which afforded many excellent commodities for building of a Navie. Therefore, having erected Beacons, & laid post-horses throughout all Asia, to give swift advertisement of all occurrences, he invaded Syria, that was not held against him by any power sufficient to maintain the field.

Ptolomy lay in Egypt, the strength and heart of his Dominion, where he was beloved and honoured of the people as their naturall Lord: his other Provinces he kept with a few Garrisons, better serving to contain the people within obedience, than to confront a forreign enemy. So Antigonus took many Cities and Places of that Country, and began to set great numbers of Artificers on work in making ships, which was one of his most earnest cares. In these businesses he consumed a year and three moneths, not idly. For hee took Foppe, and Gaza, which were yielded unto his discretion, and well used. The strong City of Tyrus held out long, but was compelled in the end by famine, to render it self upon composition, that Ptolomies Souldiers might depart with their Arms, which was permitted.

Ptolomy was not asleep, whilest these things were in doing, though he kept himself within the bounds of Egypt, as indeed it behooved him to doe. His forces were not able to stand against Antigonus in plain field, but likely they were to increase, which made him willing to protract the time. Nevertheless by Sea (where his enemy was as yet unready) he sent his Fleet into all quarters, whereof Seleucus had the chief command.

Seleucus passed with an hundred sail along the coast of Syria, in the full view of Antigonus, and his Army, to their no little discomfort. He landed in Cyprus, which was then governed by many petty Lords; of whom the greatest adhered to Ptolomy, the rest were by the Factors of Antigonus, bought for him with gold, but now redeemed by the Egyptian with sharp steel.

The same commodity of aid by Sea encouraged the Prefident of Caria (called also Cassander, but not the son of Antipater, howsoever by the painfull and learned writer Reinerus Reineccius, he is, by some oversight, counted for the same) to declare for Ptolomy and his Confederates, and busily employ in their quarrell all his forces, which he had hitherto kept in good neutrality, and thereby enjoyed rest; but now he threw himself into dangerous war, choosing rather to undergoe trouble at hand, than to fall under certain ruine, though somewhat further distant, which would have overwhelmed him, if Antigonus had beaten all the rest.

5. III.

How each party sought to win the assistance of Greece. Antigonus his declaration against Cassander. Alexander the son of Polysperchon revolteth from Antigonus who had set him up.

IN the mean season all care possible was taken on both sides, to assure unto them the people of Greece, whose aid, which way soever inclined, was of great importance. Herein at the first, Antigonus sped so well by large effusion of his treasure, that he drew to him the Lacedaemonians, and other Peloponnesians, of whom he waged eight thousand, and caused Polysperchon (who had a good while made hard shifts) to rowse himself again, and taking upon him the title of Captain of Peloponnesus, to make head against Cassander.

These hopefull beginnings encouraged him to proceed further in the same kind. Wherefore to make Cassander the more odious, he called together both his own Souldiers, and all the Greeks and Macedonians that were to be found thereabouts. To these he declared, that Cassander had very cruelly slain Olympias, mother to the great Alexander, and not herewith contented, had shut up in close prison the poor Lady Roxane, Alexanders wife, and his sonne begotten on her body. That all this proceeded from a desire to make himself King over the Macedonians; which well appeared by his enforcing the Lady Theffalonica, Daughter to King Philip, a match unfit for a man of no greater parentage than he, to joyn with him in marriage. That in meer despight of those dead Princes, Philip and Alexander, he had planted the Olynthians, rooted out by Philip, in a new City by him built, and called by his own name Cassandria; and had re-edified the City of Thebes, which for the great treason of the Inhabitants, was levelled with the ground by by the victorious hand of Alexander. For these reasons he required them to make a decree, that Cassander should restore to absolute liberty the Lady Roxane, and her son; and should yeeld obedience to the Lord Lieutenant Generall of the Empire, (by which name Antigonus himself was understood) or else should be reputed a Traitor, and open Enemy to the State. Furthermore he propounded, that all the Cities of Greece should be restored into freedom: this hee did, not because he was carefull of their good, but for the need which he had of their assistance.

These things being decreed, Antigonus was perswaded, that not onely the Greeks would adhere unto him, as to their loving Patron, and fall off from Cassander; but that the rulers of Provinces, who had hitherto suspected him as a man regardfull of nothing but his own benefit, would correct their opinion, and think him the most faithfull of all others to the Royall blood. But concerning his loyalty to the young Prince, the world was too wise to be deceived with vain shews. His undertaking for the liberty of the Greeks was more effectuell, and got easie belief, in regard of his present hatred to Cassander. Yet herein also Ptolomy strove to be as earnest as he, making the like decree, in hope to win to himself that valiant Nation, which afforded men far more serviceable in war, than were to be found in any Province of the Empire.

And this indeed was the point at which both sides aimed. Wherein Antigonus thinking to make all sure, deceived himself, not without great cost. For he gave to Alexander the son of Polysperchon five hundred talents, willing him to set the war on foot in Peloponnesus, whereby it might appear, that on his side was meant nothing else, than what was openly pretended.

In Peloponnesus, Cassanders men had with much blood-shed, grievously afflicted the contrary faction, and he himself perceiving, that they were more easily spoiled as enemies, than retained as friends, thought it the best way to make what use he could of them, that were not long like to continue his. Finally, perceiving that Alexander came furnished with plenty of gold, wherewith he was able, not onely to win the doubtful, but to corrupt such as might seem best assured; he thought it a part of wisdom, to surrender upon fair conditions, that which he could not assure himself to hold any long time by force. Therefore he sent one to deal with Alexander about the matters in controversy, telling him, that Antigonus was very skilfull in setting men together by the ears, not caring who prevailed, but only desiring to have them weary themselves, whilest he was busied elsewhere; that so at length he might find opportunity to set upon the stronger. If therefore Alexander were so wise, as to keep in his purse the five hundred talents which he had, and without stroke stricken, to receive the whole Lordship of Peloponnesus, it should be freely put into his hands by Cassander; Provided, that he should from thenceforth renounce all confederacy made with Antigonus, and enter into a sure and faithfull league with Ptolomy, Cassander, and the rest of the Confederates. Otherwise he might well perswade himself, that the Country which his Father could not keep, when he was indeed the Lieutenant of the Empire, should not in haste be won by him, that was onely the Factor of a proud injurious man, so stiling himself, but not acknowledged by others.

Alexander had lived a while with Antigonus since the begining of these wars; among whos followers it was not hard to discover the intent, (which he did not carry very secret) of making himself absolute Lord of all. Therefore he was soon entreated to accept so good an offer, and did not stick to enter into that league, whereby he was to become a free Lord, and subject unto no mans controll.

Howbeit, this his honour continued not long, ere he lost both it and his life together, by treason of the Sicyonians, who thinking thereby to have made themselves free, were soon after vanquished in battail by Cratesipolis, Alexanders wife, a discreet and valiant Lady. She in revenge of her husbands death, crucified thirty of the Citizens taken in fight, and having by severity taught them obedience, did afterwards continue her Army in good order, and governed those places that she held, with the commendation of her Subjects and Neighbours.

The Aetolians rise against Cassander in favour of Antigonus, and are beaten. A sea and land-army of Antigonus utterly defeated by Ptolemies Lieutenant. In what termes the war stood at this time. Antigonus draws nearer to Greece.

Antigonus, when he found, that with so much money he had only bought an enemy, began to raise troubles to Cassander and his other adversaries in Greece, by stirring up the Aetolians against them: Likewise he laboured to win to his party the hands in the Greek Seas, by whose assistance he might be the better able to do with Ptolemy, that greatly prevailed by reason of his strong Fleet. But neither of these attempts had the success which he expected. The Aetolians, a factious Nation, and always envying the greatness of their Neighbours, were often in commotion, but so, that commonly their gains equalled not their losses. Cassander won some of their own Country, fortified the Aetolians against them, and compelled Glaucias, King of the Thyrans, whom he vanquished in battail, to forsake their side, and bind himself to bear arms against Cassander's friends.

On the other side, as many petty hands were drawn to joyn with Antigonus: so the Fleet of the Rhodians under Theodatus, who was Admirall to Antigonus, passing along the coast of Asia towards Cyprus, with an Army under conduct of Perillus marching on the shore for mutuall assistance, was quite overthrow by Ptolemies Navie. Polyctimus, who in Ptolemies behalf had been sent into Peloponnesus against Alexander, finding no need of his service in that Country, because Alexander was come over to their side, returned homewards, and by the way heard of the course which these Antigoniens held, whom he very cunningly surpris'd. He rode with his Fleet behind a Cape, which the enemies were to double, his Land forces he placed in ambush, wherinto Perillus falling was taken prisoner, with many of his men, and many were slain making little resistance. Theodatus the Admirall perceiving this, made all haste to help his fellows that were on Land, but whilst he with all his Fleet were intentive onely to that business, Polyctimus appeared at their backs, who as soon as he perceived their disorder, hastened about the Cape, and charging them behind, suffered not one of them to escape him. These ill tidings caused Antigonus to deal with Ptolemy about some composition. First, he sent Embassadors, afterwards they met in person. But Antigonus would not yeeld unto the demands of Ptolemy: so the parley was vain.

Hitherto each party seemed to have indifferently sped in the war, and thereby to have equal cause of hope and fear. This late victory, with the good success of his affairs in Cyprus, did seem to make amends to Ptolemy for his losses in Syria. Likewise the revolt of Alexander from Antigonus did equal the confederacy made between the Aetolians and him, as also those petty skirmishes, that had been in Asia the lesse, to Antigonus his advantage, were sufficiently recompensed by others of like regard, but adverse to him, and by the troubles brought upon his estates in those parts by the two Cassanders.

Contrariwise, Antigonus valued the losse of his men, mony, and ships, no otherwise than as the paring of his nails, that were left long enough, and would easily grow again, but the enlargement of his Territory by addition of Syria, he prized at a higher rate, as if thereby he had fed upon a limb of Ptolemy his enemy, and strengthened the body of his own Empire. Concerning other accidents, whereof the good were hitherto sufficient to counterpoize the bad, he meant to proceed as occasion should direct, which commonly is not long wanting to them, that want no mony.

That which most molested him, was the attempts of his enemies upon Asia the lesse, wherein though as yet they had gotten little, yet had he cause to fear, lest the people, being tied unto him by no bond of allegiance, might upon small occasion revolt from him, to men of as honourable reputation as he himself. To prevent this, and to be nearer to Greece, he held it expedient for him to be there in person, where his affairs did seem to prosper the worse, by reason of his absence. Therefore he left part of his Army in Syria under his son Demetrius, to whom, being then but two and twenty yeers old, he appointed many ancient Captains as assistants, or rather as Directors: the rest he carried with him into Phrygia, where he meant to winter.

How Lyfimachus and Cassander vanquished some enemies, raised against them by Antigonus. The good success of Antigonus in Asia and Greece: with the rebellion of many Cities against Cassander.

The coming of Antigonus into those parts, wrought a great alteration in the procelle of his business thereabouts. For his enemies had short leisure to think upon molesting him in Asia; they themselves were held over hardly to their own work on Europe side. Scuthes a King of the Aetolians, joyning with some Towns that rebelled against Lyfimachus, brought also the bordering Scythians into the quarrell. All these relied upon Antigonus, who was to help them with mony and other aid. The Aetolians likewise took courage, and rose against Cassander, having excitedly reported to the Kingdome of Epirus, their assistance. But Lyfimachus gave unto his Rebels no time to confirm themselves. He suddenly presented himself before two of the Cities that had rebelled, and compelled them by fear to return unto their former duty. He fought a battell with the Scythians, and wilde Thracians, and drave them out of the Country. Finally, hee overcame Scuthes, and following the heat of his victory, slew Pausanias in battell, whom Antigonus had sent over with an Armie; and all his men he did either put to ranome, or fill up with them his own Bands. The like success had Philip, Cassanders Lieutenant, against the Aetolians. For hee wasted their Countrey, fought with the Epirotes, that came to help them: and after the victory, fought again with their forces, joyned in one, overthrowing them, and killing Eacides, the unfortunate King. Finally, he drave the Aetolians out of most of their Country, and forced them to seek their safety among the wilde Mountains. Of the Epirotes, hee sent as prisoners to Cassander, the principall authors of the Kings restitution, and of the present War.

Yet these actions required some time, and wearied Antigonus, his adventures with painfull travell, after which they remained onely favours. Antigonus himself at first leisure wan all Caria the whilest, and sent Armies into Peloponnesus, and other parts of Greece, bestowing liberty upon all the Cities hee took out of Cassanders hands. The whole Country of Peloponnesus (excepting Sicyon and Corinth) with the Isle of Euboea, and many places of the firm Land, were by those means won to be his in true and vehement affection, ready to doe or suffer any thing for him that had made so evident a demonstration of his readinesse, to give them the liberty indeed, which others had promised in idle words. Many States desirous of the same benefit, would faine have shewed their good will; but they were kept in by Cassanders Garrisons, who was too wise to trust them loose. Therefore Antigonus made shew as if hee would passe over into Macedonia: by which terrour he forced Cassander to repair thither in all haste, with the best of his strength, leaving many good Towns of Greece so weakly guarded, that well they might take courage to help themselves; if any foreign succour appeared. The aid which they desired was not long wanting. The Lieutenant of Antigonus, taking the advantage of Cassanders departure, entred the Country, drave his Garrisons out of divers Cities, forced the Governour of Athens to enter into league with their Lord, wanne the Castell of Thebes, and set the people at liberty. This last action was somewhat remarkable. For Thebes had not long before been raised out of her old ruines by the meer power of Cassander; of which act hee was accused by Antigonus, as if it had been some heinous crime. Yet now the same Antigonus winneth the City, and the love of the Inhabitants, onely by expelling him that was their Founder. So much are men readier to thank the Increaser, than the Author of their good; and rather to look forward upon those hopes, which vainly they extend beyond all measure, than backward upon their miserable nullity, that held them incapable of being any thing.

Victories of Ptolomy by Sea. A great battell at Gaza, which Ptolomy and Seleucus won, against Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus.

AS the presence or negligence of Antigonus gave life to his affairs in the lower Asia and Greece, so the designs of his enemies, taking advantage of his absence, ruined the very foundations of those great works in the Eastern parts, where with in the year preceding he had over-topped them. The Isle of Cyprus, whose Princes wavered between contrary affections, inclining one while to Antigonus, another while faintly regarding their covenant with Ptolomy, was visited by an Egyptian Fleet, wherewith Ptolomy, in his own person easily reduced them to a more settled order, putting some to death, carrying others away prisoners, and leaving a Lieutenant of his own appointment, Governour of the whole Country. With the same Fleet he ran along the Sea-coasts, wasting a great part of Caria and Cilicia, with the spoiles of which he enriched his followers, and returned laden to Cyprus. Demetrius the son of Antigonus, hearing frequent reports of the miseries, wherewith his Fathers subjects were oppressed, made all haste out of Syria to the rescue, taking only his Horses and light-armed Foot with him, because the businesse required expedition. But in vain did hee tire himself and his followers, in hasty seeking of one, that by lanching out into the deep, could in a few minutes delude the labour of so many dayes, if need had so required. Answerable to the vanity of this expedition was the successe. For Ptolomy was gone, before Demetrius came into Cilicia. Neither was it certain, whether having lightned his ships of their burthen in Cyprus, hee would return upon those maritime Countries, or make towards Syria, where his coming was expected. He was indeed gone into Egypt, and there with Seleucus was describing a Royall Army, which he levied with all convenient speed, for the recovery of Syria. This was more than Demetrius knew. Therefore he was faine to choose out of uncertainties the most likelihood, and return the way that he came, with all his companies, which were fitter for service in the open field, than to be bestowed in Garrisons among the Cilicians. Hee had scarce refreshed his men and Horses in Syria, when the newes arrived of Ptolomy's coming with a puissant Army, to give him battell. Hereupon he called to counsell his principall friends, who advised him to give way to the time, and expect some better opportunity in the future, being a young man, and weakly furnished with means to resist such ancient and famous Generalls, as Ptolomy and Seleucus. This counsell seemed rather to proceed from the cold temper of those aged men that gave it, than from any necessity growing out of the present businesse. For Demetrius considering himself to be the son of Antigonus, and now Generall of his Fathers Army, thought his own title weightie enough to be laid in ballance against the bare names of those two great Commanders. Neither found hee much reason that should move him to distrust his forces, as insufficient. His men were better exercised than the enemies, and promised as much as could be required. Therefore perswading himself, that such oddes of number, and of great fame, would rather serve to adorn his victory, than hinder him in obtaining it, he resolved to put the matter to triall, without expecting the advantage of more help. So animating his Souldiers with hope of spoil and rewards, hee abode the coming of the Enemies at Gaza, with purpose to encounter them, as soon as they had finished their wearisome journey over the Desarts of Arabia. Ptolomy and Seleucus issuing out of so rich a Province as Egypt, came so well provided of all necessities, that their Army felt not any great grievance of the evill way, when battell was presented them, which confidently they undertook. In all things else they had the ods of Demetrius; of Elephants they were utterly unprovided. But how to deal with those beasts they were not ignorant. They had prepared a kind of Palisado, fastened strongly together with chains, and sharpened in such a manner, that the Elephants could not seek to break upon it, without receiving much hurt. The rest of their forces (which besides that they had advantage in multitude) were heartened with many fortunate services, by them performed that year, whilst the enemies had wearied themselves, either with vain journeys, or long and dulling expectation,) they disposed in such order, as best answered to the form, wherein Demetrius was embattelled. The fight began, and was maintained with equall courage, for a long time; each part striving striving more to win honour, than to satisfie any other passion, as having little cause of hatred, or revenge. But after some continuance, the greater number holding better out, the error of Demetrius, who upon no necessity would needs fight a battell with disadvantage, began to appear by his losses. He had committed himself to Fortune, having more to lose by her than he could get: but in this fight hee was idle, and left all to be decided by strong hands, unless it may be said, that the terror brought upon his men, by the losse of his Elephants, was bad luck. Those beasts were in that kind of warre hardly to bee resisted on plain ground; and therefore at the first they made great spoil amongst Ptolomy's men. Afterward seeking to break through the Palisado, they were sorely hurt, and every one of them taken. This disaster caused the Horse-men of Demetrius to faint. They had laboured hard, and prevailed little, till now perceiving that all must lye upon their hands, who were ill able to make their own places good, they began to shrink, and many of them to provide for their safety by timely flight, which example the rest quickly followed. When Demetrius had stroven so long in vain to make his men abide, that he himself was likely to be lost; he was faine to give place to the stronger, making a violent retreat as far as to Azotus, which was about thirty miles from the place of battell. A great part of his carriages was in Gaza, whither some of his company turned aside, hoping to save such goods, as in haste they could pack up. This foolish covetousnesse was their destruction, and the losse of the Town. For whilst they forgotfull of the danger, had filled the streets with sumpter-Horses, and cloyed up the gates, thronging, some to get in and fetch, others, to carry out what they had already laden, Ptolomy's Army brake in without resistance, taking them with their goods and the City altogether.

This victory restored unto Ptolomy the best part of Syria, a Province more easie in those times to get, than to keep; and opened the way unto all the greatnesse of Seleucus. For between Gaza and Phenicia no place offered resistance. In Calosyria and Phenicia, some Towns held out a while, but were soon taken in by Ptolomy. Among these were the great Cities of Tyrus and Sidon; of which Sidon was given up by the Inhabitants; Tyrus by the Garrison, falling to mutiny against their Captain, who trusting to the strength of it, had made great vaunts, but was pardoned by Ptolomy, and honourably entertained in respect of his fidelity.

How Seleucus recovered Babylon, and made himself Lord of many Countries in the highest Asia. The Rex of the Kingdome of the Greeks, which began with the Dominion of Seleucus.

WHILE Ptolomy followed his businesse with such prosperity, Seleucus took leave of him, and went up to Babylon, to try his own fortune; which he found so favourable, that recovering first his own Province, he became at length master of the better part of Alexanders purchases.

This expedition of Seleucus was very strange, and full of unlikelihoods. His train consisted of no more than eighteen hundred foot, and two hundred horse, a number too small to have been placed as Garrison, in some one of those main great Cities, against which he carried it into the higher Asia. But little force is needfull, to make way into strong places, for him that already stands possessed of their hearts, which dwell within the walls. The name of Seleucus was enough; whom the Babylonians had found so good a Governour, that none of them would find courage to resist him; but left that work to Antigonus his own men, wishing them ill to speed. Some of the Macedonians that were in those Countries, had the like affection; others made a countenance of warre, which by easie compulsion they left off, and followed new Ensignes. This added courage to the people, who came in apace, and submitted themselves joyfully to Seleucus. In a defecti- on to generall, it was not a safe course for the Antigonians, to thrust themselves into the Towns of most importance: for every man of them should have been troubled with daily enemies in his own lodging. It remained that they should issue forth into the field, and try the matter by fight. But the treason of one principall man, who revolted to the enemy, with more than a thousand Souldiers following him, so dismayed the rest, that that they did no more than seek to make good one strong place, wherein were kept the Hostages and Prisoners; that Antigonus held for his security in those quarters. This Castle, besides that it had not fortified in times of leisure, against dangers, that were not then apparent, Seleucus quickly took it, and so got the entire possession of Mesopotamia and Babylon, both gave benefit to him, and to his Country. Seleucus had bestowed in Media and Persia, forces convenient for defence of those Provinces, that were the most of his Dominion. In the Countries about Euphrates he had not done the like: for his own great Army lay between them and all enemies. Therefore when the victory at Gaza had opened unto Seleucus the way into those parts, he found little impediment in the rest of his business. Having now gotten what he sought, he behoved him to seek how he might keep his gettings: for his own forces were too small, and his friends were ill able to lend him any more. That which his friends could not do for him, his enemies did. Nicanor, to whom Antigonus had committed his Army in Media, joining unto himself, out of Persia and other Countries, all needfull help, came with ten thousand Foot, and seven thousand Horse, either to save all from being lost, or to drive Seleucus out of that which he had won.

Against this power, Seleucus had only four hundred Horse, and somewhat above three thousand Foot, wherewith to oppose himself: his large Conquest of unwarlike Nations having yielded him many loving Subjects, but few Souldiers. Therefore when his enemies were near to the River of Tigris, he withdrew himself from the place where his resistance was expected; into certain marshes not farre off, where hee lay secretly waiting for some advantage. Nicanor thought that he had been fled, and was the less carefull in fortifying his Camp. In recompence of this vain security, his Camp was taken by surprise, the first night of his arrival, the Satrapa, or Lieutenant of Persia, together with sundry of the Captains, were slain; hee himself was driven to flee for his life into the deserts, and the whole Army yielded unto Seleucus: whose gentle demeanour, after the victory, drew all Media, Sufiana, and the Neighbour Provinces, to acknowledge him their Lord without any further stroke stricken.

This victory of Seleucus gave beginning unto the new stile, of The Kingdoms of the Greeks, an accompt much used by the Jewes, Chaldeans, Syrians, and other Nations in those parts. I will not make any long disputation about the first year of this Era. The authority of that great Astrologer Ptolomy, from which there is no appeal, makes it plain, that the five hundred and nineteenth year of Nabonassar, was the fourscore and second year of this accompt. Other inference hereupon is needlesse, than that note of the learned Gauricus, That the first of these years was reckoned compleat, at Babylon, together with the end of four hundred thirty and eight years after Nabonassar. With the observation of the Saturn, recorded by Ptolomy, agrees (as it ought) the calculation of Bunting, finding the same Planet to have been so placed in the sign of Virgo, as the Chaldeans had observed it, in the same year; which was from Nabonassar the five hundred and nineteenth, from Seleucus the fourscore & second year, and the last of the hundred thirty and seventh Olympiad. These observations of the celestiall bodies, are the surest marks of time: from which he that wilfully varies, is inexcusable. As for such occurrences in History, and the years of succeeding Princes (that are not seldome ambiguous, by reason of unremembered fractions) if they seem to be here against, it is not greatly materiall. Yet thus much is worthy of note; that these years of the Greeks were not reckoned in all Countries from one beginning; as plainly appears in the difference of one year, that is found between actions, related by the severall Authors of the two Books of the Maccabees, who follow divers accompts. He that shall adhere to the time defined by Ptolomy, may apply the other supputations thereunto, as being no farther from it, than a years distance.

How Ptolomy lost all he won in Syria. What the causes were of the quiet obedience, performed unto the Macedonians, by those that had been subject unto the Persian Empire. Of divers petty enterprizes, taken in hand by Antigonus and Demetrius, with ill success.

IN a happy hour did Seleucus adventure to goe up to Babylon, with so few men as his friend could then well spare: for had he staid longer upon hope of getting more Souldiers, Ptolomy could have spared him none at all. Demetrius the son of Antigonus, having lost the battail at Gaza, received from Ptolomy all his own goods, his Pages, and Servants, in free gift, and therewithall a courteous message, to this effect: That no personall hatred was the ground of this War, which he and his Confederates held with Antigonus; but only termes of honour, wherein they would seek to right themselves after such maner, that other friendly Offices, without reference to the quarrell, should not be forgotten.

This Noble dealing of Ptolomy, did kindle in Demetrius an earnest desire of requiting him, with some as brave liberality. Which to effect, he gathered together the remainder of his broken troupes; drew as many as could be spared, out of the Garrisons in Cilicia, or other Provinces thereabouts, and advertising his Father of his misfortune, besought him to send a new supply, wherewith he might redeem his honour lost. Antigonus upon the first news of this overthrow, had said, That the victory which Ptolomy won upon a beardless Boy, should be taken from him by bearded men: yet upon desire that his son, whom he tenderly loved, should amend his own reputation, he was content to make a stand in Phrygia. Ptolomy hearing of Demetrius his preparations, did nevertheless follow his own business in Callosyria; thinking it enough to spend part of his Army under Cilles his Lieutenant, against the remnant of those that had been already vanquished, when Cilles too much undervalued the power of such an Enemy. Hee thought that this young Gallant, having lately saved his life by flight, would now be more carefull of having a fair way at his back, than adventurous in setting further forward, than urgent reason should provoke him. In this confidence he passed on without all fear; as one that were already Master of the field, and should meet with none, that would issue out of their places of strength, to make resistance. When Demetrius was informed of this careless march; he took the lightest of his Army, and made his journey with such diligence, one whole night, that early in the morning, he came upon Cilles unexpected, and was on the suddain, without any battail, Master of his Camp: taking him alive, with his Souldiers, and their carriages all at once.

This exploit served not only to repair the credit of Demetrius, which his losse at Gaza had almost ruined: but further it enabled him, to recompence the bounty of Ptolomy, with equall favour, in restoring to him Cilles, with many other of his friends, accompanied with rich presents. But neither was Ptolomy so weakned by this losse, nor Demetrius so emboldned by his victory, that any matter of consequence thereupon ensued. For Demetrius feared the coming of Ptolomy, and therefore he fortified himself in places of advantage: Ptolomy on the other side was loth to engage himself in an enterprize, wherein he might perceive, that if the coming of Antigonus found him entangled, he should either be driven to make a shamefull retrait, or a dangerous adventure of his whole estate, in hope of not much more than already he possessed.

Antigonus, indeed, was nothing slow in his way towards Syria; whither hee made all haste, not so much to relieve his son, as to embrace him. For he rejoyced exceedingly, that the young man had so well acquitted himself, and being left to his own advice, performed the office of a good Commander. Wherefore to increase the reputation of this late victory, he brought such forces, as might serve to re-conquer all Syria: meaning, that the honour of all should be referred unto the good foundation laid by his son, whom from this time forwards, he imploied in matters of greatest importance.

Ptolomy had now lesse reason to encounter with Antigonus, than before his coming to have assailed the Camp of Demetrius. Yet he made it a matter of consultation; as if he

he had dared more than he meant. But all his Captains advised him to retire into Egypt, alleging many good arguments to that purpose: which they might well perceive to be agreeable to his own intent, by his propounding that course; not without remembrance of the good successe against Perdiccas, in the like defensive war. So he departed out of Syria, preserving his honour, as being rather led by mature deliberation, than any sudden passion of fear: and he departed at fair leisure, not onely carrying his treasures along with him, but staying to dismantle some principal Cities, that he thought most likely to trouble him in the future. All the Country that he left at his back, fell presently to Antigonus, without putting him to the trouble of winning it by pieces: so easie was it in those times, for the Captain of a strong Army, to make himself Lord of a great Province.

We may justly wonder, that these Kingdoms of Syria, Media, Babylon, and many other Nations, (which the victory of Alexander had over-run with so hasty a course, as gave him not leisure to take any good view of them) were so easily held not onely by himself, but by the Captains of his Army after him. The hot contentions for superiority between the King of Israel, and those of Damascus; between Egypt, and Babylon; Babylon and Nineve; the Persians and many Countries; argue a more manly temper, to have once been in those people; which are now so patient of a forraign yoke, that like Sheep or Oxen, they suffer themselves to be distributed, fought for, won, lost, and again recovered by contentious Masters; as if they had no title to their own heads, but were born to follow the fortune of the Macedonians. This will appear the more strange, if we shall consider, how the severall States of Greece (many of which had never possessed so large Dominion, as might cause their spirits to swell beyond their ability) did greedily embrace all occasions of liberty: and how these proud Conquerours were glad to offer it, desiring to have them rather friends than servants, for fear of further inconvenience.

It must therefore be noted, that most of these Countries had alwaies been subject unto the rule of Kings, or petty Lords, whom the Babylonians and Persians long since had rooted out, and held them in such bondage, that few of them knew any other Law, than the command of forraign Masters. This had utterly taken from them all remembrance of home-born Princes, and incorporated them into the great body of the Persian Empire: so that wanting within themselves all sovereign power, or high authority, the life and spirit of every Estate; they lay as dead, and were bereaved of motion, when that Kingdom fell, whereof they lately had been members.

Why the Persian Satrapa, or Princes of that Empire, did not when Darius was taken from them, as the Macedonian Captains, after the death of Alexander, strive to lay hold upon those Provinces, which had many ages bin subject unto them, and scarce four years in quiet possession of their enemies; or why at least they contended not (when the terrible name of that great Conquerour did cease to affright them) to get their shares among his followers, if not wholly to dispossesse them of their new purchases: it is a question wherein, who is not satisfied, may find no lesse reason to suspect the History, than authority to confirm it. For we seldome read, that any small Kingdom, prevailing against a far greater, hath made so entire a conquest, in the compass of ten years, as left unto the vanquished no hope of recovery, nor means to rebell; especially when such disorders, or rather utter confusion hath ensued, by the fury of civill war among the Victors.

The cause why the Macedonians held so quietly the Persian Empire, is well set down by Machiavell; and concerns all other Kingdoms, that are subject unto the like form of Government: the sum whereof is this; Wheresoever the Prince doth hold all his Subjects under the condition of slaves, there is the conquest easie, and soon assured: Where ancient Nobility is had in due regard, there is it hard to win all, and harder to keep that which is won. Examples of this are the Turkish Empire, and the Kingdom of France. If any invader should prevail so far upon Turkie, that the great Sultan and his Children (for Brethren he useth not to suffer alive) were taken or slain: the whole Empire would quickly bee wonne, and easly kept, without any danger of rebellion. For the Bassas, how great soever they may seem, are meer slaves; neither is there in all that large Dominion, any one man, whose personall regard could get the people to follow him in such an attempt, wherein hope of private gain should not

countervail all apparent matter of fear. Contrariwise, in France, it were not enough for him that would make a conquest, to get into his hands the King and his Children; though he further got the better part of the Country, and were by farre the strongest in the field. For, besides the Princes of the Royall blood, there are in that Kingdom store of great men, who are mighty in their severall Countries, and having certain Royalties and Principalities of their own, are able to raise Warre in all quarters of the Realm; whereunto the remembrance of their own ancient Families, and long continued Nobility, will alwayes stirre up and inflame them: so that untill every one piece were won, and every one (an endlesse work) of the chief Nobility brought under or destroyed, the victory were not compleat, nor well assured. It is true, that such power of the Nobility, doth often-times make way for an Invader; to whom the discontentments of a few can easly make a fair entrance. But such assistants are not so easly kept, as they are gotten; for they look to be satisfied at full, in all their demands; and having what they would, they soon return to their old allegiance, upon condition to keep what they have, unlesse they be daily hired with new rewards: wherein it is hard to please one man, without offending another as good as himself. The Turk, on the other side, needs not to fear any peril, that might arise from the discontented spirits of his principall men. The greatest mischief that any of them could work against him, were the betraying of some frontier Town, or the wilfull losse of a battail: which done, the Traitor hath spent his sting, and must either fly to the enemy, whereby he loseth all that hee formerly did hold; or else, in hope of doing some further harm, he must adventure to excuse himself unto his Master, who seldome forgives the Captain, that hath not strived by desperate valour against misfortune. As for making head, or arming their followers against the great Sultan, and so joyning themselves unto any Invader; it is a matter not to be doubted: for none of them have any followers or dependants at all, other than such as are subject unto them, by vertue of their Offices and Commissions. Now as this base condition of the principall men, doth leave unto them no means, whereby to oppose themselves against the flourishing estate of their Prince; so would it weaken both their power and their courage in giving him assistance, if adversity should make him stand in need of them. For there is scarce any one among the Turks Bassas, or Provinciall Governours, that knows either from whence he was brought, or from whom descended, nor any one among them, that by the losse and utter ruin of the Turkish Empire, can lose any foot of his proper inheritance; and it is the proper inheritance of the subject, which is also a Kingdom unto him, which makes him fight with an armed heart against the Conquerer, who hath no other device painted on his Ensigne, than the picture of slavery.

As in the Turkish Empire, so was the Persian, void of liberty in the Subjects, and utterly destitute of other Nobility, than such as depended upon meer favour of the Prince. Some indeed there were of the Royall blood, and others, descended from the Princes that joyined with Darius, the Son of Hystaspes, in oppressing the Magi: these were men of reputation in Persia, but their reputation consisted onely in their Pedigree, and their safety in not meddling with affaires of State, which made them little esteemed. In what small account these Persian Princes were held, it may appear by this, that the Kings Uncles, Cousin Germans, and Brethren, were called by the Kings, Their Slaves, and so did stile themselves, in speaking unto these great Monarchs. That upon every light occasion of displeasure they were handled as Slaves, it is easie to be discerned, in that example of cruelty, practised by Xerxes upon his own brother Masistes; which hath been formerly noted, in place more convenient. As for the Satrapa, or Governours of the Provinces, it is needlesse to cite examples, proving them to have been meer slaves: it may suffice, that their heads were taken from them at the Kings will; that is, at the will of those Women and Eunuchs, by whom the King was governed.

To this want of Nobility in Persia, may be added the generall want of liberty convenient among the people: a matter no lesse available, in making easie and sure the conquest of a Nation, than is the cause assigned by Machiavell. For as Afope his Assie did not care to run from the enemies, because it was not possible, that they should load him with heavier burthens, than his Master caused him daily to bear: so the Nations, that endure the worst under their own Princes, are not greatly fearfull of a forraign yoke; Nor

Nor will be hasty to shake it off, if by experience they find it more light, than was that whereunto they had been long accustomed. This was it that made the Gascoignes bear such faithfull affection to the Kings of England; for that they governed more mildly than the French: this enlarged the Venetian jurisdiction in Lombardy; for the Towns that they won, they wan out of the hands of Tyrannous oppressors: & this did cause the Macedonians; with other Nations, that had been subject unto the posterity of Alexanders followers, to serve the Romans patiently, if not willingly; for that by them they were eased of many burthens, which had been imposed upon them by their own Kings.

So that of this tameness, which we find in those that had been subjects of the Persian Kings; the reasons are apparent. Yet some of these there were, that could not so easily be contained in good order by the Macedonians: for they had not indeed been absolutely conquered by the Persian. Such were the Sogdians, Bactrians, and other Nations about the Caspian Sea. Such also were the Arabians bordering upon Syria: against whom Antigonus sent part of his Army; thinking therewith to bring them under, or rather to get a rich booty. The Captains that he sent, fell upon the Nabatheans, at such time as they were busied in a great Mart; wherein they traded with the more remote Arabians, for Mirrh, Frankincense, & other such commodities. All or most of these rich wares, together with five hundred talents of silver, and many prisoners, the Macedonians laid hold upon: for their coming was sudden & unexpected. But ere they could recover Syria, the Nabatheans overtook them; & finding them weary with long marches, made such a slaughter, that of four thousand foot, and six hundred horse, only fifty horse escaped. To revenge this losse, Demetrius was set out with a great power: yet all in vain; for he was not resisted by any Army, but by the naturall defence of a vast Wildernesse; lack of water, and of all things necessary. Therefore he was glad to make peace with them; wherein hee, lost not much honour: for they craved it, and gave him presents. Returning from the Nabatheans, he viewed the Lake Asphaltites, whence hee conceived hope of great profit that might bee raised, by gathering the Sulphure. With this good husbandry of his son, Antigonus was well pleased, and appointed mento the work: but they were slain by the Arabians, and so that hope vanished.

These petty enterprises, with the ill successe accompanying them, had much impaired the good advantage against Ptolemy: when the news of Seleucus his victories in the high Countries, marred all together. For neither was the losse of those great and wealthy Provinces, a matter to be neglected, neither was it safe to transport the warre into the parts beyond Euphrates, whereby Syria and the lower Asia should have been exposed to the danger of ill-affected Neighbourhoods. A middle course was thought the best; and Demetrius with fifteen thousand foot, and three thousand horse, was sent against Seleucus. These forces being sent away, Antigonus did nothing, and his son did lesse. For Seleucus was then in Media; his Lieutenants about Babylon withdrew themselves from necessity of fight; some places they fortified and kept; Demetrius could hold nothing that he got, without setting in Garrison more men than hee could spare, neither did he get much; and therefore was faine to set out the bravery of his expedition, by burning and spoiling the Country; which he did thereby the more alienate, and as it were acknowledge to belong unto his enemy, who thenceforth held it as his own assured.

Antigonus had laid upon his son a peremptory commandement, to return unto him at a time prefixed: reasonably thinking (as may seem) that in such an unsettled state of things, either the Warre might be ended, by the fury of the first brunt; or else it would be vain to strive against all difficulties likely to arise, where want of necessities should frustrate the valour, that by strength of time was like to become lesse terrible to the Enemy. Demetrius therefore leaving behind him five thousand foot, and a thousand horse, rather to make shew of continuing the warre, than to effect much, where himself with greater forces could do little more than nothing, forsook the enterprife, and went back to his Father.

A general peace made and broken. How all the house of Alexander was destroyed.

These ambitious heads, having thus wearied themselves with unecessuall travell, in seeking to get more than any one of them could hold; were contented at length to come to an agreement: wherein it was concluded, that each of them should hold quietly, that which at the present he had in possession. As no private hatred, but meer desire of Empire, had moved them to enter into the war; so was it no friendly reconciliation, but only a dulnesse growing upon the slow advancement of their severall hopes, that made them willing to breathe awhile, till occasion might better serve to fight again.

Besides that main point, of retaining the Provinces which every man held, there were two Articles of the peace, that gave a fair, but a false colour, to the business; That the son of Alexander by Roxane, should be made King when he came to full age; and, That all the Estates of Greece should be set at libertie. The advancement of young Alexander to his Fathers kingdom, seems to have been a matter forceably extorted from Antigonus; in whom was discovered a purpose, to made himself Lord of all. But this, indeed, more nearly touched Cassander. For in his custodie was the young Prince and his Mothers; neither did he keep them in a fort unwearable to their degree; but as close prisoners, taken in that warre, wherein they had seen the old Queen Olympias taken and murdered, that sought to put them in possession of the Empire. The mutuall hatred and fear between them, rooted in these grounds, of injuries done, and revenge expected; upon this conclusion of peace, grew up faster than any time before, in the heart of Cassander: who saw the Macedonians turn their favourable expectation, towards the son of their late renowned King.

All this either little concerned Antigonus; or tended greatly to his good. The young Prince must first have possession of Macedon: whereby Cassander should be reduced to his poor office, of Captain over a thousand men, if not left in worse case. As for them that held Provinces abroad, they might either do as they had done under Antigonus; or better, as being better acquainted with their own strength. He in the mean time, by his readiness to acknowledge the true Heir, had freed himself from that ill-favoured imputation, of seeking to make himself Lord of all that Alexander had gotten.

The like advantage had he in that Article, of restoring the Greeks to their libertie. This libertie had hitherto been the subject of much idle discourse: but it never took effect. Antigonus held scarce any Town of theirs, Cassander occupied most of the Countie; which if he should set free, he must be a poor Prince; if not, there was matter enough of quarrell against him, as against a Disturber of the common peace.

In the mean season, the Countries lying between Euphrates and the Greek seat, together with a great Armie, and money enough to entertain a greater, might serve to hold up the credit of Antigonus, and to raise his hopes as high as ever they had been.

With much disadvantage doe many men contend against one that is equall to them all in puissance. Cassander friends had left him in an ill case; but he could not doe without all: for where every one mans help is necessarie to the warre, there may any one make his own peace, but no one can stand out alone; when all the rest are wearie. The best way, that he knew all their affections: which tended to no such end as the becoming Subjects unto any man, much lesse to the son of an Asiaticke woman, of whom they had long since refused to hear mention. Therefore he took a short course, and caused both the child and his Mother to be slain: freeing thereby himself in a trice, from the dangerous necessity of yielding up his government, which he must have done, when the child had come to age. Roxane was a Lady of singular beautie, which was perhaps the cause, why Perdiccas desired to have her son; being as yet unborn, proclaimed Heir to the great Alexander. Immediately upon the death of Alexander, she had used the favours (if it were not love) of Perdiccas, to the satisfying of her own bloody malice, upon Antigonus, the Daughter of King Darius, whom Alexander had likewise married, according to the custome of those Countries, wherein pluralitie of wives is held no crime. For, having by a counterfeit Letter, in Alexander's name, gotten his poor Lady into her hands, shee did, by assistance of Perdiccas, murder her and her Sister; and threw their bodies into a Well, causing it to be filled up with earth. But now, by Gods just vengeance, were she and her son made away, in the like secret fashion; even at such time as the neerer approaching hope of a great Empire had made her life, after a wearisome imprisonment, grow dearer unto her than it was before.

The fact of Cassander was not so much detested in outward shew; as inwardly it was pleasing unto all the rest of the Princes. For now they held themselves free Lords of all that they had under them; fearing none other change of their estates, than such as might arise by chance of warre; wherein every one perswaded himself of successe, rather better than worse. Hereupon all of them (except Lysimachus and Seleucus, that had work enough at home) began to rowze themselves: as if now the time were come, for each man to improve his own stock. Antigonus his Lieutenants were busie in Peloponnesus, and about Hellepont: while their Master was carefull in following other, and some greater matters that were more secretly to be handled. He pretended the libertie of Greece: yet did the same argument minister unto Ptolomy matter of quarrell, against both him and Cassander; Ptolomie complaining (as if he had taken the matter deeply to heart) that Antigonus had put Garrisons into some Towns, which ought, in fair dealing, to be set at liberty. Under colour of redressing this enormitie, he sent an Army into Cilicia, where he won four Towns, and soon after lost them, without much labour of his own or his enemies.

After this, putting to sea with a strong Fleet, he ran along the coast of Asia, winning many places: and in that voyage allured unto him a nephew of Antigonus (a good Commander, but discontented with the ill requitall of his services) whom finding shortly, as false to himself as he had been to his own Uncle, he was faine to put to death. But in doing these things, his desire to set the Greeks at libertie, appeared not so plain, as hee wished that it should: for their case was no way bettered by his molesting Antigonus in Asia. Therefore to get the love of that valiant Nation, he made at the last an expedition into Greece it self: where having set free some little Ilands, and landed in Peloponnesus, he raised so great an expectation of finishing the long-desired work, that Cratespolis, the Widow of Alexander, Polyperchon son, gave up into his hands the Towns of Sicyon and Corinth.

Ptolomie had conceived a vain belief, that the Greeks, emboldened by his countenance and assistance, would all of them take heart and rise up in arms; whereby with little labour their libertie might be gotten, and he be acknowledged as Author of this immortal Benefit. But long servitude had well-near extinguished the ancient valour of that Nation: and their ill fortune, in many likely attempts to recover freedom, had so tired their spirits, that they would no more stir in pursute thereof, but fate idly still, as wishing it to fall into their mouths.

The Lacedamonians, about these times, began to fortifie their Town with walls, trusting no longer in their vertue (for both it, and the discipline that upheld it, were too much impaired): that had been a wall to their Town and Territorie.

The Athenians were become as humble servants, as they had been in times past insolent Masters: erecting as many Statues in honour of Demetrius Phalerens, as there were daies in the year. This Demetrius was now their Governour; and he governed them with much moderation: but in spite of their hearts, as being set over them by Cassander. By this base temper of the principall Cities, it is easie to gather, how the rest of the Country stood affected. Ptolomie could not get them to set their helping hands to their own good, and to furnish him with the promised supplies of mony and victuals. Credible it is, that he had a true meaning to deliver them from thraldome; as judging the commoditie that would arise by annexing them to his partie, a matter of more weight than the losse that Cassander should receive thereby, who could hardly retain them, if once Antigonus took the work in hand. But when he found such difficultie in the businesse, hee changed his purpose: and renewing his former friendship with Cassander, he retained Sicyon and Corinth in his own possession.

Before the coming of Ptolomie into Greece, Cassander had been held occupied with very much work. For (besides his pains taken in warres among barbarous Princes) hee found means to allure unto himself the Lieutenants of Antigonus, that were in Peloponnesus, and about Hellepont: making his own advantage of their discontentments. By the like skilfull practice hee freed himself from a greater danger, and made those murders which he had committed seeme the lesse odious, by teaching his enemies to doe the like. Old Polyperchon, that had made so great a stir in the reign of Aridaus, did after the death of Roxane and her child, enter again upon the Stage: leading in his hand another son of the great Alexander, and meaning to place him in his Fathers Throne.

The name of this young Prince was Hercules: he was begotten on Baryne the daughter of Artabazus a Persian, but had been lesse esteemed than the son of Roxane, either for that his Mother was held no better than a Concubine, or else perhaps, in regard of the favour which Perdiccas, and after him Olympias, did bear unto Roxane. At this time the death of his brother had moved such compassion and regard of his being Alexander only living child, had procured unto him such good will, that the demand which Polyperchon made in his behalf, was deemed very iust and honourable. There were indeed more hearts than hands, that joynd with this young Prince: yet wanted he not sufficient strength of hands, if the heart of him that least ought, had not been most false. Cassander had raised an Armie to withstand his entrie into Maccedon: but hee trust could he repose in that Armie, whose wishes he perceived to be with Hercules. Therefore he assailed Polyperchon himself with gifts and promises, wherewith at length he prevailed so far, that the old Villain was contented to murder his Popill, choosing rather with ready carter and foul dishonour, to take the offered Lordship of Peloponnesus, and Commander of an Armie, than to purchase a noble fame with dangerous travell, in maintaining his faith, unto both his dead and living Sovereigns.

Antigonus had not all this while bin asleep, though his losses were rather the chief witnesses, of his having been a stirrer in these commotions. He thought it enough for him at the present to retain his own: and therefore took order for the recovery of those places which Ptolomie had taken pains to win. As for the rest, it he way grieved him to see Cassander incur the generall hatred of men by committing those murders of which the profit was like to redound unto him that was the most powerful, or to see Polyperchon and Ptolomie swear in a busie war against Cassander. If they would have continued their quarrels, he could well have afforded them leisure, and have thought the time well spent in beholding their contentions. For he was thoroughly perswaded, that when the rest had wearied themselves in vain with long strife, his armies and treasures, wherein he exceeded them all, would bring all under. According to these haughtie conceits, he demeaned himself among his followers; looking big upon them, and like a King before his time. This was it that caused so many of them to revolt from him: but it was no great losse to be forsaken by those that looked with envious eyes upon that fortune whereon their own should have depended. Against this envie of his men, and the malice of others, Antigonus busily sought a remedie, such as was like to give him a goodly title to the whole Empire.

Cleopatra, Sister unto the great Alexander, lay for the most part in Sardis: whom he had a great desire to take to wife. This his desire was not without good hope: for howsoever he discovered much unwillingnesse thereunto, yet was she in his power, and might therefore be entreated, were it only for fear of being enforced. But it was not his purpose to get her by compulsive means: either because his fancy, being an old man, was not over-violent; or rather because his ambition, wherunto all his affections had reference, could have made small use of her, by doing such apparent wrong. She had been married unto Alexander King of Epirus, after whose death she came to her brother in Asia, hoping belike to find a new husband in his Camp. But neither any of those brave Captains, that were, in times following so hot in love with her, durst then aspire unto her marriage: nor did her brother, full of other cares, trouble himself with providing her of an husband. She therefore, being a lustie widow, suffered her bloud so far to prevail against her honour, that she supplied the want of an husband by entertainments of Paramours. Alexander hearing of this, turned it to a jest, saying, That she was his sister, and must be allowed this libertie, as her portion of the Empire. When by his death the Empire lay in a manner void, and the portion due to her therein grew, in mens opinion, greater than it had been: then did many seek to obtaine her, while shee her self desired only a proper man, with whom shee might lead a merry life. To this purpose did she invite Demetrius unto her, who made great haste, but was cut off by death ere he came to her presence. Now at the last, after long tarrying, rarrying, she had her choice of all the great Commanders: Antigonus, Ptolomie, Lysimachus, and Cassander, being all her earnest wooers. All these (Antigonus excepted) had wives already; Ptolomie had many wives, and many Concubines, whom he respected as much as his wives, being nored of too much dotage in that kind. This hindered not his suite: peradventure it advanced it, by giving to Cleopatra some hope of mutuall toleration. To him therefore she bequeathed her self, and was taking her journey from Sardes towards him; when Antigonus his Deputie in that Citie, made her to stay, untill his Masters further pleasure should be known. Antigonus had now a Wolf by the ears: he neither could well hold her, nor durst let her goe. She would not be his wife; he had no honest pretence to force her; and to keep her prisoner, had bin the way, by which he might have incurred a generall hatred, lasting perhaps beyond her life; as the course taken by Cassander against Roxane (a Ladie lesse respected than Alexanders own sister) did well testifie. Therefore he thought it the wisest way to procure her death: for to let any other enjoy the commodity of so fair a title to the kingdom, it was no part of his meaning. To this purpose he sent instructions to the Governour of Sardes, willing him in any case to doe it secretly. So the fact was committed, and certain women about her put in trust with the murder: which women afterwards were put to death, as malicious conspirers against the life of that good Ladie. So was Antigonus freed from blame at the least in his own opinion: but the world was lesse foolish, than to be so deceived. How the murder was detected, we need not aske: for seldom is that bloudie crime unrevealed, and never so ill smothered, as when great persons are the Authors.

Thus was the whole race of Philip and Alexander the great extinguished, and it was extinguished by the hands of such as thought upon nothing less than the execution of Gods justice, due unto the cruelty of these powerful, but mercilesse Princes. Wherefore the ambitious frames, erected by these Tyrants, upon so wicked foundations of iniquity and bloud, were soon after cast down, over-whelming themselves or their children, with the ruins, as the sequell will declare.

How Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, gave libertie to Athens, expelling the Garrison³ of Cassander out of those parts. The immoderate honour decreed by the Athenians to Antigonus and Demetrius.

NOne being left alive that had any title to the Kingdome; it stood with good reason, that they which were Lords of the Provinces, acknowledging no Superiour, should freely professe themselves Kings in name, as they were already in substance. Yet had this name ill-beseemed the weaker, while the strongest of all did for bear it: neither seemed it convenient in the judgment of Antigonus, to crown his last action with such a title, as if he had attained unto greatnesse by that foul murder: the infamie whereof he was carefull how to discharge from his own head. He purposed therefore to undertake a plausible enterprise, even the libertie of Greece: whereby it was apparent, that he might get such honour as would not only drown all bad reports, but make him be thought equal to any name of royaltie, whereof in seeming modestie, he was not covetous. To this purpose he delivered a strong army, with a Navie of two hundred and fiftie sail, and five thousand talents of silver, unto Demetrius his son: willing him to begin at Athens, and thence to proceed, in setting all the Countrey free.

Demetrius came to Athens before he was expected: so that without resistance he entered the Haven; it being thought that a fleet of Ptolomie, Cassander's good friend, had bin arrived. But when it was known, both who he was, and what was the cause of his coming; the joy of the Citizens brake out into loud acclamations: Demetrius Phalerus forsook the town, and withdrew himself to Thebes under safe conduct; only the Garrison in Munychia strove to make good that piece, which after a while was won upon them by force. During the siege of Munychia, Demetrius went to Megara; whence he expelled the Garrison of Cassander, and so restored the Citie to libertie.

I think it not impertinent, sometimes to relate such accidents, as may seem no better than meer trifles: for even by trifles are the qualities of great Persons as well disclosed disclosed, as by their great actions; because in matters of importance, they commonly strain themselves, to the observance of generally commended rules, in lesser things they follow the course of their own Nature. Thus the Lady of Arphax lay in pain, and had a great desire to see Demetrius shopping, Belike, that he might by this means better her estate, and recover her Towns of Sycion and Corinth, detained by Psalmies, to whose garrison in those places, Demetrius before his departure out of Greece, offered most for the surrender of the himself, as the only business of the Queen was to see: He being advertised herofore by his friends in the Country of Arphax, and taking a company of his lightest armed, for guard of his person, made a long journey to meet with her: First, Demetrius sought her out a great way from his Town, that none might see her when she came: And closely as she disguised was varied: Some of his friends had gotten show her of it, whereby she perceived good hope, that the only hope of recovery it was then might have showed all the great preparations of Arphax, and bring him to a victorious assault, by taking the same prisoners: Their project fell void, that there was no effect. For they came so suddenly upon him, that he had no better shift, than to make himself in the cloak, and creep away disguised, leaving them to sack his Tent. There was in this Prince a strange medley of conditions, especially an extreme discontent in his pleasures, and a painful industry in matter of Warre. He was of most suitable countenance, a gentle nature, and a good will, excellent in learning, English, or Warre, and curious in working them with his own hands. He knew better how to reason his bad fortune, than how to rule his good. For adversity made him a more industrious; prosperity puffd him with over-weening, wherein he thought that he might do what he listed. His fortune was changeable, as were his qualities, turning often round like the wheel of her wheel, till she had wound up the thread of his life. In his younger years, he was beloved by all, and beloved by all, and all loved him, and all loved him.

Reminding to his Camp, and Inflaming his business at Mecca, he resolved no longer to attend the issue of a Siege, to assault Jerusalem by force, that so he might recover again the liberty of Athen; which, until it was fully wrought out, he refused to enter into. The Citie Jerusalem was strongly fortified: yet by continuance of the assault, the multitude without, through help of their Engines that scoured the walls, prevailed upon the resolution of those that lay within it, and won the place in two dayes. The walls, and all the devices of that place against the Citie, were levelled with the ground, and so was it freely put into the Citizens hands, to whom withall was given their liberty, with promise to Athen in maintaining it.

The fame of this action was louder than of any other victory gained by Demetrius, with greater skill and industry. For the Athenians, having forgotten how to employ their hands, laboured to make up that defect with their tongues; converting to base flattery, that eloquence of theirs which the virtues of their Ancestors had suited unto more manly arguments.

they decreed unto Antigonius and Demetrius the name of Kings; they consecrated the place in which Demetrius leaped from his Chariot, when he entered their City, and built there an Altar, calling it of Demetrius the Alighter; they called them by the names of the god their Saviour, ordaining that every year, there should be choſen a Priest, of theſe gods; and further, that ſuch as were employed by their State, in dealing with either of theſe two Princes, ſhould not be called Embaſſadours, but Theoroi, or Conſultors with the gods; like as were they, whom they ſent unto the Oracle of Jupiter or Apollo.

It was a frivolous diligence to rehearse all their flatteries, these being so gross. For-by they not only corrupted the young Prince, but made that acclamation, which best would have pleased the old man, to be of no use. For he could not handsomely take up on him the name of King, as imposed by the Athenians, unless he would seem to approve their vanity, in loading him with more than humane honours. Yet was he so tickled with this their fine handling him, that when their Theoroi or Consulters came shortly after, desiring him to relieve them with Corn and Timber to build ships, he gave them about a hundred thousand quarters of wheat, and maise sufficient to make a hundred Galles. So gracious was his first Oracle; or rather so weak is great power in resisting the assaults of flattery.

XI.

The great victory of Demetrius against Ptolemie in Cyprus. How Antigonus and Demetrius took upon them the stile of Kings; wherein others followed their example.

From this glorious work, Antigonus called away Demetrius, unto a business of more greater importance, meaning to employ his service against Ptolemie, in Cyprus. Before his departure out of Greece, he was willed to establish a generall Council, that should treat of matters concerning the common good of the Countie. About the time, Antigonus withdrew his own Garrison out of Imbros, committing their liberty into the peoples hands; whereby it might appear, that as he would not permit any other to oppress the Greeks, so would he be farre from doing it himselfe. This was enough to hold his reputation high, among these new purchased Friends; in follow, that hee should convert his forces, to the winning of ground upon his Enemies.

A sad full Tragedie had lately hapned in Cyprus, through the indifferetion of Menelaus, Nicocles brother, and his Lieutenant in that Isle. Nicocles King of Paphos, was entred into some practice with Antigonus: yet not so far that he thought himself past execution, by which confidence, he was perhaps the more easily deceived. To cut off this execution, and the fall-hearted King of Paphos at one blow, Menelaus was sent thither, who surrounding Nicocles his house with Souldiers, required in Ptolemies name, to have him executed to the death. Nicocles offered to clear himself, but Menelaus told him, that hee he must, and had him come forth quietly. This desperate necessitie caused the unhappy King to rid himself of life: and his death strook such an impression into his wife, that she not onely flew her self, but perswaded the wives of her husbands brethren to do the like. Also those brethren of Nicocles, unto whom Ptolemie had intended no ill, being amazed with the suddenness of this calamitie, did shut up the Palace, and setting it on fire, consumed it, with all that was in it, and themselves together.

Whatsoever the crime objected was, Nicocles perished as a man innocent, because he was not suffered to make his answer. Of this sad accident, though Menelaus deserved the blame, for his rigorous proceeding; yet it is to be thought, that much dislike fell also upon Ptolemie: as men that are grieved, cast an ill affection even upon those that gave the furthest removed occasion.

Nor long after this, Demetrius came into Cyprus, with a power sufficient, against any opposition that Ptolemie was like to make. The Cypriots did little or nothing against him, either because they had small strength, or for that they held it a matter indifferent, whom they acknowledged as their Lord, being sure that they should not themselves have the rule of their own Countie. Menelaus therefore, out of his Garrisons, drew forth an Armie, and fought with Demetrius. But he was beaten, and driven to save himself within the walls of Salamis, where he was so hardly besieged, that without strong succour, he had no likelihood to make good the place, much lesse to retain possession of the whole Island. His greatest help at the present was the fidelitie of his Souldiers; whom no rewards could win from him, nor good usage (when any of them were taken prisoners, and inrolled in the enemies bands) keep from returning to him, with the first opportunitie. Most of them were Mercenaries: but all their goods were in Egypt, which was enough to keep them faithfull. Yet could not this their resolution have stood long against the odds of number, which Demetrius had of men as resolute, and against his terrible Engines of batterie, if Ptolemie had not hastied to the rescue.

Ptolemie brought with him a hundred and forty Gallies, besides two hundred ships of burden, for transporting his Armie and Carriages. This Fleet made a terrible shew, when it was descried a farre, though more than half of it was unfit for service in fight at Sea. Wherefore to make the opinion of his forces the more dreadful, Ptolemie sent unto Demetrius a threatening message: willing him to be gone, unless he would be overwhelmed with multitudes, and trampled to death in a throng. But this young gallant repaid him with words of as much braverie, promising to let him escape, upon condition, that he should withdraw his Garrisons out of Syden and Corinth.

Demetrius had no more than one hundred and eighteen Gallies; but they were, for the most part, greater than those of Ptolemie, better stored with weapons fit for that service;

vice, and very well furnished with Engines in the prows, to beat upon the enemy. Nevertheless he stood in great doubt of threefold gallies, that lay in the Haven of Salamis, lest Menelaus with them should get upon his back: in which case, it was very likely, that all would goe very ill with him. Against this mischief, he bestowed ten of his own Gallies in the mouth of that Haven, to keep Menelaus from issuing forth, and setting his footmen on the shore, to give what assistance they could, be with the rest of the Fleet, to sea against Ptolemie.

The fight began early in the morning, and continued long, with doubtfull successe. The generals were not ranged opposite one to the other, but held each of them the left wing of his own fleet. Each of them prevailed against the Squadron where with he encountered, but the successe of Demetrius was to better purpose. For his victory in one part was such, as caused others to fall out of order, and finally drove all to take themselves unto speedy flight. As for Ptolemie, he was faine to leave his advantage upon the enemy in one part of the fight, that he might relieve and animate those of his own, which needed him in another; wherein he found his losse over great to be repaired, by continuing any longer against the fortune of that day; and therefore he laboured onely to save himself, in hope of better event, that might follow some other time.

There fell out in this battell, no unusual accident; yet was the victory greater than could have been expected. The occasions whereof were, partly the great skill in Sea-fencing, which the Greeks and Phenicians, that were with Demetrius, had, above those which followed Ptolemie: partly the good furniture of the Ships, wherein consisted no less, than in the qualitye of those with whom they were manned. Further, we may reasonably judge, that the two hundred ships of burthen, carrying the strength of Ptolemies Army, did not more encourage his own men, and terrifie his enemies the day before the fight, than breed in each part the contrarie affections, when in the beginning of the fight they fell off, and stood aloof. For though it were fitting that they should so doe; yet a multitude, prepossessed with vain conceits, will commonly apprehend very slight occasions to think themselves abandoned. Besides all this, the expectation that Menelaus, issuing with his fleet out of Salamis, should charge the enemies in stern, was utterly frustrated. He was kept in perforce, by the ten ships appointed to bar up the mouth of the Haven; which they manfully performed, as great necessity required.

Such disappointment of expectation doth much abate the courage of men in fight; especially of the assailants: whereas on the contrary, they that find some part of their fears vain, doe easily gather hopefull spirits, and conceive an opinion of their own ability, to doe more than they thought upon, out of their not suffering the harm that they had imagined.

Whatsoever the causes of this victorie were, the fruit was very great. For Ptolemie had no more than eight Gallies that accompanied him in his flight: all the rest of his fleet was either taken or sunk. Neither did Menelaus any longer strive against the violence of fortune; but yeelded up all that he held in Cyprus, together with his Armie, consisting of twelve thousand foot, and a thousand and two hundred horse, and those Gallies in the Haven of Salamis. The same dejection of spirit was found in the common Souldier, as well that was taken at Sea, as that had served the Egyptian by Land; none of them relying any more confidence in Ptolemie, but willingly becoming followers of a new Lord, whose Armie they now increased.

It was generally believed, that much more depended on the event of this fight, than the life of Cyprus, for which they contended. Wherefore the common expectation was great; especially Antigonus, whom it most concerned, was deeply perplexed with cares, thinking every day a year, till he were advertised of the issue. In this mood Aristodemus found him, a noble flatterer, whom Demetrius had honoured with the Message of these good newes. Aristodemus had bethought himself of a trick, whereby to double the welcome of his joyfull errand: Hee caused his ships to ride at Anchor, a good distance from the shore; he himself landed in a Cock-boat, which he sent immediately back to the ship; and so all alone he went forward, looking very sadly, that no part of his tidings might appear in his countenance. Report of his arrivall (for it was not known where he had been) came presently to Antigonus, who sent Messenger after Messenger to meet him on the way, and bring speedy word how all went. But neither any answer, nor so much of a look, as might intimate the purport of his errand, could be won from this de mure the Tree it self with the more facility. To effect which, he resolved (leaving the great ones to grow awhile) to root up the Dependants of his Enemies: Dependants, whom the fore-named Confederates should be forc't either to relieve, or to lose; and hereby he doubted not to draw them into the field, where the advantage of power, and of all other warlike provision promised him victory.

At this time the Citty of Rhodes was very mighty, being well governed, and having long held it self in good Neutrality; it drew the better part of all the trade of those parts, and therein a great deal of riches to it self; to maintain which, and to increase it, it kept on the Seas a Fleet of well armed Ships, by which it not only beat off all Pyrates and petty Thieves, but the reputation of their strength was thereby so much increased, as all the neighbour Princes sought their alliance and confederacy.

In this so dangerous a time (in which they must either refuse all that sought them, and so stand friendless and apart; or joyn themselves to some one, and thereby forgoe the peace, by which their greatness had grown) their affections carried them to the Egyptians, both because the greatest part of their trade lay that way, as also for that Antigon was his disposition, greatness, and neighbourhood was fearfull unto them. This affection of theirs, with some other passages more apparent, gave argument of quarrel to Antigon, who began to declaim himself against them by petty injuries, of taking some of their ships, with such other grievances; while he made a more weighty preparation, to pursue the War against them openly and strongly. All things soon after ordered according to the greatness of the enterprise, he employed his Son Demetrius against them in their own Island, who brought such terror upon the Citizens, that laying aside all respect of friendship and honour, they offered him their assistance and service against whomsoever Demetrius, who knew from whence this change came, and that the alteration was persuaded by fear, and not by love, raised his demands to an intolerable height, requiring a hundred Hostages to be delivered him, and liberty to lodge in their Port as many ships of War as himself pleased. These conditions more properly to be imposed upon a State already conquered, than on those who as yet had heard of nothing but a continued assistance, restored unto the Rhodesians their lost courage, so made them resolve to defend their liberty to the last man: this taught them to enfranchise all their able bond-men, and wisely rather to make them their fellow-Citizens, than to make themselves fellow-slaves with them.

Demetrius having refused the fair conditions offered (as the Rhodesians the fearfull ones propounded unto them) makes preparation for a long siege, and finding no appearance to carry the place in force, he set in hand with his Engines of battery, in the invention and use of which, he did never shew himself a greater Artisan, than in this War. But in conclusion, after the Citizens had sustained all the assaults given them for a whole year, after many brave sallies out of the Town, and the famine which they endured within the Town, which had proved far more extreme, if Ptolomy had not with many hazzards relieved them, Demetrius by mediation of the Grecian Embassadors, gave over the siege; a hundred hostages they gave him for performance of the peace made, but with exception of all the Magistrates and Officers of the Citty.

Hereunto Demetrius was brought by the usual policie of War, and state: for while with the flower of all his fathers forces he lay before Rhodes, Cassander recovered many of those places in Greece, which Demetrius had formerly taken from him; neither did Cassander make the War as in former times, by practice and surprise, but by a strong and well compounded army, which he himself led as far as into Attica, and therewith greatly distressed and endangered Athens it self. On the other side (though, with less success) did Polyperchon invade Peloponnesus: These dangerous undertakings upon Greece, advised the Athenians and Atolians to dispatch their Embassadors towards Demetrius, and advised Demetrius rather to abandon the enterprise of Rhodes, than to abandon the great honour which he had formerly gotten by setting all Greece at liberty.

Demetrius was no sooner out of the Island, than that the Rhodesians erected statues in honour of Lyfismachus and Cassander, but for Ptolomy, whom they most affected, and from whom they received their most relief, they consulted with the Oracle of Jupiter, whether it were not lawfull to call him a god. The Priests which attended in the Temple of Hamm, gave the same fair answer for Ptolomy, which they had formerly done for Alexander his his Master; for as Alexander consulted the Oracle with an Army at his heels, so was Ptolomy at this time Lord of the soil: and yet was this a far more cleanly creation than that done by the Athenians, who deified Antigon and Demetrius by decree of the people. A mad age it was, when so many of Alexander's Captains could not content themselves with the stile of Kings, but that they would needs be called gods.

S. III.

How Demetrius prevailed in Greece. Cassander desires peace of Antigon, and cannot obtain it. Great preparations of War against Antigon.

Demetrius coming with a strong Fleet and Armie into Greece, quickly drove Cassander out of Attica, and pursuing his fortune, chased him beyond the straits of Thermopylae. Herein his reputation did much avail him; which was so great, that six thousand of his enemies Souldiers revolted unto him. So, partly by the greatness of his name, partly by force, he recovered in short space all that Cassander held in those straits, and giving libertie unto the people, he bestowed upon the Athenians those peeces, which had been fortified against them, to block them up. Then went hee into Peloponnesus, where hee found the like, or more easie successe: for he suddenly took Argos, Corinth, Sicyon, and the most of the Country, bestowing liberty upon such as needed it. The Town of Sicyon he translated by consent of the Citizens, from the old seat into another place, and called it after his own name, Demetrius. This done, he betook himself to his pleasure. At the Isthman games, hee caused himself to be proclaimed Captain Generall of Greece, as Philip and Alexander had been in former times: whereupon (as if he were now become as great as Alexander) he despised all others, making it a matter of jest, that any, save himself or his father, should usurp the Name of King. But in his behaviour hee was so farre unlike to a King, that in all the time of his leaseure, he deserved none other name than of a drunken Palliard. Yet were the Athenians as ready as ever to devise new honours for him: among which they made one Decree, That whatsoever King Demetrius should command, ought to be held sacred with the gods, and just with men.

All Greece being now at the disposition of Antigon, Cassander stood in great fear, lest the war should fall heavily upon him in Macedon: which to avoyd; he knew no better way than to make peace with his enemies betimes. And to that purpose he sent Embassadors; but had no better answer from Antigon, than that he should submit his whole estate to his discretion. This proud demand made him look about him, and labour hard in solliciting his friends, both to assist him, and take heed to themselves; neither found he them slow in apprehending the common danger: for Lyfismachus knew that if once Cassander had lost Macedon, Demetrius would soon be Master of Thrace. Neither were Pesolomie and Scelencus ignorant of that which was like to befall them, if Antigon were suffered to put himself in quiet possession of those Provinces in Europe. Wherefore it was agreed, that with joynt forces they should all together set upon the common enemy.

Hereof Antigon had notice: but scorned all their preparations, saying, That he would as easily scatter them, as a flock of birds are driven away with a stone. With these conceits he pleased himself, and no way hindred the proceedings of his Enemy. He lay at that time in his Town of Antigonia (a name that it must shortly lose) where he was carefully providing to set out some stately game and Pageants, in ostentation of his glory. But higher was brought unto him the tumultuous newes of Lyfismachus his victories about the Hellefpoint. For Cassander had committed unto Lyfismachus part of his forces, wherewith to passe over into Asia, while he himself with the rest should oppose Demetrius on Europe side. So Lyfismachus passing the Hellefpoint, began to make hot War upon the subjects of Antigon; getting some of the Cities in those parts, to joyn with him by fair means: winning others by force, and wasting the Country round about.

To repress this unexpected boldnesse, Antigon made hasty journies, and came soon enough to recover his losses, but not strong enough to drive Lyfismachus home, or compell him to come to battell. Lyfismachus waited for the coming of Scelencus; keeping ping himself the whilest from necessity of fighting. But Babylon was far off; and Seleucus his preparations were too great to be soon in a readinesse. The Winter also did hinder his journey: which enforced them on both sides to rest in some quiet, without performing any matter of importance. This delay of debating the quarrell in open field, held all those Nations in a great suspense, and bred much expectation. Yet might all have come to nothing, had not Antigonus been so forward, that he refused to yeeld upon any peaceable conditions. At length Seleucus drew neer with a mighty Army of his own (for he had gathered strength in that long time of leaseure, which Antigonus had given him) and with great aid from Ptolomee, that was joyned with his forces.

To help in this needfull case, Demetrius was called over into Asia by his Fathers letters: which he readily obeyed. Before his departure out of Greece, he made peace with Cassander, upon reasonable termes: to the end he might not be driven to leave any part of his Army for defence of the Country; and that his journey might be without any lumb blemish of reputation, as if hee had abandoned his Dependants: for one Article of the peace was, That all the Cities of Greece should be at liberty. Cassander was glad to be rid of an Enemy that was too strong for him. Yet would this league have done him little good, if things had fallen out contrariwise than they did in Asia; seeing the ratification thereof was referred unto Antigonus. It sufficed, that for the present, every one found means to clear himself of all incumbrances else-where, to the end that each of them might freely apply himself to the tryall of the main controversie in Asia.

S. IV.

How Antigonus was slain in a great battell at Ipsus, neer unto Ephesus; wherein his whole estate was lost.

S*eleucus*, with his Sonne Antiochus, joyning with Lyfimachus, compounded a great Armie, which was (all considered) not inferiour to that of the Enemy. In greatnesse of name (that helpeth much in all Warres, but especially in the Civill) they were rather unanswerable than unequall to their adversaries: for Antigonus had of long time kept them under with a mastering spirit, and had been reputed a King indeed; when the rest were held but Usurpers of the Title. Likewise Demetrius was generally acknowledged a brave Commander, having given proof of his worth in many great services of all kinds, and enriched the art of war with many inventions, which even his enemies, and particularly Lyfimachus, did much admire. Seleucus, who had some times flattered Antigonus, and fearfully stoll away from him to save his life, with young Antiochus, a Prince not heard of before this journey, and Lyfimachus, that had lived long in a corner, hardly keeping his own from the wilde Thracians; wanted much in reputation, of that which was yeilded to their opposites: yet so, that as ancient Captains under Philip and Alexander, two of them were held worthy enough to receive any benefit that fortune might give, and the third a Prince of great hope, wherof he now came to make experience.

The Souldiers, on both sides, were for the most part hardy and well exercised: many of them having served under Alexander; though of those old Companies, the long space of two and twenty years had consumed the greatest number. But concerning their affections, the followers of Seleucus were easily perswaded, that in this battell they must either get the upper hand, or put in extreme danger all that belonged unto the Considerate Princes; whereas Antigonus his men could discern no other necessity of fighting, than the obdurate quality of their Lord, that needs would be Master of all. Antigonus had about threecore and ten thousand foot, ten thousand horse, and threecore and fifteen Elephants. His enemies were six thousand short of him in number of their foot; in horse they had the odds of five hundred; of Elephants they had four hundred, and an hundred and twenty armed Chariots of War: which helps, though they little had availed the Persians, yet were they not to be despised, in the hands of a good Captain.

Antigonus himself, either troubled with the unexpected greatnesse of his enemies forces, or presaging little good like to ensue, grew very pensive, communing much in private with his son whom he commended to the Army as his Successor: whereas in secret he had never been so joyfully as with the hope of battell, nor had been accustomed to make his son or any other private to his countenance before he recalled him. Antigonus had taken back, rather for the sake of the fight, of after wards he held it need less to recount. Darius of Phrygia dwelt neer to the place of battell, while Antigonus was in many great fights; and therefore likely to have been thrust into the battell, if any matter, newly forthcoming, had been known. He was not to be deceived, that he did two or three times, containing well neer an hundred of Seleucus his whole Empire, performed a notable fight, being led by such worthy Commanders, and whom the issue thereof did highly concern. Yet he led of the battell recorded, an entire loss in regard of the much variety, wherewith every day abounded in this kind. If he most admirable thing in the battell, were there: Antigonus with his best forces of horse, charged valiantly upon young Antiochus; whom he had broken, and put to flight, he was so transported with the heat of his good fortune, that he never gave over his pursuit, but left his father naked and lost the battell, and the victory. For when Seleucus perceived this advantage, he entered upon the battell between Demetrius and the Phalang of Antigonus, and with many troops of horse offering to break upon the enemies battell, whersoever it lay most open. He did not think of Antigonus, whose great part of them rather chose to revolt from the battell, which they were easily invited, than to sustain the fury of Antigonus his battell. This backwardness, or rather evasion of some discouraged others; and truly, cast them all into flight, a speedier their General to the last end of his desires. Antigonus was then fourescore years old, very fat and unwildy; so that he was unfit to follow his high spirit could have cherished any thought thereof. He had about him none of his most trusty followers, and as many others as he could find to follow. When one that perceived a great troupe coming towards his person, told him, Antigonus his company seemed to charge you. He answered, Well may they, for who defend me? Demetrius still held aloof. This expecting to the very last, that his son should come to the rescue, he received so many Darts into his body, as took away his life. Antigonus was then threecore and ten years old, together with his troublesome life, Antigonus his ability in matter of Armes, together with his trust in the name of Empire, insufficiently appeared in the whole Volume of his actions. He was more feared by his enemies, than loved by his friends; as one that could not moderate his fortune. But violence toward all alike, as if it had been some verie noble person representing a King's Majesty. This was the cause that so many of his followers revolted to his enemies, and finally, that a great part of his Army forsook him in his last necessity. For the Kings and Princes that call all the careful adventures of their Vassals, only to debate, and are more apt to punish the least offences, than to reward the great services: shall finde themselves upon the fall change of fortune, (seeing it is love that makes us by adversity) not only the most friendless, but even the most contemptible and despised of all other. This Antigonus found true in part, while he lived, and left it to be verified upon his son. Antigonus his son, Antiochus, was then about seven years old, and was named after his father. He was not yet of age to rule, and was left in the hands of his mother, Stratonice, who was a woman of great beauty and much loved. Antiochus was then about seven years old, and was named after his father. He was not yet of age to rule, and was left in the hands of his mother, Stratonice, who was a woman of great beauty and much loved. Antiochus was then about seven years old, and was named after his father. H h h

Prince

Princes than to see his adversary despised by those whom he had thought his friends. Yet was he faine to give good words. For he had left many of his ships in the Haven, of which he now stood in great need; and therefore was faine to speak those words, which sometimes had grossly battered him. But he shall live to teach them their old language, and speak unto them in another tune. When he had gotten his ships, he came to the Illyrian, where he found nothing but matter of discomfort. His Gallies were every where broken, the Souldiers having betaken themselves to his enemies pay. So that he was king onely of a small Army and Fleet, without money or means wherewith to pay him, and his followers any long time. All the rest, or the greater part of his Father's large Dominion, was now in dividing among the Conquerors, and those few places, which as yet held for him (having not perforce heard the worst of what had happened) he no way knew how to relieve, nor to put himself into the field on that side of the Sea, he had no power, and to inclose himself in any of them how strong soever, were but to impall on his fortune, and his hopes, or therein indeed to put himself and his estate; He therefore creeping thorow those bushes that had few enemies, fell upon a corner of Lyfsmachus's Kingdom, whereof he gave all that spoile that was gotten to his Souldiers, his own losses having been too great to be repayed again by small prizes.

In the meane while the Confederate Princes had wherewithall to busie themselves, in the partition of those Provinces, of which their late victory had made them Lords; wherein Seleucus had a notable advantage by being present, and Master of the field, for neither Ptolomy nor Cassander were at the overthrow given, having onely sent certain troupes to re-inforce the army, which Seleucus led, who took hold of a part of the Iles, and all Syria, being on otherwise divided from his own Territory, than by the Buyer of Bithynia. For there had not any order been taken by the Confederates for the division of all those Lands; because they did not expect so prosperous an issue of that war, which they made onely in their own common defence. It was therefore lawfull for Seleucus to make the best benefit that he could of the victory, at which never the less others did repine; and though they neither could nor durst accuse him of ill dealing for the present, yet seeing the over greatness of Seleucus brought no lesse danger to the rest of the new Kings, than that of Antigonus had done, they consulted upon the same reason of State as before, how to oppose it in time. Neither was Seleucus ignorant of what they had determined; for he read it in the Law universall of Kingdomes and States, needing no other intelligence. Hereupon they forget friendships on all sides, and cure themselves of all unprofitable passion, the hatred of each to other, and their loves being laid on the one side against their profits on the other, were found (so far too light, as Seleucus, who had so far slain Antigonus the father, and driven Demetrius the son out of Asia, sought to marry his daughter, how to match himself with Stratonice, Demetrius his Daughter, and so by Demetrius to leave his turne against Lyfsmachus.

The story of this Stratonice, with whom young Antigonus, the son of Seleucus fell so passionately in love, and so distemper'd, as Seleucus his father, to save his son's life, gave her (though there were his wife) unto him; and how his passion was discovered by his pulse, is generally noted by all Writers. But neither did this alliance between Seleucus and Demetrius; between Ptolomy and Lyfsmachus; between Demetrius and Cassander; between Demetrius and Ptolomy; though for the present it brought him again into the rank of Kings; otherwise any of them, to each other, than the marriages between Christian Kings have done in latter times, namely between the Austrians, the Aragonians, the French, and other Princes; neither have the Leagues of those elder times been found more faithfull, than those of the same latter times have been, as in the stories of Charles the eighth of France, and of Charles the Emperour, of France the first, and of the Kings of Naples, Dukes of Milan; and others, the Reader may observe; between whom from the year of our Lord, One thousand foure hundred ninety and five, when Charles the eighth undertook the Conquest of Naples, to the year One thousand five hundred fifty and eight, when Henry the second died; the Histories of those times tell us, that all the bonds, either by the Bed, or by the Booke, either by Weddings, or Sacramentall Oaths, had neither faithfull purpose nor performance. Yet did Demetrius reap this profit by giving his daughter to his enemy Seleucus, that he recovered Silicia from Plistarchus, the brother of Cassander, who had gotten it as his share in the division of Antigonus's possessions; for the Inttuder was not strong enough to hold it by his proper forces from him, that entred upon it as a lawfull heire, neither would Seleucus lend him any help, as by the rule of Confederacy he should have done against the common enemy. So Plistarchus with very angry complaint, as well against Seleucus as Demetrius, went unto Cassander; whither Phila, their sister, followed him shortly, to pacifie them both, and keep all quiet, being sent for that purpose by Demetrius her husband, that was not strong enough to deale with Cassander; & therefore glad to make use of that bond of alliance betwixt them, whereof in his own prosperity, he never took notice to the others good. About the same time he took to wife the daughter of Ptolomy (plurality of wives being familiar with these Macedonians, that had learned it in their Eastern conquests) and so was he by two marriages rather freed from two enemies, than strengthened with two friends; for neither of them wished him any good, otherwise than might seem to advance their own ambitious desires.

Seleucus and Ptolomy could both of them have been contented better, that Demetrius, with help of their countenance, should seek his fortune somewhat farther off, than little his estate under their noses. Particularly, Seleucus thought that Cilicia lay very fitly for himself; and Ptolomy had a great appetite (which yet he concealed a while) to the Iles of Cyprus. Now whether it were so, that Seleucus would faine have set his new father-in-law upon the neck of Lyfsmachus; or whether he were indeed greedy of the bargain, he offered to buy of Demetrius for ready money, his late purchase of Cilicia. He unto Demetrius would not hearken, but meant to keep as much land as he could, having already found in Cilicia twelve thousand talents of his fathers treasure, that would serve him to make sport a while. This refusall so displeased Seleucus, that in anger he demanded the Cities of Tyre and Sidon, to be surrendred unto him; which were the only places in Syria, that had not followed the fortune of the late great battell. In stead of giving them up, Demetrius took present order to have them better manned, and spake it stoutly, That were he overcome a thousand times, yet would he not let Seleucus to become his Son-in-law. In this quarrell Seleucus was generally reprehended as one of a malignant disposition, that would break friendship with his Father-in-law for two Towns, from whom he had already taken more than well he knew how to governe. But the fire consumed it self in words, which had it fastened upon any like it is that the weaker should have found friends out of envie to the stronger.

How Demetrius won the City of Athens, and prevailed in Greece, but lost in Asia. Of troubles in Macedon following the death of Cassander.

In the meane while, the Athenians, not knowing how to use the liberty which Demetrius had bestowed on them, were fallen by sedition, under the Tyranny of Lachares. Through which alteration their distempered City was so weakened, that it seem'd not able to keep off the punishment due to their late ingratitude. This advantage hapned him, whom they had once called their God and Saviour, to present himself unto them, in the habit of a revenging fury. He brought against them all the force that he could well spare from other employments, which were at that time perhaps the more because his doubtfull Eastern friends, were unwilling to give impediment to any business, that might entangle him in Greece. His first enterprise in Athens had all success; a great part of his fleet perishing in a tempest. But he soon repaired the losse; and (after some victories in Peloponnesus, where he vanquish'd Towns that had fallen from him) returning to the enterprise, wasted the Country of Attica, and cut off all recourse from the City, both by Land and Sea. Athens was not able to feed the great multitude within it any long time; for it stood in barren soil, and wanted now the command of those Ilands and places abroad, from whence it was wont to be stored with victuals, being also destitute of means to keep such a Navie, as might bring in supply, or dare to do any thing at Sea, against that of Demetrius. Yet was there some hope of succour from Ptolomy, who (trusting thereby to win the love of Greece) had laden an 150. ships with corne, and sent them to relieve the hungry City. But these hundred and fifty were unable to deale with three hundred good fighting ships, which Demetrius had; rather they feared to become a prey to him, and therefore halted them away betimes; as having done enough, in adventuring to come to see that they might be despoiled. This brake the heart of the people, among whom the famine was so extreme, that a Father and his Son did fight for a dead moul, which dropped down between them from the house top. Wherefore they sent Embassadors to yeeld up the Town, and crave pardon, having so far offended, that out of desperation, they made it a capitall offence to propose any motion of peace. Yet were they faine to abolish this decree: rather because they knew not what else to doe, than because they hoped to be forgiven.

Demetrius, contented with the honour of the victory, did not onely forbear to take away the lives of these unthankfull men, which they had submitted unto his mercy; but out of his liberality gave them food, and placed in Office amongst them such as were most acceptable to the people. Nevertheless he was grown wiser than to trust them so far as he had done in times past. And therefore, when (among other flattering acclamations) they bade him take their Havens, and dispose of them at his pleasure; he was ready to lay hold upon the word, and leave a sure Garrison within their walls, to keep them honest perforce. After this he went into Peloponnese, vanquished the Lacedaemonians in two battels, and was in very faire possibility to take their City: when the dangerous newes of Lysimachus and Ptolomy, that prevailed faster upon him elsewhere, than himself did upon his enemies in Greece, called him in all haste. Lysimachus had won many Towns in Asia; Ptolomy had gotten all the Isle of Cyprus, except the City of Salamis, wherein Demetrius had left his Children and Mother, that were straightly besieged. Whilest he was betinking himself which way to turn his face, a notable piece of businesse offered it self, which thrust all other cares out of his head.

Cassander was lately dead in Macedon, and soon after him, Philip his eldest son, whose two younger brethren, Antipater and Alexander, sought for the Kingdom. In this quarrell Thesalonica the Daughter of King Philip, whom Cassander had married, seemed better affected to Alexander, than to her elder son: who thereupon grew so enraged, that most barbarously he slew his own Mother. The odiousnesse of this fact gave a fair lustre to Alexander's cause; drawing the generality of the Macedons to take his part, as in revenge of the Queens death, upon that wicked parricide Antipater. But Antipater was so strongly backed by Lysimachus, whose daughter he had married; that Alexander could not hope to make his party good without some forraign aide. For which cause he called in both Pyrhus and Demetrius; who how they dealt with him, it will soon appear in the following Tragedy, of him and his brother. Their Father Cassander had been one that shifted well for himself, at such time as every man sought how to get somewhat in the ill ordered division of the Empire. He was cunning in practice, and a good Souldier: one of more open dealing than were his Companions, but withall more impudent, rudely killing those, whom others would more wisely have made away. He deeply hated the memory of Alexander, that had knocked his head against a wall, upon some opinion of contempt. With Olympias he had an hereditary quarrell, derived from his father, whom he could not abide. Her feminine malice did so exasperate him, by cruelty that thrust against his friends, both alive and dead; as it made him adventure upon shedding the Royal blood; wherewith, when once he had stained his hands, he did not care how far he proceeded in that course of murder. His carefulnesse to destroy those women and children, whose lives hindred his purpose, argues him to have been rather skillfull in matters of arms, than a valiant man: such cruelty being a true mark of cowardize; which fears a far off the dangers, that may quietly passe away: and seeks to avoid them by base and wicked meanes, as never thinking it self safe enough, until there be nothing left, that carries likelihood of danger. Of Olympias and Roxane it may be said, that they had well deserved the bloody end which over-took them; yet he seemed in Cassander to doe the office of a Hang-man. But Alexander's children had by no law of men, deserved to die for the tyranny of their Father. Wherefore, though Cassander died in his bed, yet the divine Justice brought swords upon his wife and children, that well revenged the cruelty of this bloody man, by destroying his whole house as he had done his Masters.

Pyrhus and his doings in Macedon. The death of Cassander's children. Demetrius gets the Kingdom of Macedon; prevails in war against the Greeks; Loseth reputation in his war against Pyrhus, and in his civill Government, and prepares to win Asia. How all conspire against Demetrius. Pyrhus and Lysimachus invade him; his Army yeelds to Pyrhus, who shares the Kingdom of Macedon with Lysimachus.

Pyrhus, the Son of that unfortunate Prince Acides, which perished in war against Cassander, was hardly preserved, being a suckling Infant, from the fury of his Fathers enemies. When his Fosters had conveyed him to Glaucias King of Illyria; the deadly hatred of Cassander would have bought his life, with the price of two hundred Talents. But no man can kill him that shall be his heire. Glaucias was so farre from betraying Pyrhus, that he restored him by force to his Fathers Kingdom, when he was but twelve yeers of age. Within the compasse of six yeers, either the indifferency of his youth, or the rebellious temper of his Subjects, drove him out of his Kingdom, and left him to trie the world anew. Then went he to Demetrius (who married his sister) became his Page, followed him a while in his wars, was with him in the great battell of Ipsus, whence he fled with him to Ephesus; and was content to be hostage for his reconciliation with Ptolomy. In Egypt he so behaved himself, that he got the favour of Berenice, Ptolomies principall wife, so that he married her daughter, and was thence sent home, with money and men, into Epirus; more beholding now to Ptolomy than to Demetrius. When he had fully recovered the Kingdom of Epirus, and was settled in it, then fell out that busines between the children of Cassander, which drew both him and Demetrius into Macedon.

Antipater, the elder of Cassander's sons, was so far too weak for Pyrhus, that he had no more to attend the coming of Demetrius; but made an hasty agreement, & divided the Kingdom with his younger brother Alexander; who likewise felt the aide of Pyrhus to be troublesome, that he was more willing to send him away, than to call in such another helper. For Pyrhus had the audacity, to request, or take as granted, by strong hand, Ambracia, Acarnania, and much more of the Country, as the reward of his pains: leaving the two brethren to agree as well as they could about the rest. Necessity enforced the brethren to composition; but their composition would not satisfie Demetrius, who took the matter hainously, that he was sent for, and made a foole, to come so far with an Army, and finde no work for it. This was a frivolous complaint; whereby it appeared, that Demetrius had a purpose to doe as Pyrhus had done, and so much more, by how much he was stronger. Hereupon it seemed to Alexander a wise course, to remove this over-diligent friend, by murdering him upon some advantage. Thus Demetrius reported the story, and it might be true; though the greatest part, and perhaps the wisest, beleevved it not. But the issue was, that Alexander himself was feasted and slain by Demetrius; who took his part of the Kingdom, as a reward of the murder; causing the fact so well, by telling his own danger, and what a naughty man Cassander had been, that all the Macedonians grew glad enough to acknowledge him their King. It fell out happily, that about the same time Lysimachus was busied in war with King of the wilde Thracians: for thereby he was compelled to seek peace of Demetrius, which to obtain, he caused the remainder of Macedon to be given up; that is, the part belonging to Antipater, his Son-in-law. At this ill bargain Antipater grievously lamented, though he knew not how to amend it; yet still he stormed until his Father-in-law, to save the labour of making many excuses, took away his troublesome life. In such haste, with a kind of neglect, and as it were to avoid molestation, were slaine the children of Cassander: of Cassander that had slain his own Masters children, in a wife course of policy, with careful meditation (so much the more wicked as the more long) considering how to erect his own house, that fell down upon his grave, ere the earth on it was thoroughly settled.

It might be thought, that such an access of Dominion, added much to the greatness of Demetrius. But in deed it shewed his infirmity; and thereby made him neglected by many, and at length hated by all. For he had no art of civill Government: but thought (as shewed by his actions that he thought) the use and fruit of a Kingdom, to be none other other, than to doe what a King listeth. He gave himself over to Women and Wine, laughing openly at those which offered to trouble him with supplications, and the tedious discourse of doing justice. He had more skill in getting a Kingdom, than in ruling a war being his recreation, and luxury his nature. By long rest (as six yeeres reign is long to him, that knows not how to reign one yeer) he discovered so much of his worst conditions, as made the people both weary of his idleness, and the Souldiers of his vanity. He was freed from care of matters in Asia, by hearing that all was lost: though more especially, by hearing that Ptolomie had with great honour, entertained and dismissed his mother and children. This afforded him the better leisure, of making war in Greece, where he vanquished the Thebans, and won their City twice in short space, but used his victory with mercy. Against Lyfsmachus he would faine have done somewhat (the peace between them notwithstanding) at such time as he was taken by the Thracians; but Lyfsmachus was freely dismissed, and in good case to make resistance ere Demetrius came; so as this journey purchased nothing but enmity. Another expedition he took in hand against Pyrrhus, with no better, or rather with worse event. Pyrrhus held somewhat belonging to Macedon, which he had indeed as honestly gotten, as Demetrius the whole Kingdom; he had also made excursions into Theffaly. But there needed not any handsome pretence of quarrell, seeing Demetrius thought himself strong enough, to over-run his enemies Country, with two great Armies. It is a common fault to men, to despise the vertue of those, whom they have known raw Novices in that faculty, wherein themselves are noted as extraordinary. Pyrrhus was a Captain, whom latter ages, and particularly the great Hannibal, placed higher in the rank of Generals; than either Demetrius, or any of Alexanders followers. At this time, he missed that part of the Army, which Demetrius led, and fell upon the other half: which he overthrew, not with more commendations of his good conduct, than of his private valour; shewed in single combat against Pantauchus, Demetrius his Lieutenent; who being a strong man of body, challenged this young Prince to fight hand to hand, and was utterly beaten. The losse of this battell did not so much offend the Macedonians, as the gallant behaviour of Pyrrhus delighted them. For in him they seemed to behold the lively figure of Alexander in his best quality. Other Kings did imitate, in a counterfeit manner, some of Alexanders graces, and had good skill in wearing Princely vestures: but (said they) none, save Pyrrhus, is like him in deed, in performing the office of a Captain.

These rumours were not more nourished by the vertue of the Epirot, than by dislike of their own King; whom they began to dis-esteem, not so much in regard of his unprofitable journey into Epirus (for he had wasted much of the Country, and brought home his Army in good case) as of his insolence, that grew daily more and more intolerable. His apparrell seemed, in the eyes of the Macedons, not onely too sumptuous and new-fangled, but very unmanly; and serving chiefly to bee a daily witnesse, how much he contemned them and their good opinions. Of his souldiers lives he was reckless: and suffered unwisely this un-princely sentence to escape out of his mouth; That the more of them died, the fewer he was to pay. He made a mockery of justice; and as it were, to publish unto all his Subjects, how little he esteemed it or them) having by a shew of popularity invited Petitioners, and with a gracious countenance entertained their Supplications, he led the poor suiters after him in great hope, till coming to a bridge, he threw all their writings into a River; pleasing himself, in that he could so easily and so boldly delude the cares of other men. By these courses he grew so odious, that Pyrrhus gathered audacity, and invading Macedon, had almost won it all with little resistance. Demetrius lay then sick in his bed: who recovering health, and taking the field, had such great odds of strength, as made Pyrrhus glad to forsake his winnings and be gone.

At length he began to have some feeling of the generall hate; which to redresse, he did not (for he could not) alter his own conditions; but purposed to alter their idle discourses of him, by setting them on work in such an action, wherein his best qualities might appear; that is, in a great War. His intent was to invade Asia, with a Royal Army: wherein the fortune of one battell might give him as much, as the fortune of another had taken from him. To this end, he first made peace with Pyrrhus; that so he might leave all safe and quiet at home. Then did he compose a mighty Army, of almost a hundred thousand foot, and twelve thousand horses with a Navie of five hundred saile; wherein were many ships, far exceeding the greatnesse of any that had been seen before; yet so swift and usefull withall, that the greatnesse was least part of the commendation.

The terrible fame of these preparations, made Seleucus and Ptolomy suspect their own forces, and labour hard with Lyfsmachus and Pyrrhus, to joyn against this ambitious son of Antigonus, that was like to prove more dangerous to them all, than ever was his father. It was easily discerned; that if Demetrius once prevailed in Asia, there could be no security for his friends in Europe; what league soever were of old concluded. Therefore they resolved to begin with him betimes, and each to invade that quarter of Macedon, that lay next his own Kingdom. Lyfsmachus came first, and against him went Demetrius with a great part of his Army: but whilest he was yet on the way, newes were brought into his Camp; that Pyrrhus had won Berrybaea. The matter was not over great; yet not that minds prepared with long discontent, are ready to lay hold upon small occasions of dislike. All the camp was in uproare: some wept, others raged, few or none durst beare to utter seditious words, and many desired leave of Demetrius, to goe to their own houses, meaning indeed to have gone to Lyfsmachus.

When Demetrius perceived the bad affection of his Army, he thought it the wisest way to lead the Macedonians further off from Lyfsmachus their own countymen, against whom that was a stranger: hoping by victory against the Epirot, to recover the love of his followers, in such sort that he might afterwards at leisure deale with the other. But herein his wisdom beguiled him. For the Souldiers were as hasty as he, to meet with Pyrrhus; not intending to hurt him, but longing to see that noble Prince, of whom they daily heard the honourable fame. Some spake of his valour; some enquired, others admired, of his person, his armour, and other tokens whereby he might be known; as particularly, by a paire of Goats hornes, that he wore on his crest. It was not likely, that these men should hurt him. Divers of them stole away, and ran over into Pyrrhus his camp: where the newes that they brought, were better welcome than their persons. For they said, and it was true, that if the Macedonians might once get sight of Pyrrhus, they would all salute him King. To trie this, Pyrrhus rode forth, and presented himself bareheaded in view of the camp, whither some were sent before to prepare his welcome. The newes of his arrivall found a generall applause, and every one began to look out, with desire to set eye on him. His face was not so well known as his Helmet; therefore he was admonished to put it on: which done, all came about him, and proffered their service; neither were there any, that spake for Demetrius; onely some (and they the most moderate of tongue) bade him be gone betimes, and shift for himself. So Demetrius threw aside his maskers habit, and attyring himself poorly, did fearfully steale away out of his own camp, deserving well this calamity: whether it were so, that he would not hearken to the good counsell of his friends, or whether his behaviour deprived him of such friends, as would dare to let him heare the unpleasant sound of necessary truth.

Whilest Pyrrhus was making this triumphant entry into the Kingdom of Macedon; Lyfsmachus came upon him very unseasonably, and would needs have half: saying, that he had done as much as Pyrrhus in the war; and therefore had reason to challenge his part of the gain. The bargain was quickly made, and the division agreed upon: each of them being rather desirous to take his part quietly, than to fight for the whole; as hoping each of them, to work his fellow quite out of all, upon better opportunity.

§. VIII.

How Demetrius gathering forces, enterprised many things with ill successe, in Greece and Asia. How he was driven upon Seleucus, and compelled to yeeld himself. His imprisonment and death

The Athenians were as unthankfull to Demetrius in this his adversity, as they had been in former times. For they presently forsook his friendship, and called Pyrrhus out of Macedon to bee their Patron. Demetrius, when he went against Lyfsmachus, had left a great part of his forces in Greece, under his son Antigonus. Therefore it is like, that he had soon gotten an Army, though Phila his wife (who

(who is highly commended for a wife and vertuous Lady) did poyson herself, upon desperate grief for his misfortune. The first, upon whom he attempted to shew his anger, were the Athenians that had well deserved it. He began to lay siege to their Town: but was pacified by Crates the Philosopher, whom they had made their spoken-man; and taking fair words in stead of satisfaction, passed over into Asia, with eleven thousand Souldiers, meaning to trie his fortune against Lyfismachus, for the Provinces of Lydia and Caria.

At his first coming into those parts, fortune seemed to smile upon him. For many good Towns, willingly, or by compulsion, yeelded to his obedience. There were also some Captains that fell from Lyfismachus to him, with their companies and treasures. But it was not longer ere Agathocles the son of Lyfismachus, came upon him with an Army so strong, that it was not for Demetrius his good, to hazzard his last stock against him. Wherefore, he resolved to passe through Phrygia and Armenia, into Media, and the Provinces of the higher Asia: trusting to finde a Kingdom somewhere in those remote quarters. The execution of this counsell was grievously impeached by Agathocles, who pursued him close, and cut off all his provisions, driving him to take which way he could, without following his intended course. In many skirmishes Demetrius vanquished this troublesome enemy: nevertheless, he could not be shaken off, but continued afflicting the poor titular King, with extreme famine. At length, in passing the river Lycus, so many of Demetrius his men were lost, that the rest could no longer make resistance: but were driven to travell with such speed as might well be called a plain flight. So that with famine, pestilent defeates following famine, and other accidents of war, eight thousand of them were consumed: the rest, with their Captain, escaped into Cilicia. Seleucus had gotten possession of Cilicia, whilest Demetrius was occupied in Greece: yet was it no part of Demetrius his errand, to lay claime to the Country, but with vehemence and humble letters he besought his Son-in-law, to call to mind their alliance, and to pity him in his great misery. These letters, at the first wrought well with Seleucus; and he condescended to the request: yet considering further how Demetrius had carried himself, when he recovered strength after the battell at Ipsus, he changed his purpose, and went against him with an Army.

Many treaties were held between them; of which none took effect, through the jealousy of Seleucus. Therefore, meer desperation enforced Demetrius to fight like a mad man, and his furies got him some victories, though of small importance. At length sickness took and held him forty dayes, in which time, a great number of his few men, ran to the enemy. This notwithstanding, he still held out, and once had like to have taken Seleucus in his bed, had not his coming been discovered by fugitives, that gave alarme. Finally, when all his Army had forsaken him, and left him with a few of his friends to shift for himself, he was compelled by the last of those adherents (for even some of those few forsook him) to yeeld unto Seleucus.

Seleucus hearing this, was exceeding glad, and sent him very comfortable messages. But the approbation of his own humanity, by his followers, was such, as renewed his jealous thoughts; and hindred him from admitting Demetrius to his presence, though otherwise he used him with as much favour, as any prisoner could wish. He was kept under fure guard in a demy-Island, wherein were goodly Walkes, Orchards, and Parkes for hunting. He had all that he asked royally, and friends allowed to visit him, at his, and their pleasure. Only his liberty was reserved unto the coming of young Antiochus and Stratonica, out of the high countries. In this sort he spent three years, living merily all the while (as one that now enjoyed the happinesse, which with so much travell and blood-shed, he had sought in vain) and then dyed, leaving to his son Antigonus, the same which his father had left unto himself; that is, friends and hope. His ashes were honourably buried in Corinth; his qualities have appeared in his actions, and the fortune of his House will shew it self hereafter, in times and places convenient.

The death of Ptolomy, of Lyfismachus, and of Seleucus, that was last of Alexanders Captains; with other occurrences.

ABOUT the same time that Demetrius died, died also Ptolomy King of Egypt, a vertuous Prince, war-like, gentle, bountifull, and (which in those times was a rare commendation) regardfull of his word. He had, by many Wives and Concubines many children, out of whom he selected Ptolomy Philadelphus, and caused him to reign together with himself, two or three yeers before he died, that so he might confirm him in the inheritance of the Kingdom. At this, Ptolomy Ceramus (for all of that house assumed the name of Ptolomy) was grievously incensed. But no man cared for his anger. Therefore he went to Seleucus, who gave him loving entertainment. There were now only two of Alexanders Captains left, Seleucus and Lyfismachus. These two needs would fight for it, who should be the longest liver of that brave Company. The true ground of their quarrell, was their neer equality or strength, and want of one to part them. The preence was the murders which Lyfismachus had committed upon many Nobles, together with his poysoning Agathocles his eldest son: whose wife and children fled unto Seleucus for aid.

The Macedons, after seven months pause, having spent their first heat of admiration, began to hearken so well to Lyfismachus, their naturall Country-man, that they forsook Pyrhus, upon none other ground than because he was an Alien. This they had known well enough before: but they did him no great wrong in taking lightly from him that they lightly gave him. Lyfismachus had reigned about five yeers alone, when the City of Lyfismachia (built by him, and called after his name) falling by an earthquake, appeared, by events, to have fore-shewed the fall of his house. His own jealousy, and the instigation of a mother-in-law, caused him to poyson his son Agathocles; which drew upon him that War, wherein (after the losse of all his fifteen children that were taken away by divers accidents) he perished himself.

Seleucus was encountered by Lyfismachus on Asia side, where one battell concluded the war with Lyfismachus his death. It pleased Seleucus more than the victory, that he was best of all the great Heroes that followed Alexander. For now he seemed to himself alone and Heir of all the conquered World. So he passed over into Macedon, to take possession of Europe, where there was none to withstand him. But there he ended his dayes, and within seven months followed Lyfismachus, and others of his fellows, by a bloody death, being treacherously slain by Ptolomy Ceramus, whose friend and Patron he had been. Seventy and seven yeer old he was, when he fought with Lyfismachus, and Lyfismachus was seventy and foure. With them ended the generation of old Captains, who had seen the dayes as it were of another World under the Persians; yet was there none equall to any of them in the Art of War: even Pyrhus the Epirot, of whom we have spoken before; that is now ready to enter into war with the Romans, a more warlike people than Alexander himself did ever encounter. Of which war, and of which more, it is needfull that we here make mention, as of a story more important, than any that ensue in Greece, or in the great Kingdoms that were held by Alexanders Captains, with lesse (and still decreasing) vertue, than was that, by which they were first purchased.

CHAP. VII.

The growth of Rome : and settling of the Eastern Kingdoms.

How the Romanes enlarged their Dominions in Italy, from the death of Tullus Hostilius, unto such time as they were assailed by Pyrrhus.

HOW Rome was founded by Romulus ; settled in good order by Numa Pompilius ; and by many (though small) victories, it gathered strength, unto such time as it became the head of Latium, by the conquest of Alba, in the reign of Tullus Hostilius : it hath been already noted, in due order of time. But whereas now the Roman greatness beginneth to encounter the power of Greece ; and extending it self out of Italy, to overwhelm the Dominions of other States and Princes : I hold it convenient (as in like cases I have done) briefly to set down the growth of this mighty City, in a compendious relation of those many actions, which could not have been delivered in the ages, wherein they were severally performed, without much interruption of the History, that was then occupied in matter more important.

After the death of Tullus Hostilius (who when he had reigned two and thirty years, was burnt together with his house by lightning) Ancus Martius, Grand-child to Numa Pompilius by his daughter, and not much unlike him in disposition, succeeded in the Kingdom of Rome. He walled the City about ; enlarged it with the Hill Aventine, which he enclosed ; built a bridge over Tybris, and the City of Ostia upon the Sea, sixteen miles distant from Rome. Finally, having reigned 24. years, he died, and by his last Will he left his children in charge with one Lucumon, the son of Damaratus, a Corinthian, who avoiding Cypselus King of Corinth his tyranny, had fled into Hetruria, and dwelt in Tarquinii, by the name of which Town he was afterwards called Tarquinus. From that City in Hetruria coming to Rome, and encouraged by some ominous occurrences, together with his wife Tanaquil's prophecy, he grew a favorite of Ancus Martius ; by his Grecian wit humouring the factions of the Roman Court, insomuch, that after his decease he became not only Protector to the children, but Governour to the City. He doubled the number of Senators, and enlarged the Centuries of Horsemen ; neither was he less eminent in war, than in peace : for he prevailed often against the Tuscans, and from his victories, the chiefest ornaments of triumph took their originall. When this Lucius Tarquinus had reigned 38. years, he was slain by the sons of Ancus Martius, to whom he had been left Guardian. But Tanaquil his wife, perceiving what was done, informed the people, from out of an high Turret, that her Husband was wounded, and sick, but not dangerously. And withall signified unto them, that in the interim of his sickness, one Struus Tullius, whom from his birth she alwayes prophesied to be born to great hopes (the son of P. Corniculanus and Ocrissa, a well descended, but captive woman) brought up in her house, and husband unto her daughter, should supply her husbands place, in governing the State, untill his recovery : which government being thus at first obtained by cunning, he afterwards usurped as his right. He first ordained Ratements, Subsidies, and Valuations of the peoples wealth ; among whom, at that time, fourscore thousand were mustered, of which number consisted their whole corporation ; and by distinction of Dignities, Ages, Trades, and Offices, he managed the Kingdom in as good sort, as if it had been a private household. At length, having two daughters of different natures, the one milde and gentle, the other fierce and outrageous : and finding also that the two sons of Tarquinus Priscus, Sextus and Aruns, which had been committed unto his tuition, were of different dispositions, proportionably answering to his daughters ; he (willing to adde water, not oile, to fire) gave the milde daughter to Sextus the hot-headed son, and the violent, to Aruns the gentle in marriage. But whether by intended courtes, or by accident, it hapned ; the two milde ones being made away, the furious natures were readily joynd in marriage ;

concurring, and calling the Senate together, began to lay claim to the Kingdom. This dispute, Servius Tullius hastning to the Senate, (where he thought by his eloquence to have bridled infoleney) was thrown down the stairs, and going home wounded, was slain by the way : when he had reigned 22. years. Then Tullus his first proclaming her Husband, Tarquinus Superbus King, returning home, ordered her Coachman to drive his Chariot over her fathers corpse, whereupon the hatred the denunciation of wicked spirits, This Tarquinus, exercising cruelty without pity, and a stony without mercy, upon the people and Senators ; having tired them out at home, used the same rage of treachery upon his borders. He took the neighbouring Cities, Pometia, and the Caelia. The issue of besieging Ardea, a town eighteen miles distant from Rome, was of bad success. In the heat of which war, his son Sextus violently ravished the chaste Lady Lucretia, his kinsman Collatines wife, who in expectation for so much a dead, thought good to wash out those spots of infamy with her own blood ; so having first bequeathed the revenge unto her father Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, her husband Collatinus, and Junius Brutus, the kill'd her self, whereupon (chiefly by Junius Brutus his resolution) Tarquinus Superbus, with his wife and children, was deposed, and banished ; and fled to Porsenna King of Hetruria for safety. In the second hundred years of his reign, and the two hundred, forty and fourth from the building of their City : in which space Rome had scarce gotten possession of fifteen hundred about her. In the second hundred and fifth year, Collatinus and Lucretia, by the help of Collatine, having expelled Tarquinus, and freed his Country from that heavy yoke of bondage, informed the people by solemn oath, never to admit any government by Kings among them, whereupon they renounced their Kings, and consecrated their fields to Mars, and conferred the government of the State upon Collatinus and Brutus. But because the name of King was odious in their ears, they changed the manner of their government, from perpetuall to annuall, and from a single government to a double ; lest perpetuall, or sole dominion might be some motive to ambition, and in stead of Kings they called them Consuls, signifying, as it may be interpreted, Providers : that their titles might remember them of their place, which was alwayes mindfull of their Citizens welfare. And yet was it so hard settling troubled waters, that the people, after this innovation of State, scarce daring to assure themselves of their own security, enforced Tarquinus Collatine to resign up his authority, fearing that tyranny would be hereditary, and supposing that the very name of monarchy with the house of Tarquinus, favoured already of their condition. In his room was substitute Valerius Publicola, who that he might (as his name importeth) be known in the peoples eyes, gave liberty, in matters of controverse, to appeale from the Consuls to the people : and that he might as well in goods as in person, avoid occasion of suspicion, caused his own house to be pulled down, because it was built in a place defensible, as if it had been a Cittadell. Neither was Brutus any wayes deficient in matters of greater moment ; which concerned as well the peoples safety, as their faith : for having got intelligence, that some greener wits, and in the first rank his own son, were itching after innovations, hoping to restore the banished Kings ; he caused them publicly in the Market place, to be whipt, and then to be brought all unpartaken to the block. Tarquinus Superbus, having by the unblemished integrity of Brutus, well appeased the quarrels at home, now hereafter employed their military designements against their enemies ; first, for their liberty ; secondly, for enlarging of their possessions ; thirdly, for defending their confederate Provinces, and extending their Empire. For he situated as it were in the mid-way between Latins and the Tuscans, having as it were narrow bounds, being in her minority, could not but give occasion of offence to her neighbours ; untill by main opposition, having prevailed against her borderers, he used them as instruments, whereby to obtain the rest. In the first year of Consuls, was against Porsenna King of Hetruria, who being over-persuaded by Tarquinus, lamentation came to Rome, together with the banished King, and with great forces, to fight him again in his Kingdom. In the first conflict, Horatius Codes, having long time born the main brunt of his enemies, on the bridge over Tybris, at length, feeling himself too faint to stand against so many, caused the bridge behind him to be broken down, and with his armour leaping into into the River, like a humped Stagge, refreshed his hot spirits, and returned to his fellows, with the like resolution to sustain a new charge. Porfenna, although he had well fought, won the hill; Janicular, which is the very entrance into the City, and found the victory, in a manner, absurdly his own: yet admiring their valour, and repelled by the constant resolution of Minus Scavola (who having by conspiring slain Porfenna, as the Secretary, in stead of the King himself, did in some of toments threaten, but off his own hand) he thought it not any whis prejudicial either to his safety, or to enter league with them at the worst hand; And yet the edge of Tanquar, his friend, was not quite abated, though Arms his son, and Brutus, his enemy, in single combat had slain each other. And here the Romans, although they lost Arms got the field, and their Ladies, who for Champion he was, for their chastity, not for beauty, mourned the loss of him one whole year. Into his place, for the residue of his year, was substituted Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, surnamed Lactatius; and in his roome (deceasing naturally before the year expired) Marcius Tullius Coriolanus succeeded.

Coriolanus upon his overthrow, feeling the faces disastrous, thought it no boot to live against the Romans; but spent the residue of his time, which was about fourtee years, privately at Tuscanum. Yet his Son-in-law Mantilius Tuscanulus, stomaching a friend, those old republicke betwixt Coriolanus had made peace with the Romans, and desired that they should restore the Volscians, mastered up his Latines, and gave battell to the mans, at the Lake Regillum; where the conflict was fierce, and the issue uncertain. Aulus Postumius, the Roman Dictator, (for they had created this Magistracy greater than Consuls, purposely for this war, when first it was expected) no exasperate his Soldiers courage, threw their own Ensignes amidst the Enemies; and Cassius, or Spurius Cassius, (Master of the Horse-men, an assistance Officer to the Dictator) commanded to take their bridles, that they might run with free violence, to recover again their Ensignes. This fight was so well performed, that a report went of Cassius and Postumius, two men who came on milk-white Steeds, to be eye-witnesses of their valour, and fellow-labourers of their victory; for the Generali consecrated a Temple to them, as a stipend for their pains. After this the Romans fierce spirits, having no object of valour abroad, reflected upon themselves at home; and the fourteenth year after the Kings expulsion, on instigation of some desperate bankrupts; thinking themselves wrongfully oppressed by the Senate and Consuls, they made an uproare in the holy Mount; untill by Mucius Attilius, his discreet allusion, of the inconvenience in the head and belly discord, to that present occasion, they were reconciled to the Senate: with condition, that they might have some new Magistrates created, to whom they might appeal in cases of variance, and make them Solicitors in all their controversies, the Consuls authority not withstanding. This was granted, and they were called the Tribunes of the people. After this agreement among themselves, they had continuall War with the Latines, concerning their bounds and limits, and with other neighbouring Towns. Among these, the Volsci and Equi held them longest; who made War of themselves upon the Romans; whereby they lost the best City in their whole jurisdiction, Corioli.

In this conquest, Marcius got the surname of Coriolanus; a name honorable then, as driven from a great victory; although, by reason of the poverty of the Town, Marcius General, in after times, would have been ashamed of that title. But yet these gates had him, no occasion of disparagement, had he not afterwards in a great time of dearth, advised to sell corn, which they procured from Sicily, at too high a rate, to the people, whereupon Destus Arus, their Tribune, in their behalf, accused him, & after judgement banished him. Coriolanus flying to the Volsci, whom lately before he had vanquished, incited them to renew their forces again; which being committed unto him, he to Antony Tullus, he prevailed in field; so far forth, that he was come within four or five miles of the City. Incamping there, he made so sharp war, and was at such defiance with his Country, that he would not relent by any supplication of Embassadors, untill his mother Veturia, and Valeriana his wife, with a pitifull tune of deprecation, shewing themselves better Subjects to their Country than friends to their Son and Husband, were more available to Rome than was any force of Arms. Hereupon Coriolanus dismissing his Army, was after put to death among the Volsci, as a Traitor, for neglecting such opportunity: or (as others surmise) living with them untill old age, he died naturally.

Not

Not long after this the Veii in Hetruria, provoked the Romans, against whom the Fabii, three hundred and six in number, all of one Family, intreated and obtained, that they only might be employed, as it had been in a private quarrell. These Fabii, after some good services, lying incamped at Cremora, were circumvented, and all slain: one only of that whole house had been left, by reason of infancy, at home; from whom afterward sprang Fabius Maximus, who vanquished Hannibal.

In proceesse of time, the Romans were also troubled with the Volsci, at the hill of Algidum, two miles from Rome; where Lucius Minutius their Consul, with his whole army, had been discomfited, had not L. Quintius Cincinnatus chosen Dictator, and taken from the plough to the highest honour in Rome, with successe answerable to his expedition, dispersed his enemies, and freed his country in the space of sixteen dayes. In the continuance of this Volscian war, it was that Appius Claudius, one of the ten men, whom they had two years before chosen Governours of the State, and Inactors of Solons laws amongst them, procured from Athenis abrogating in the mean while the Consuls, and all other Magistrates) would have ravished Virginia, the daughter of T. Virginus, Captain of a company, and lying then in a camp at Algidum. Hereupon the people in an uproare took the Hill Aventine, and after much variance, enforced the ten men to resign up their authority again to new Consuls.

After this, either new quarrels, or desire to revenge old losses drew the Romans into a new war against the Veientes and their adherents, upon whom, having tried their forces with diversity of Captaines, and variety of event, they vanquished the Falisci, and the Fidenates, and utterly subdued the Veientes. In conquering the Falisci, Furius Camillus shewed no lesse integrity, than fortitude. For when a Schoolmaster, by training forth into the Roman camp, many children of the principall Citizens, thought to betray the Town, yeelding them all up as hostages: Camillus delivered this Traitor bound unto his Souldiers, willing them to whip him back into the City; which forthwith yeelded unto him in reverence of his justice. The siege of Veii was ten years, and so troublesome, that the Romans were there first enforced to winter abroad under beasts skins (to which they were the more easily induced, because then first they received pay) and to make vows never to return without victory.

At length winning the City by a Mine, they got so large spoils, that they consecrated their tenths to Apollo Pythius: and the whole people in generall were called to the ransacking of the City. But yet they were no lesse unthankfull to Camillus for his service, than before they had been to Coriolanus; for they banished him the City, upon some occasion of inequality in dividing the spoiles: yet he requited their unkindnesse with a new peece of service against the fury of the Gauls; who being a populous Country, and very healthfull, the fathers (as sometimes now) lived so long, that the sons, destitute of means, were enforced to roave abroad, seeking some place where to set up their rest: and withall being a Nation vaste in body, rude by nature, and barbarous in conditions, wandered as Rovers over many Countries. Some of them lighting on Italy, set upon Clusium a Town in Hetruria: whereof Rome having information, (and being careful of her Confederate Towns) sent Embassadors, warning them to desist from such injurious enterprises. But the barbarous people, not regarding the message, upon some injurie offered by the Roman Embassadors, converted their forces from Clusium towards Rome; and giving a great overthrow unto the Romans, by the River Allia, upon the sixteenth day before the Calends of August (which day was after branded for unlucky, and called Aliensis in the Roman Kalendar) they hastned towards the City. Then was Rome the true map of misery and desolation. For some leaving the City; some creeping into holes; Priests hiding their reliques; and every one shifting for himself ere the enemy came; Rome was abandoned as indefensible. The Vestall Virgins, in this tumult, were safely conveyed away; the Ancients of the City, gathering boldnesse out of desperate fear, did put on their Robes, and taking their leave of the world, did set themselves in Thrones, in their severall houses, hourly expecting the messengers of death, and meaning to dye, as they had lived, in State. The younger sort, with M. Manlius their Captain, took upon them to make good the Capitall.

By this the Gauls were entred the City, who seeing all quiet, at first suspected some ambush; afterward finding all secure, they fell to the spoile, committing all to the fire and sword. As for the old Senatours, they sate in their Majesty with a grave resolution, having having first revered them as gods, anon they tried whether they would die like men. When the City was thoroughly rifled, they attempted the Capitall: which held them work for the space of seven moneths. Once they were like to have surpris'd it by night, but being descried by the gagling of Geese, M. Manlius did awaken, and kept them from entrance. At length a composition was agreed upon: the Gauls being weary, and the Romans hungry. The bargain was, that the Gauls should take a thousand pound weight in gold, to desist from their siege. Whilest the gold was in weighing, the Gauls, with open insolency, made their weights too heave: Brennus their Captain, casting his sword into the ballance, and with a proud exprobration, saying, that the vanquish'd must be patient perforce. But in the midst of this cavilling came Furius Camillus with an Army from Ardea, (where he had lived in his banishment) and fell upon the Gauls with such violence, that he dispersed their troupes, quenched the fire of the City with their blood, forcing them to restore the spoiles with advantage, and forbear the gold, in accepting which they had lately been so nice. Further, having rid the City of them, he so hotly pursued them thorow a great part of Italy, that the remainder of their Army which escap'd from him, was very small. Other Armies of the Gauls, which followed this first, had the like ill successe. They were often beaten by the Romans; especially the victories of M. Torquatus, and of M. Valerius Corvinus (each of which in single fight slew a severall Champion of the Gauls) abated their presumption, and restored courage to the Romans. Camillus, for his notable service, was afterwards accounted a second Romulus.

The people, after this destruction of their City, were earnestly bent to go to the Vei to inhabit; but Camillus dissuaded them.

About the same time, somewhat before the siege of Vei they changed their government from Consuls to military Tribunes. The government of these also, after some years, was by civill dissention interrupted: so that one while Consuls ruled, another while there was an Anarchy. Then the Tribunes were restored and ruled again, till after many years expired, the Consular authority was established, it being enacted, that one of the Consuls should alwaies be a Plebeian. This was after the building of the City 365. years. And now Rome, by suppression of her neighbour Countries, creeping well forward out of her Minority, dares set forth against the warlike Samnites, who dwelt almost one hundred and thirty miles off: situated between Campania and Apulia. These did so strongly invade the Campanians their neighbours, that they forced them to yeeld themselves subjects to Rome, and undergoe any conditions of Tribute, or whatsoever else to obtain protection: which the Romans, although both Countries had been their Confederates, yet not willing that the greater, like fish, should devour the lesse, easily allowed of; aiming themselves at the good situation of Campania, the abundance of Corne and Wine, pleasant Cities and Towns, but especially Capua it self, the fairest City then in all Italy.

The families of the Papyrii and Fabii were most employed in the managing of this War, which endured the space of fifty years. And in this season were the Romans often-times dangerously encountred by the Samnites, as when T. Veturius and Sp. Posthumus were Consuls, and discomfited by Pontius at Caudium, with no small ignominy: and when Q. Fabius Gurges lost the field with three thousand men. But for those losses, many great victories made large amends: The greatest whereof were gotten by L. Papyrius, and by Quintus Fabius Maximus.

The Samnites drew the Hetrurians into their quarrell. But the force of the Samnites was well broken, ere the Hetrurians (the greater and richer, but lesse warlike Nation) began to stir. So the one and the other of these two Countries, became at length, tributary to Rome. In the continuance of this long war it was, (though in time of truce between the Romans and Samnites) that the Latines began to challenge equal freedom in the Corporation of Rome, and right in bearing office, so that they required to have one of the Consuls yearly chosen out of them.

This demand of the Latines was not unreasonable. For the Romans themselves were a Latine Colony; besides all which, they made offer to change their name, and to be all called Romans. But the Romans were too proud to admit any such capitulation. So a great battell was fought between them: wherein the fortune of Rome prevailed, by the vertue of the Consuls.

Manlius

Manlius Torquatus and the elder Decius were then Consuls, whom the Soothsayers advertised, that the side should be victorious which lost the Generall in fight. Hereupon Decius the Consull expos'd his life to the enemy, and purchas'd victory (as was beleev'd) by his death. In which kind of devoting himself for his Army, the son of this Decius being after Consull, did imitate his father in the Hetrurian war. But (as Tully well notes) it was rather the desperate resolution of these Decii, that purchas'd victory, by rushing into the midst of the enemies, wherein their Souldiers followed them, than any great commendation of such a religion, as required the lives of so worthy Citizens, to be sacrific'd for their Country. The discipline of Manlius was no lesse resolute, than the valour of Decius. He forbade any one to forsake his place, and fight single with an enemy. For breach of which order he caused his own son to be put to death, who had slain a Captain of the Latines, being challenged in single fight.

When the Latines, the Aequi, Volsci, Hernici, Campani, Samnites, and Hetrurians, with some other people, were brought under obedience; it was a vain labour for any people of Italy to contend against the Romans.

Yet the Sabines adventured to try their fortune, and found it bad. For Curius Dentatus, the Roman Consull, waisting all their Country with fire and sword, from the River Ner and Velia, to the Adriatique Sea, brought them into quiet subjection.

The last of the Italians that made triall of the Roman arms, were the Tarentines and their adherents. These had interpos'd themselves as mediators between the Romans and Samnites; with a peremptory denunciation of War, unto that party which should dare to refuse peace by them tendred. These threats which discovered their bad affection unto Rome, ended in words; but when the Samnites were utterly subdued, matter enough of quarrell was found to examine their ability of performance.

The Romans complained that certain ships of theirs were robbed, and sent Embassadors unto Tarentum, to require amends. Upon some wrong done to these Embassadors, was laid the foundation of that War, wherein the Lucans, Messapians, Brutians, and Apulians, joyning with the Tarentines, procur'd the Samnites, and other Subjects of Rome to rebell and take their part. But some experience of the Roman strength, taught all these people to know their own weakesse. Wherefore they agreed to send for Pyrrhus, by whose aid (being a Grecian, as the Tarentines also were) great hope was conceived, that the Dominion of Rome should be confin'd unto more narrow bounds than all Italy, which already in a manner it did over-spread.

§. II.

How Pyrrhus warred upon the Romans, and vanquished them in two battells.

Pyrrhus, forsaken by the Macedonians, and unable to deale with Lyfismachus, was compelled a while to live in rest: which he abhorred no lesse than a wiser Prince would have desired. He had a strong Army, and a good Fleet, which in that unsettled estate of things, was enough to purchase a Kingdom: but the fall of Demetrius had so increased the power of Lyfismachus, that it was no point of wisdom to make an offensive war upon him, without far greater forces: Antigonus, the son of Demetrius, held Corinth at the same time, and some other Towns, with the remainder of his Fathers Army and treasures, left in his hand. Upon him it is like that Pyrrhus might have won; but it was better to let him alone, that he might serve to give some hindrance to Lyfismachus.

In this want of employment, and covetous desire of finding it, the Tarentine Embassadors came very fitly to Pyrrhus: and they came with brave offers, as needing no other aid than his good conduct, which to obtain, they would cast themselves under his protection. They had in their companie some of the Samnites, Lucanians, Messapians, and others, which promised, in behalf of their severall Nations, as much as could be desired. This encouraged Pyrrhus, and filled him with hopes of goodly conquests; that he might enlarge his Empire to the West, as far as Alexander had gotten Eastward; and still by one victory open the gate unto another. To which effect it is said, that once he answered Cynceas his chief Counsellour, asking what he meant to doe after every of the victories which he hoped to get: that having won Rome, he would soon be Master of all Italy; that, after Italy he would quickly get the Isle of Sicily; that, out of Sicill, he would passe over into Affrick, and win Carthage, with all the rest of the Country; and being strengthened with the force of all these Provinces, he would be too hard for any of those that were now so proud and troublesome. But Cyneas enquired yet further, what they should doe, when they were Lords of all. Whereunto Pyrrhus (finding his drift) answered pleasantly, that they would live merrily; a thing (as Cyneas then told him) that they presently might doe, without any trouble, if he could be contented with his own.

Neverthelesse, this Italian expedition seemed unto Pyrrhus a matter of such consequence, as was not to be omitted, in regard of any scholasticall disputation. Wherefore he prepared his Army, of almost thirty thousand men, well sorted, and well trained soldiers: part of which he sent over before him under Cyneas, with the rest he followed in person. At his coming, he found the Tarentines, very prompt of tongue, but in matter of execution, utterly carelesse to provide for the war. Wherefore he was faine to shut up their Theater, and other places of pleasure and resort, enforcing them to take armes, and making such a strict muster, as was to them very unpleasing, though greatly behooving to their estate.

Whilest he was occupied with these cares, Levinus the Roman Consul drew neer, and began to waste Lucania, a Province confederate with the Tarentines in this War.

The Lucanians were not ready to defend their own Country; the Samnites were carelesse of the harm, that fell not (as yet) upon themselves; the Tarentines were better prepared than they would have been, but their valour was little: all of these had been accustomed to shrink for feare of the Roman fortitude: and therefore it fell out happily, that Pyrrhus relied more upon his own forces, than the issue of their vaunting promises. He was now driven either to set forward with those that himself had brought into Italy, and the assistance of the Tarentines, wherein little was to be reposed; or else to weaken the reputation of his own sufficiency, which by all meanes he was carefull to uphold. In good time a great part of his forces, that had been scattered by foule weather at Sea, were safely come to him: with which he resolved to assay the valour of the Romans, against whom he proudly marched.

Levinus the Consul was not affrighted with the terrible name of a great King; but came on confidently to meet him, and give him battell ere all his adherents should be ready to joyne with him. This boldnesse of the Roman, and the slacknesse of the Messapians, Lucanians, Samnites, and others, whom the danger most concerned, caused Pyrrhus to offer a treaty of peace: requiring to have the quarrell between the Romans and his Italian friends, referred to his arbitrement. Whether he did this to win time, that the Samnites and their fellowes might arrive at his Camp; or whether, considering better at neer distance, the weight of the business which he had taken in hand, he were desirous to quit it with his honour; the short answer that was returned to his proposition, gave him no meanes of either the one or the other: for the Romans sent him this word, that they had neither chosen him their Judge, nor feared him their enemy.

Hereupon both Armies hastned their march unto the River of Siris: Levinus intending to fight before the arrival of the Samnites; Pyrrhus, to hinder him from passing that River, until his own Army were full. Upon the first view of the Roman Camp, it was readily conceived by Pyrrhus, that he had not now to doe with barbarous people, but with men well trained in a brave discipline of War: which caused him to set a strong Corps de garde upon the passage of the river, that he might not be compelled to fight, until he saw his best advantage. But he quickly found, that this new enemy was not only skilfull in the Art of War, but courageous in execution. For the Roman Army entred the Foord, in face of his Corps de garde; and their horse, at the same time began to passe the River in sundry places: which caused the Greeks to forsake the defence of their bank, and speedily retire unto their Camp.

This audacity forced Pyrrhus to battell; wherewith he thought it best to present them, ere the whole Army had recovered firme footing, and were in order. So directing his Captaines how to marshall his battels; himself with the horse, charged upon the Romans: who stoutly received him as men well exercised in sustaining furious impressions. In this fight, neither did his courage transport him beyond the duty of a carefull Generall; nor his providence in directing others, hinder the manifestation of his personal valour. It behooved him indeed to do his best; for he never met with better

opposers. Once, and shortly after the fight began, his horse was slain under him: afterwards, he changed armour with a friend; but that friend paid his life for the use of his Kings armour, which was torne from his back. This accident had almost lost him the battell: but he perceiving it, discovered his face, and thereby restored courage to his men, and took from the Romans their vain joy. The fight was obstinate, and with the greater losse (at least of more eminent men) on Pyrrhus his side, as long as onely speer and sword were used. But when the Elephants were brought into the wings, whose usual form and terrible aspect, the horses of the Romans (unaccustomed to the like) were not able to sustain; then was the victory quickly gotten. For the Roman battels, perceiving their horse put to the rout, and driven out of the field; finding also themselves both charged in flanke, and over-borne, by the force and huge bulke of those strange beasts; gave way to necessity, and saved themselves, as well as they could, by halfe flight: in which conformation, they were so forgetfull of their discipline, that they tarried not to defend their Camp, but ran quite beyond it, leaving both it, and the honour of the day, entirely to Pyrrhus.

The fame of this victory was soon spread over Italy; and the reputation was no lesse than the fame. For it was a matter very rare to be heard, that a Roman Consul, with a select Army, should lose in plain battell, not onely the Field, but the Camp it self, being so notably fortified as they alwaies were. And this honour was the more bravely won by Pyrrhus, for that he had with him none of his Italian friends, save the unwarlike Tarentines. Neither could he well dissemble his content that he took, in having the glory of this action peculiarly his own, at such time as he blamed the Lucans and Samnites, for coming (as we say) a day after the Faire. Neverthelesse he wisely considered the strength of the Romans, which was such, as would better endure many such losses, than he could many such victories. Therefore he thought it good to compound with them, whilest with his honour he might; and to that purpose he sent unto them Cyneas his Embassadour, demanding only to have the Tarentines permitted to live at rest, and himself accepted as their especial friend. This did Cyneas, with all his cunning, and with liberal gifts labour to effect: but neither man nor woman could be found in Rome, that would take any bribe of him; neither did their desire of recovering their captives, or their danger, by the rising of many States in Italy against them, so incline them to peace, as the vehement exhortation of Appius Claudius, an old and blinde Senatour, did stirre them up to make good their honour by war. So they returned answer, that whilest Pyrrhus abode in Italy, they would come to no agreement with him.

Such was the report that Cyneas made at his return, of the Roman puissance and verime, as kindled in Pyrrhus a great desire of confederacie with that gallant City. Hereupon many kind Offices passed between them: but still when he urged his motion of peace, the answer was; He must first depart out of Italy, and then treat of peace.

In the meane season, each part made provision for war; the Romans levying a more mighty army than the former; and Pyrrhus being strengthened with access unto his forces of all the East parts of Italy. So they came to triall of a second battell, wherein (though after long and cruell fight) the boisterous violence of the Elephants gave to Pyrrhus a second victory. But this was not altogether so joyfull as the former had been: rather it gave him cause to say, that such another victory would be his utter undoing. For he had lost the flower of his Army in this battell: and though he drave the Romans into their Camp, yet he could not force them out of it, nor saw any likelihood of prevailing against them, that were like to be relieved with daily supplies, whilest he should be driven to spend upon his old stock. Neither could he expect that his Elephants should alwaies stand him in stead. A little knowledge of their manner in fight would soon teach the Romans, that were apt Schollers in such learning, how to make them unserviceable. Wherefore he desired nothing more, than how to carry his honour safe out of Italy: which to doe (seeing the Romans would not help him, by offering or accepting any fair conditions of peace, or of truce) he took a sleight occasion, presented by fortune, that followeth to be related.

§. III.

The great troubles in Macedon and Sicill. How Pyrrhus, being invited into Sicill, forsook Italy, won the most of the Isle; and lost it in short space. Pyrrhus returns into Italie, where he is beaten by the Romans, and so goes back to his own Kingdom.

When Ptolomie Ceraunus had traiterously murdered his Benefactor and Patron Seleucus, he presently seized upon all the Dominions of Lysimachus in Europe, as if they had been the due reward unto him, that had slain the Conqueror. The houses of Cassander and Lysimachus were then fallen to the ground: neither was there in Macedon any man of strength and reputation enough to advance himself against Ceraunus. The friends of Lysimachus were rather pleased to have him their King, that had (as he professed) revenged their Lords death; than any way offended with the odiousness of his fact, by which they were freed from subjection, to one, against whom they had stood in opposition. Many there were, that upon remembrance of his fathers great virtue, gathered hope of finding the like in Ceraunus: perswading themselves that his reign might prove good, though his entrance had been wicked. These affections of the Macedonians did serve to defeat Antigonus the son of Demetrius, that made an attempt upon the Kingdom. As for Antigonus the son of Seleucus, he was far off, and might be questioned about some part of Asia, ere he should be able to bring an Army neer unto Europe. Yet he made great shew of meaning to revenge his Fathers death: but being stronger in money than in armes, he was content, after a while, to take fair words, and make peace with the murtherer. While these three strove about the Kingdom, Pyrrhus, who thought his claim as good as any of theirs, made use of their dissention: threatening war, or promising his assistance to every one of them. By these means he strengthened himself, and greatly advantaged his Italian voyage, which he had then in hand: requesting money of Antiochus, ships of Antigonus, and souldiers of Ptolomie, who gave him his daughter in marriage, and lent him a strong power of Macedonian Souldiers, and of Elephants (covenanting to have them restored at two yeeres end) more for fear than for love: that so he might free himself from trouble, and quietly enjoy his Kingdom.

Thus Ptolomie grew mighty on the sudden; and the power that by wicked means he had gotten, by means as wicked he encreased.

All Macedon and Thrace being his, the strong City of Cassandria was held by Arsinoe his sister, the widow of Lysimachus, who lay therein with her young children. Her he circumvented by making love to her, and (according to the fashion of those times, wherein Princes regarded no degree of consanguinity) taking her to wife, with promise to adopt her children: a promise that he meant not to performe; for it was not long, ere he slew them, and drave her into exile.

In the pride of this good successe, which his villanie found, vengeance came upon him from a far, by the furie of a Nation that he never heard of. Belgus a Captain of the Gauls, having forced his passage through many Countries, unto the confines of Macedon, sent a proud message to Ceraunus, commanding him to buy peace with money, or otherwise, to look for all the miseries of war. These Gauls were the race of those, that issued out of their Country, to seek new seates in that great expedition, wherein Brennus took and burnt the City of Rome. They had divided themselves, at their setting forth, into two companies; of which the one fell upon Italie; the other, passing through the Countries that lye on the Northerne side of the Adriatick Sea, made long abode in Pannonia, and the Regions adjoyning, where they forced all the neighbour Princes to redeem peace with tribute, as now they would have compelled Ceraunus to doe: unto whose borders they came about an hundred and eight yeeres after such time as their fellows had taken Rome.

When their Embassadors came to Ptolomie, asking what he would give: his answer was, that he would be contented to give them peace, but it must be with condition, that they should put into his hands their Princes as hostages, and yeeld up their armes; for otherwise, he would neither pardon their boldnesse, nor give any credit to their words. At this answer, when it was returned, the Gauls did laugh; saying, That they would soon confute with deeds, the vanitie of such proud words. It may seem strange, that that he, who had given away part of his Army unto Pyrrhus, for very feare; should be so confident in undertaking more mighty enemies. The King of the Dardaniens offered to lend him twenty thousand men against the Gauls: but he scorned the offer, saying, That he had the children of those, which under the conduct of Alexander had subdued all the East. Thus he issued forth against all the barbarous people with his famous Macedonians, as if the victory must needs have followed the reputation of a great name. But he soon found his great error when it was too late. For the Enemies were not onely equal in strength of body, and fiercenesse of courage, but so far superiour to the Macedonians in number, that few or none escaped their furie. Ptolomie himself grievously wounded, fell into their hands, whilst the battell continued; and they presently strook off his head, which they shewed to his men, on the top of a Lance, to their utter astonishment.

The report of this great overthrow filled all Macedon with such desperation, that the people fled into walled Towns, and abandoned the whole Country as lost. Onely Sothenes, a valiant Captain, animating as many as he could, gathered a small Army, with which he many times got the upper hand, and hindred Belgus from using the victory at his whole pleasure. In regard of this his vertue, the Souldiers would have made him King; which title he refused, and was contented with the name of a General. But (as mischiefs doe seldom come alone) the good successe of Belgus drew into Macedon, Brennus, another Captain of the Gauls, with an hundred and fifty thousand foot, and fifteen thousand horse; against which mighty Army, when Sothenes with his weak troupes made opposition, he was easily beaten, and the Macedonians again compelled to hide themselves within their wals, leaving all their Country to the spoil of the Barbarians.

Thus were the Macedonians destitute of a King, and trodden down by a Nation that they had not heard of, in lesse than fifty yeeres after the death of Alexander, who sought to discover and subdue unknown Countries, as if all Greece, and the Empire of Persia had been too little for a King of Macedon.

Very seasonably had these newes been carried to Pyrrhus in Italy, who sought a faire pretext of relinquishing his War with the Romans; had not other tidings out of Sicill distracted him, and carried him away in pursuit of nearer hopes. For after the death of Agathocles, who reigned over the whole Island, the Carthaginians sent an Army to conquer Sicill, out of which, by him, they had been expelled. This Army did so fast prevail, that the Sicilians had no other hope to avoid slavery, then in submitting themselves to the rule of Pyrrhus; whom, being a Grecian, and a noble Prince, they thought it more for their good to obey, than to live under the well known heavey yoke of Carthage. To him therefore the Syracusans, Leontines, and Agragantines, principall Estates of the Isle, sent Embassadors, earnestly desiring him to take them into his protection.

It grieved Pyrrhus exceedingly, that two such notable occasions of enlarging his Dominions, should fall out so unluckily, both at one time. Yet whether he thought the business of Sicill more important, or more full of likelihood; or whether perhaps he believed (as came after to passe) that his advantage upon Macedon would not so hastily passe away, but that he might find some occasion to lay hold on it at better leisure; over into Sicill he transported his army, leaving the Tarentines to shift for themselves; yet not leaving them free as he found them, but with a Garrison in their town to hold them in subjection.

As his departure out of Italy was rather grounded on head-long passion, than mature advice; so were his actions following, untill his returne unto Epirus, rather many and tumultuous, than well ordered or note-worthy. The Army which he carried into that Isle, consisted of thirty thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse: with which, soon after his descent into Sicill, he forc't the Carthaginians out of all, in effect, that they had therein. He also won the strong City of Eryx, and having beaten the Murtines in battell; he began to change condition, and turne Tyrant. For he drave Sostratus to whom his cruelty was suspected out of the Island, & put Themon of Siracuse to death, being jealous of his greatness; which two persons had faithfully served him, and delivered the great and rich City of Syracuse into his hands. After this, his fortunes declined so fast, as he served himself, and saved the dis-reputation of his leaving Sicill, by an Embassage sent him from the Tarentines, and Samnites, imploring his present help against against the Romans, who since his leaving Italy, had well-near dispossessed them of all that they had.

Taking this fair occasion, he embarked for Italy; but was first beaten by the Carthaginian Gallies in his passage, and secondly assailed in Italy it self, by eighteen hundred Mamertines, that attended him in the straits of the Country. Lastly, after he had recovered Tarentum, he fought a third battell with the Romans, led by M. Curius, who was victorious over him, and forc't him out of Italy into his own Epirus.

A Prince he was far more valiant than constant, and had been but a General of an Army for some other great King or State, and had been directed to have conquered any one Country or Kingdom, it is to be thought, that he would have purchased no less honour than any man of war, either preceeding or succeeding him; for a greater Captain, or a valiant man, hath been no where found. But he never stayed upon any enterprise; which was, indeed, the disease he had, whereof not long after he died in Argos.

§. IV.

How Antigonus, the son of Demetrius, delivered Macedon from the Gauls. How Pyrrhus won the Kingdom of Macedon from Antigonus.

THE vertue of Sotheneus being too weak to defend the kingdom of Macedon; and the fortune which had accompanied him against Belgius, failing him in his attempts against Brennus: the Macedonians were no less glad to submit themselves unto the government of Antigonus, than they had been formerly desirous to free themselves from the impotent rule of his father Demetrius. His coming into the Country with an Army, Navie, and Treasure befeeming a King, did rather breed good hope in the people, than fill them with much confidence: for he was driven to use against the Barbarians, only those forces which he brought with him, having none other than good wilhes of the Macedons to take his part. Brennus with the main strength of his Army, was gone to spoil the Temple of Apollo at Delphos, having left no more behind him, than he thought necessarie to guard the borders of Macedon and Pannonia; which were about fifteen thousand foot, and three thousand horse. These could not be idle, but thought to get somewhat for themselves, in the absence of their fellowes; and therefore sent unto Antigonus, offering to sell him peace, if he would pay well for it; which by the example of Ceraunus, he had learnt (as they thought) not to refuse. Antigonus was unwilling to weaken his reputation by condescending to their proud demands; yet he judged it unfit to exaspate their furious choler, by uncourteous words or usage, as Ceraunus had overfondly done. Wherefore he entertained their Embassadours in very loving and sumptuous manner, with a royall feast: wherein he exposed to their view such abundance of masse gold and silver, that they were not so much delighted with the meat, as with sight of the vessels, wherein it was served. He thought hereby to make them understand how great a Prince he was, & how able if need required, to wage a mighty army.

To which end, he likewise did shew unto them his Camp and Navy, but especially his Elephants. But all this bravery served onely to kindle their greedy appetites; who seeing his ships heavy laden, his Camp full of wealth, and ill fortified, (himself as it seemed) secure, and his men, both in strength and courage, inferiour unto the Gauls, thought all time lost, wherein they suffered the present possessors to spend the riches which they accounted assuredly their own. They returned therefore to their companions with none other news in their mouths, than of spoile and purchase: which tale carried the Gauls head-long to Antigonus his Camp, where they expected a greater booty, than the victory over Ceraunus had given to Belgius. Their coming was terrible and sudden; yet not so sudden, but that Antigonus had notice of it, who distrusting the courage of his own men, dislodged somewhat before their arrivall, and conveyed himself, with his whole army and carriage, into certain woods adjoining, where he lay close.

The Gauls, finding his Camp forsaken, were not hasty to pursue him but fell to ransacking the emptie Cabbins of the Souldiers; in hope of finding all that was either lost or hidden. At length, when they had searched every place in vaine, angry at their lost labour, they marched with all speed towards the Sea-side; that they might fall upon him, whilst he was busie in getting his men and carriages a ship-board. But the success was no way answerable to their expectation. For being proud of the terror which they had brought upon Antigonus, they were so careless of the Sea-men, that without all order, they fell to the spoile of what they found on the shore, and in such ships as lay on ground.

Part of the Army had left Antigonus, where he lay in covert; and had saved it self by getting aboard the fleet: in which number were some well experienced men of war: who discovering the much advantage offered unto them, by the desperate presumption of their enemies, took courage, and encouraged others to lay manly hold upon the opportunity. So the whole number, both of Souldiers and Mariners, landing together, with great resolution, gave so brave a charge upon the disordered Gauls, that their contemptuous boldnesse was thereby changed into sudden fear, and they, after a great slaughter, driven to cast themselves into the service of Antigonus.

The fame of this victory caused all the barbarous Nations in those quarters to re-entertain their ancient beleef of the Macedonian valour: by which the terrible and restless oppressors of so many Countries were overthrown.

To speak more of the Gauls in this place, and to shew how, about these times, three Tribes of them passed over into Asia the less, with their wars and conquests there; I hold it needlesse: the victorious Armies of the Romans taming them hereafter in the Countries which now they wan, shall give better occasion to rehearse these matters briefly.

Howsoever the good success of Antigonus got him reputation among the barbarous people, yet his own Souldiers, that without his leading had won this victory, could not thereupon be perswaded to think him a good man of war: knowing that he had no interest in the honour of the service, wherein his conduct was no better than creeping into a wood.

This (as presently will appear) was greatly helpfull unto Pyrrhus: though as yet he knew not so much. For Pyrrhus, when his affaires in Italy stood upon hard termes, had sent unto Antigonus for help: not without threats, in case it were denied. So was he sure to get either a supply, wherewith to continue his war against the Romans, or some seeming honourable pretence, to forsake Italy, under colour of making his word good, in seeking revenge. The threats which he had used in bravery, meer necessity forced him at his return into Epirus, to put in practise.

He brought home with him eight thousand foot, and five hundred horse: an Army too little to be employed, by his restless nature, in any action of importance; yet greater than he had means to keep in pay. Therefore he fell upon Macedon; intending to take what spoile he could get, and make Antigonus compound with him, to be freed from trouble. At his first entrance into this business, two thousand of Antigonus his souldiers revolted unto Pyrrhus; and many Cities, either willingly or perforce, received him. Such fair beginnings easily perswaded the courage of this daring Prince, to set upon Antigonus himself, and to hazard his fortune, in triall of a battell, for the whole Kingdom of Macedon.

It appears, that Antigonus had no desire to fight with this hot warriour; but thought it the wisest way, by protracting of time, to weary him out of the country. For Pyrrhus overtook him in a streight passage, and charged him in the reare; wherein were the Gauls and the Elephants, which were thought the best of his strength: a manifest proof that he was in retreat. The Gauls very bravely sustained Pyrrhus his impression; yet were broken at length (when most of them were slain) after a sharp fight: wherein it seems that Antigonus keeping his Macedonian Phalanx within the streight, and not advancing to their succour, took away their courage by deceiving their expectation. The Captaines of the Elephants were taken soon after, who finding themselves exposed to the same violence that had consumed so many of the Gauls, yielded themselves and the beasts. All this was done in full view of Antigonus & his Macedonians, to their great discomfort; which emboldned Pyrrhus to charge them where they lay in their strength. Where the Phalanx could be charged onely in a front, it was a matter of extreme difficulty (if not impossible) to force it. But the Macedonians had seen so much, that they had no desire to fight against Pyrrhus; who discovered so well their affections, that he adventured to draw neer in person, and exhort them to yeeld. Neither the common Souldier nor any Leader refused to become his follower. All forsooke Antigonus, a few horsemen excepted, that fled along with him to Theſſalonica; where he had some small forces left, and money enough to entertain a greater power, had he known where to levie it. But whilest he was thinking how to allure a sufficient number of the Gauls into his service; whereby he might repaire his losse: Ptolomie, the son of Pyrrhus, came upon him, and easily defeating his weak forces, drave him to flee from the parts about Macedon, to those Towns afar off in Peloponnesus, in which he had formerly lurked, before such time as he looked abroad into the world, and made himself a King.

This good successe revived the spirits of the Epirot, and caused him to forget all sorrow of his late mis-fortunes in the Roman War: so that he sent for his son Helinus (whom he had left with a Garrison, in the Castle of Tarentum) willing him to come over into Greece, where was more matter of conquest, and let the Italians shift for themselves.

§. V.

How Pyrrhus assailed Sparta without successe. His enterprize upon Argos, and his death.

Pyrrhus had now conceived a great hope that nothing should be able to withstand him; seeing that in open fight he had vanquished the Gauls, and beaten Antigonus, and won the Kingdom of Macedon. There was not in all Greece, nor, indeed, in all the Lands that Alexander had won, any Leader of such name and worth, as deserved to be set up against him: which filled him with the opinion that he might do what he pleased. He raised therefore an Army, consisting of five and twenty thousand foot, two thousand horse, and four and twenty Elephants; pretending war against Antigonus, and the giving liberty to those Towns in Peloponnesus, which the same Antigonus held in subjection; though it was easily discovered, that such great preparations were made, for accomplishment of some designe more important than war against a Prince already vanquished, and almost utterly dejected. Especially the Lacedemonians feared this expedition, as made against their State. For Cleonymus, one of their Kings, being expelled out of his Country, had betaken himself to Pyrrhus: who readily entertained him, and promised to restore him to his Kingdom. This promise was made in secret; neither would Pyrrhus make shew of any displeasure that he bare unto Sparta; but contrariwise professed, that it was his intent, to have two of his own younger sons trained up in that City, as in a place of noble discipline. With such colours he deluded men, even till he entred upon Laconia; where presently he demeaned himself as an open enemy; excusing himself and his former dissembling words with a jest; That he followed herein the Lacedemonian custome, of concealing what was truly proposed. It had been, indeed, the manner of the Lacedemonians, to deale in like sort with others, whom, in the time of their greatnesse, they sought to oppresse: but now they complained of that, as fallhood, in Pyrrhus, which they alwayes practised in wisdom, till it made them distrusted, forsaken, and almost contemptible. Nevertheless, they were not wanting to themselves in this dangerous extremity. For the old men and women laboured in fortifying the Town; causing such as could beare armes to reserve themselves fresh against the assault: which Pyrrhus had unwisely deferred, upon assurance of prevailing.

Sparta was never fortified, before this time, otherwise than with armed Citizens: soon after this (it being built upon uneven ground, and, for the most part, hard to approach) the lower & more accessible places, were fenced with wals, at the present only trenches were cast, & barricadoes made with carts, where the entrance seemed most easie. Three dayes together it was assailed by Pyrrhus exceeding fiercely; and no lesse stoutly defended. The desperate courage of the Citizens preserved the town the first day; whereinto the violence of Pyrrhus had forced entrance the second day, but that his wounded horse threw him to the ground, which made his Souldiers more mindfull of saving the person of their King, than of breaking into the City, though already they had

soon in sunder the Barricadoes. Presently after this, one of Antigonus his Captains got into Sparta with a good strength of men; and Arcus the King returned out of Crete (where he had been helping his friends in war) with two thousand men, little knowing the danger, in which his own Country stood, untill he was almost at home. These succours did not more animate the Spartans, than kindle in Pyrrhus a desire to prevail against all impediments. But the third dayes work shewed how great his error had been, in forbearing to assault the Town at his first coming. For he was so manfully repelled, that he saw no likelihood of getting the place, otherwise than by a long siege: in which tedious course he had no desire to spend his time.

Antigonus had now raised an Army, though not strong enough to meet the Enemy in plain field, yet able to hinder all his purposes. This made Pyrrhus doubtfull what way to take; being diversly affected, by the difficulty of his enterprize in hand, and the shame of taking a repulse in his first attempt. Whilest he was thus perplexed, letters came from Argos, inviting him thither; with promise to deliver that City into his hands.

Civill dissention raging then hotly in Argos, caused the heads of severall factions to call in Pyrrhus and Antigonus; but the coming of these two Princes taught the Citizens wit, and made them desirous to rid their hands of such powerfull assistants, as each of the two Kings pretended himself to be. Antigonus told the Argives, that he came to save them from the tyrannie of Pyrrhus: and that he would be gone, if they needed not his help. On the other side, Pyrrhus would needs perswade them, that he had none other errand, than to make them safe from Antigonus; offering in like manner, to depart, if they so desired.

The Argives took small pleasure in hearing the Fox and Kite at strife, which of them should keep the Chickens from his enemy: and therefore prayed them both to divert their powers some other way. Hereunto Antigonus readily condescended, and gave hostages to assure his word: for he was the weaker, and stood in need of good will. But Pyrrhus thought it enough to promise: Hostages he would give none to his inferiours: especially meaning deceit. This made them suspect his purpose to be such, as indeed it was. Yet he lesse regarded their opinions, than to hold them worthy of assurance, by giving such a bond, as he intended to break ere the next morning.

It was concluded, that a Gate of the City should be opened by night unto Pyrrhus, by his Complices within Argos: which was accordingly performed. So his Army without any tumult entred the City: till the Elephants, with Towers on their backs, cloyed the way, being too high to passe the Gate. The taking off, and setting on again of those Towers, with the trouble thereto belonging, did both give alarme to the Citie, and some leasure to take order for defence, before so many were entred, as could fully master it. Argos was full of ditches, which greatly hindered the Gauls (that had the Vantguard) being ignorant of the wayes in the dark night. The Citizens, on the other side, had much advantage, by their knowledge of every by-passage: and setting upon the enemies on all sides, did put them to great losse and more trouble.

Pyrrhus therefore understanding by the confused noise, and unequall shoutings of his own men, that they were in distresse, entred the City in person, to take order for their relief, and assurance of the place. But the darknesse, the throng, and many other impediments, kept him from doing any thing of moment, untill break of day. Then began he to make his passage by force, and so far prevailed, that he got into the Market-place. It is said, that seeing in that place the Image of a Wolfe and a Bull, in such posture as if they had been combatant, he called to minde an Oracle, which threatened him with death, when he should behold a Bull fighting with a Wolfe: and that hereupon he made retrait.

Indeed, the coming of Antigonus to the rescue, the disorder and confusion of his own men, with divers ill accidents, gave him reasonable cause to have retired out of the City, though the Wolfe and Bull had been away. The tumult was such, that no directions could be heard; but as some gave back, so did others thrust forward, and the Argives pressing hard upon him, forced Pyrrhus to make good his retrait with his own own sword. The tops of the houses were covered with women, that stood looking on the fight. Among these was one, that saw her own son in dangerous case, fighting with Pyrrhus. Wherefore she took a tile-stone, or slate, and threw it so violently down on the head of Pyrrhus, that he fell to ground astonished with the blow; and lying in that case, had his head cut off.

Thus ended the restless ambition of Pyrrhus, together with his life: and thereupon turned the Kingdome of Macedon to Antigonus; who forthwith possessed the Army, the body and the children of his Enemy. The body of Pyrrhus had honourable buriall, and was given by Antigonus unto Helemus his son; which young Prince he graciously sent home into his fathers Kingdome of Epirus. From this time forwards, the race of Antigonus held the Kingdome of Macedon; the posterity of Seleucus reigned over Asia and Syria; and the house of Ptolomy had quiet possession of Egypt: untill such time as the Citie of Rome, swallowing all up, digested these, among other Countries, into the body of her owne Empire.

THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORY OF THE WORLD;

In treating of the times from the settled rule of ALEXANDERS Successors in the East, untill the ROMANS, prevailing over all, made Conquest of ASIA and MACEDON.

THE FIFTH BOOK.

CHAP. I.

Of the first Punick War.

That question of that problem of Livie; Whether the Romans could have resisted the great Alexander. That neither the Macedonian nor the Roman Soldier was of equal value to the English.

That question, handled by Livie; Whether the great Alexander could have prevailed against the Romans. If after his Eastern conquest, he had bent all his forces against them, hath been, and is the subject of much dispute; which (as it seems to me) the arguments on both sides do not so well explain, as doth the experience that Pyrrhus hath given of the Roman power in his dayes. For if he, a Commander (in Hannibals judgement) inferior to Alexander, though to none else could match him in two battles, and endanger their Estate, when it was well settled, and the best part of Italy, under a confirmed obedience: what would Alexander have done that was abundantly provided of all which is needfull to a Conquerour, wanting no matter of employment, coming upon them before their Dominion was half so enlarged? It is easie to say, that Alexander had no more than thirty thousand foot, and four thousand horse (as indeed, in his first passage into Asia, he carried over not more), and that the rest of his followers were no better than half effeminate Asians. But he that considers the Armies of Perseus, Antipater, Cleitus, Eumenes, Philotas, Antigonus, and Lysimachus, with the actions by them performed; every one of them (to omit others) commanded only some fragment of this dead Emperours power shall easily finde, that such a reckoning is far short of the truth. And it were needlesse to speak of Treasure, Horses, Elephants, Engines of battery, and the

the like of all which the Macedonian had abundance; the Roman having nought, save men and armes. As for Sea-forces, she that shall consider after what sort the Romans, in their first Punic War, were trained in the rudiments of Navigation; sitting upon the shoare, and beating the land with poles, to practice the stroke of the Oare, as not daring to launch their ill-built vessels into the Sea; will easily conceive how far too weak they would have proved in such services.

Now for Helpers in War; I do not see why all Greece and Macedon, being absolutely compassed by Alexander, might not well deserve to be laid in ballance against the whole parts of Italy, which the Romans held in ill-assured subjection. To omit therefore all benefit that the Eastern world, more wealthy, indeed, than valiant, could have afforded unto the Macedonians, let us only conjecture, how the States of Sicily and Carthage, their neighbours, so soon a quarrel (that it happened) would have stood affected. The Sicilians were for the most part Grecians; neither is it to be doubted, that they would readily have submitted themselves unto him, that ruled all Greece besides them. In what termes they commonly stood, and how ill they were able to defend themselves, it shall appeare anon. Sure it is, that Alexander, coming into those parts, would have brought excessive joy to them, that were then to get the help of Pyrhus, by offering to become his Subjects. As for the Carthaginians, if Agathocles the Tyrant of Syracuse, Lord of his people, and able to defend his own besieged City, could by adventuring to saile into Africk, put their Dominion, yea, and Carthage it self, in extreme hazard; shall we think that they would have been able to withstand Alexander? But why doe I question their ability, seeing that they sent Embassadours, with their submission, as far as Babylon, ere the War drew neer them? Wherefore it is manifest, that the Romans must, without other succour, than perhaps of some other few Italian friends (of which yet there were none that forsook them not, at some time, both before and after this) have opposed their valour and good military discipline, against the power of all Countries to them known, if they would have made resistance. How they could have sped well, in undertaking such a match; it is uneasie to finde in discourse of humane reason. It is true, that vertue and fortune worke wonders: but it is against cowardly fooles, and the unfortunate: for whosoever contends with one too mighty for him; either must excell in these, as much as his enemy goes beyond him in power; or else must looke both to be overcome, and to be cast down so much the lower, by how much the opinion of his fortune and vertue renders him suspected, as likely to make head another time against the vanquisher. Whether the Roman or the Macedonian were in those dayes the better Souldier, I will not take upon me to determine: though I might without partiality, deliver mine own opinion, and preferre that Army, which followed not only Philip and Alexander, but also Alexander's Princes after him, in the greatest dangers of all sorts of War, before any, that Rome either had, or in long time after did stand forth. Concerning fortune, who can give a rule that shall alwayes hold? Alexander was victorious in every battell that he fought; and the Romans in the issue of every war. But forasmuch as Lioie hath judged this a matter worthy of consideration, that it a great part of Rome's good fortune, that Alexander came not into Italy: where in some years after his death, the two Roman consuls, together with all the powers of the State, were surprised by the Sansons, and enforced to yeeld up their arms. We may therefore permit Lioie to admire his own Romans, and to compare with Alexander's Captains of theirs, which were honoured sufficiently, in being thought equal to his followers; in the same conceit should blind our judgement, we cannot permit without much vanity, to compare Alexander's battell, with Rome's.

Now in deciding such a controversie, I think it were not amiss, for an Englishman, to give such a sentence between the Macedonians and Romans, as the Romans themselves (being chosen Arbitrators) between the Arabs and Arians, that strove about a piece of land, saying that it belonged unto neither of them, but unto the Romans, themselves.

If therefore it be demanded, whether the Macedonians, or the Romans were the best Warriours, I will answer, The Englishman. For it will soon appeare to any that shall examine the noble acts of our Nation in war, that they were performed by no advantage of weapons, against no savage or uncivilly people; the enemy being in the point unto us in number, and all needfull provisions, yea as well trained as we, or commonly by better, in the exercise of War.

In what sort Philip wan his Dominion in Greece; what manner of men the Persians and Indians were, whom Alexander vanquished; as likewise of what force the Macedonian Phalanx was, and how well appointed, against such armes as it commonly encountered any man, that hath taken paines to reade the foregoing story of them, doth sufficiently understand. Yet was this Phalanx never, or very seldom, able to stand against the Roman armies; which were embattelled in so excellent a forme, as I know not whether any Nation besides them have used, either before or since. The Roman weapons likewise, both offensive and defensive, were of greater use than those with which any other Nation hath served, before the fiery instruments of Gun-powder were known. As for the enemies with which Rome had to doe, we finde, that they which did over-match her in numbers, were as far over-matched by her in weapons; and that they, of whom she had little advantage in arms, had as little advantage of her in multitude. This also (as Plutarch well observeth) was a part of her happinesse; that she was never over-laid with two great wars at once.

Hereby it came to passe, that having at first increased her strength by accession of the Sabines; having won the State of Alba, against which she adventured her own self, she were in wager, upon the heads of three Champions; and having thereby made her self Princesse of Latium, shee did afterwards by long war, in many ages, extend her Dominion over all Italy. The Carthaginians had well-neer oppressed her: but her Souldiers were Mercenary; so that for want of proper strength, they were easily beaten at their own doores. The Etolians, and with them all, or the most of Greece, assisted her against Philip the Macedonian: he being beaten, did lend her his help to beat the same Etolians. The wars against Antiochus, and other Asiatiques, were such as gave to Rome small cause of boast, though much of joy: for those opposites were as bafe of courage, as the lands which they held were abundant of riches. Sicily, Spain, and all Greece, fell into her hands, by using her aide to protect them against the Carthaginians and Macedonians.

I shall not need to speak of her other conquests: it was easie to get more when shee had gotten all this. It is not my purpose to disgrace the Roman valour (which was very noble) or to blemish the reputation of so many famous victories: I am not so idle. This I say; That among all their wars, I finde not any, wherein their valour hath appeared comparable to the English. If my judgement seem over-partiall, our wars in France may help to make it good.

First therefore it is well known, that Rome (or perhaps all the world besides) had never any so brave a Commander in war as Julius Caesar: and that no Roman army was comparable unto that which served under the same Caesar. Likewise, it is apparent, that this gallant Army, which had given faire proof of the Roman courage, in good performance of the Helvetian war, when it first entred into Gaul; was nevertheless utterly disheartned, when Caesar led it against the Germans. So that we may justly impute all that was extraordinary in the valour of Caesar's men, to their long exercise, under so good a Leader, in so great a war. Now let us in generall compare with the deeds done by the best of Roman Souldiers, in their principall service; the things performed in the same Country, by our common English Souldiers, levied in haste, from following the Care, or sitting on the shop-stall: so shall we see the difference. Herein will we deale fairly, and beleve Caesar in relating the acts of the Romans: but will call the French Historians to witnesse, what actions were performed by the English. In Caesar's time France was inhabited by the Gauls, a stout people, but inferiour to the French, by whom they were subdued; even when the Romans gave them assistance. The Country of Gaul was rent in sunder (as Caesar witnesseth) into many Lordships: some of which were governed by petty kings, others by the multitude, none ordered in such sort as might make it appeale to the nearest Neighbour. The factions were many, and violent: not only in general through the whole Country, but between the petty States, yea in every City, and almost in every house. What greater advantage could a Conquerour desire? Yet there was a greater. Ariovistus, with his Germans, had over-run the Country, and held much part of it in subjection, little different from meer slavery: yea, so often had the Germans prevailed in war upon the Gauls, that the Gauls, (who had sometimes been the better Souldiers) did hold themselves no way equall to those daily Invaders. Had France been so prepared unto our English Kings, Rome it self by this time, and long ere this time, would have been ours. But when King Edward the third began his war upon France, he found the whole Country settled in obedience to one mighty King; a King whose reputation abroad, was no less than his puissance at home; under whose ensigne, the King of Bohemia did serve in person; at whose call the Genowayes, and other Neighbour States, were ready to take armes; finally, a King unto whom one (a) Prince gave away his Dominion, for love; (b) another sold away a goodly City and Territory for money. The Country lying so open to the Romans and being so well fenced against the English; it is note-worthy, not who prevailed most therein (for it were meer vanity to match the English purchases with the Roman conquest) but whether of the two gave the greater proof of military vertue. Cæsar himself doth witness, that the Gauls complained of their own ignorance in the Art of war, and that their own hardiness was overmastered by the skill of their enemies. Poor men, they admired the Roman Towers, and Engines of battery, raised and planted against their walles, as more than humane works. What greater wonder is it, that such a people was beaten by the Romans; than that the Garibes, a naked people, but valiant, as any under the skie, are commonly put to the worse by small numbers of Spaniards? Besides all this, we are to have regard of the great difficulty that was found, in drawing all the Gauls, or any great part of them, to one head, that with joynt forces they might oppose their assailants: as also the much more difficulty of holding them long together. For hereby it came to passe, that they were never able to make use of opportunity: but sometimes compelled to stay for their fellowes; and sometimes driven to give or take battell upon extreame disadvantages, for fear lest their companies should fall asunder: as indeed, upon any little disaster, they were ready to break, and return every one to the defence of his own. All this, and (which was little lesse than all this) great oddes in weapon gave to the Romans the honour of many gallant victories. What such help? or what other worldly help, than the golden mettle of their Souldiers, had our English Kings against the French? Were not the French as well experienced in feats of war? Yea, did they not think themselves therein our superiours? Were they not in arms, in horse, and in all provision, exceedingly beyond us? Let us heare what a French writer saith of the inequality that was between the French and English, when their King John was ready to give the on-set upon the Black Prince, at the battell of Poitiers. John had all advantages over Edward, both of number, force, shew, Country and conceit, (the which is commonly a consideration of no small importance in worldly affaires) and withall, the choice of all his horsemen (esteemed then the best in Europe) with the greatest and wisest Captaines of his whole Realme. And what could he more?

I think it would trouble a Roman antiquary to finde the like example in their Histories; the example I say, of a King, brought prisoner to Rome, by an army of eight thousand, which he had surrounded with forty thousand, better appointed, and no lesse expert Warriours. This I am sure of, that neither Syphax the Numidian, followed by a rabble of half Scullions, as Livie rightly termes them, nor those cowardly Kings, Perseus and Gentius, are worthy patternes. All that have read of Cressi and Agin-court, will beare me witness, that I do not alledge the battell of Poitiers, for lack of other, as good examples of the English vertue: the proof whereof hath left many a hundred better marks in all quarters of France, then ever did the valour of the Romans. If any man impute these victories of ours to the long bow, as carrying farther, piercing more strongly, and quicker of discharge than the French Crosse-bow: my answer is ready; That in all these respects, it is also (being drawn with a strong arme) superiour to the Musket; yet is the Musket a weapon of more use. The Gun and the Crosse-bow are of like force, when discharged by a Boy or Woman, as when by a strong Man: weakness or sickness, or a fore finger makes the long Bow unserviceable. More particularly, I say, that it was the custome of our Ancestors, to shoot, for the most part, point blank; and so shall he perceive, that will note the circumstances of almost any one battell. This takes away all objection: for when two Armies are within the distance of a Butts length, one flight of arrowes, or two at the most can be delivered before they close. Neither is it in generall true, that the long Bow reacheth farther, or that it pierceth more strongly than the Crosse-bow: but this is the rare effect of an extraordinary arme; whereupon can be grounded no common rule. If any man shall aske, How then came it to passe, that the English won so many great battells, having no advantage to help him? I may, with best commendation of modesty, referre him to the French Historian: who relating the victory of our men at Crewant, where they passed a bridge, in face of the enemy, useth these words: The English comes with a conquering bravery, as he that was accustomed to gain every-where, without any stay, he forceth our guard placed upon the bridge to keep the passage. Or I may cite another place of the same Author, where he tells, how the Britons, being invaded by Charles the eighth, King of France, thought it good policy to apparell a thousand and five hundred of their own men in English Caskes; hoping that the very sight of the English red crosse, would be enough to terrifie the French. But I will not stand to borrow of the French Historians (all which, except the De Serres, and Paulus Æmylius, report wonders of our Nation:); the proposition which first I undertook to maintain; That the military vertue of the English, prevailing against all manner of difficulties, ought to be preferred before that of the Romans, which was assisted with all advantages that could be desired. If it be demanded, why then did not our Kings finish the conquest, as Cæsar had done? my answer may be (I hope without offence) that our Kings were like to the race of the Æacids, of whom the old Poet Ennius gave this note; Bellipotentes sunt magis quam sapient potentes; They were more warlike than politick. Who notes their proceedings, may finde, that none of them went to work like a Conquerour, save onely King Henry the fifth; the course of whose victories it pleased God to interrupt by his death. But this question is the more easily answered, if another be first made. Why did not the Romans attempt the conquest of Gaul before the time of Cæsar? why not after the Macedonian war? why not after the third Punick, or after the Numantian? At all these times they had good leisure: and then especially had they both leisure & fit opportunity, when under the conduct of Marius, they had newly vanquished the Cimbri, and Teutones, by whom the country of Gaul had been piteously wasted. Surely the words of Tully were true; That with other Nations the Romans fought for Dominion, with the Gauls for preservation of their own safety.

Therefore they attempted not the conquest of Gaul, untill they were Lords of all other Countries, to them known. We on the other side, held onely the one half of our own Island; the other half being inhabited by a Nation (unless perhaps in wealth and numbers of men somewhat inferior) every way equall to our selves; a Nation anciently and strongly allied to our enemies the French, and in that regard enemy to us. So that our danger lay both before and behinde us: and the greater danger at our backs; where commonly we felt, alwayes we feared, a stronger invasion by land, than we could make upon France, transporting our forces over Sea.

It is usuall with men, that have pleased themselves in admiring the matters which they find in ancient Histories; to hold it a great injury done to their judgement, if any take upon him, by way of comparison, to extoll the things of later ages. But I am well perswaded, that as the divided vertue of this our Island, hath given more noble proofe of it self, than under so worthy a Leader; that Roman Army could do, which afterwards could win Rome, and all her Empire, making Cæsar a Monarch; so hereafter, by Gods blessing, who hath converted our greatest hinderance, into our greatest help, the enemy that shall dare to try our forces, will finde cause to wish, that avoiding us, he had rather encountered as great a puissance as was that of the Roman Empire. But it is now high time, that, laying aside comparisons, we return to the rehearfall of deeds done: wherein we shall finde, how Rome began, after Pyrrhus had left Italy, to strive with Carthage for Dominion, in the first Punick War.

§. II.

The estate of Carthage before it entred into war with Rome.

THE City of Carthage had stood above six hundred yeers, when first it began to contend with Rome for the mastery of Sicily. It fore-went Rome one hundred and fifty yeers in antiquity of foundation: but in the honour of great achievements, it excelled far beyond this advantage of time. For Carthage had extended her Dominion Africa it self, from the West part of Cyrene, to the streights of Hercules, about one thousand and five hundred miles in length, wherein stood three hundred Cities. It had subjected all Spain, even to the Pyrenean Mountains, together with all the Islands in the Mediterranean Sea, to the West of Sicily; and of Sicily the better part. It flourished about seven hundred and thirty years, before the destruction thereof by Scipio: who, besides other spoils, and all that the Souldiers reserved, carried thence four hundred and seventy thousand weight of silver, which make of our money (four pounds differ not) fourteen hundred and ten thousand pound sterling. So as this glorious City ran the same fortune, which many other great ones have done, both before and since. The ruine of the goodliest pieces of the world fore-shews the dissolution of the whole.

About one hundred years after such time as it was cast down, the Senate of Rome caused it to be re-built: and by Gracchus it was called Junonia: it was again and again abandoned and re-peopled, taken and re-taken; by Genfericus the Vandal, by Bellisarius under Justinian, by the Persians, by the Egyptians, and by the Mahometans. It is now nothing. The seat thereof was exceeding strong: and while the Carthaginians commanded the Sea, invincible. For the Sea compassed it about, saving that it was tied to the main by a neck of land; which passage had two miles and more of breadth (Appian saith, three miles and one furlong) by which we may be induced to beleieve the common report, that the City it self was above twenty miles in compass; if not that of Strabo, affirming the circuit to have been twice as great.

It had three walls without the wall of the City; and between each of those, three or four streets, with vaults under ground, of thirty foot deep, in which they had place for three hundred Elephants, and all their food: over these they had stables for four thousand horse, and Granaries for their provender. They had also lodgings in these streets, between these out-walls, for four thousand horse-men, and twenty thousand foot-men, which (according to the discipline used now by those of China) never pestered the City. It had towards the South part, the Castle of Byrsa; to which Strabo gives two and twenty furlongs in compass, that make two miles and a half. This was the same piece of ground which Dido obtained of the Lybians, when she got leave to buy only so much Land of them, as she could compass with an Ox-hide. On the West side it had also the salt Sea, but in the nature of a standing pool; for a certain arm of Land, fastened to the ground, on which the City stood, stretched it self towards the West continent, and left but seventy foot open for the Sea to enter. Over this standing Sea was built a most sumptuous Arsenal, having their Ships and Gallies riding under it.

The form of their Common-weal resembled that of Sparta; for they had titulary Kings, and the Aristocrattical power of Senators. But (as Regius well observeth) the people in later times usurped too great authority in their Councils. This confusion in government, together with the trust that they reposed in hired Souldiers, were helping causes of their destruction in the end. Two other more forcible causes of their ruine, were their avarice and their cruelty. Their avarice was shewed both in exacting from their Vassals (besides ordinary tributes) the one half of the fruits of the earth; and in conferring of great offices, not upon gentle & mercifull persons, but upon those who could best tyrannize over the people, to augment their treasures. Their cruelty appeared, in putting them to death without mercy, that had offended through ignorance: the one of these rendered them odious to their Vassals, whom it made ready upon all occasions, to revolt from them: the other did break the spirits of their Generals, by presenting in the heat of their actions abroad, the fear of a cruell death at home. Hereby it came to passe, that many good Commanders of the Carthaginian forces, after some great losse received, have desperately cast themselves, with all that remained under their charge, into the throat of destruction; holding it necessary, either to repaire their losses quickly, or to ruine all together: and few of them have dared to manage their own best projects, after that good form, wherein they first conceived them, for fear lest the manner of their proceeding should be mis-interpreted: It being the Carthaginian rule, to crucifie, not onely the unhappy Captain, but even him, whose bad counsell had prosperous event. The faults, wherewith, in general, they of Carthage are taxed, by Roman Historians, I finde to be these; lust, cruelty, avarice, craft, unfaithfulness, and perjury. Whether the Romans themselves were free from the same crimes, let the trial be referred unto their actions. The first league between Carthage and Rome, was very ancient: having been made the year following the expulsion of Tarquinius. In that league the Carthaginians had the superiority, as imposing upon the Romans the more strict conditions. For it was agreed, that the Romans should not so much as have trade in some part of Africk, nor suffer any ship of theirs to passe beyond the headland, or cape, then called the fair Promontory, unless it were by force of tempest: whereas on the other side, no Haven in Italy was forbidden to the Carthaginians. A second league was made long after, which (howsoever it hath pleased Livie to say, that the Romans granted it, at the Carthaginians intreaty) was more strict than the former: prohibiting the Romans to have trade in any part of Africa, or in the Island of Sardinia.

By these two treaties it may appear, that the Carthaginians had an intent not only to keep the Romans (as perhaps they did other people) from getting any knowledge of the state of Africk; but to countenance & uphold them, in their troubling all Italy, whereby they themselves might have the better means to occupy all Sicily, whilst that Island should be destitute of Italian succours. Hereupon we finde good cause of the joy that was in Carthage, and of the Crown of gold, weighing twenty and five pound, sent from thence to Rome, when the Sannites were overthrown. But the little state of Rome prevailed faster in Italy, than the great power of Carthage did in Sicily. For that mighty Army of three hundred thousand men, which Hannibal conducted out of Africk into Sicily, was only two Cities therein: many great fleets were devoured by tempests; and howsoever the Carthaginians prevailed at one time, the Sicilians, either by their own valour, or by the assistance of their good friends out of Greece, did at some other time repaire their own losses, and take revenge upon those Invaders. But never were the people of Carthage in better hope of getting all Sicily, than when the death of Agathocles the Tyrant, had left the whole Island in combustion; the estate of Greece being such, at the same time, that it seemed impossible for any succour to be sent from thence. But whilst the Carthaginians were busie in making their advantage of this good opportunity; Pyrrhus, invited by the Tarentines and their fellows, came into Italy, where he made sharp war upon the Romans. These news were displeasing to the Carthaginians, who, being a subtle Nation, easily fore-saw, that the same busie disposition which had brought this Prince out of Greece into Italy, would as easily transport him over into Sicily, as soon as he could finish his Roman war. To prevent this danger, they sent Mago Embassador to Rome; who declared in their name, that they were sorry to hear what misadventure had befallen the Romans, their good friends, in this war with Pyrrhus; and that the people of Carthage were very willing to assist the state of Rome, by sending an Army into Italy; if their help were thought needfull, against the Epirots.

It was indeed the main desire of the Carthaginians, to hold Pyrrhus so hardly to his work in Italy, that they might, at good leisure, pursue their business in Sicily: which caused them to make such a goodly offer. But the Romans were too high-minded: and refused to accept any such aid of their friends, lest it should blemish their reputation, and make them seem unable to stand by their own strength. Yet the message was taken lovingly, as it ought; and the former league between Rome and Carthage renewed; with covenants added, concerning the present business; That if either of the two Cities made peace with Pyrrhus, it should be with reservation of liberty, to assist the other, in case that Pyrrhus should invade either of their Dominions. All this notwithstanding, and notwithstanding that the same Mago went and treated with Pyrrhus, using all means to found his intentions (a matter very difficult; where one upon every new occasion, changeth his own purposes) yet Pyrrhus found leisure to make a step into Sicily: where, though in fine he was neither getter nor savor, yet he clean defeated the purposes of Carthage, leaving them, at his departure from thence, as far from any end, as when they first began.

So many disasters in an enterprize, that from the first undertaking had been so strongly pursued, through the length of many generations, might well have induced the Carthaginians to beleieve, that an higher providence resisted their intendment. But their desire of winning that fruitfull Island, was so inveterate, that with unwearied patience, they still continued in hope of so much the greater an harvest, by how much their cost and pains therein buried had been the more. Wherefore they re-continued their their former courses; and by force or practice, recovered in few years all their old possessions: making peace with Syracuse, the chief City of the Island, that so they might the better enable themselves to deal with the rest.

Somewhat before this time, a troupe of Campanian Souldiers, that had served under Agathocles, being entertained within Messana as friends, and finding themselves too strong for the Citizens, took advantage of the power that they had to do wrong; and with perfidious cruelty, slue those that had trusted them; which done, they occupied the City, Lands, Goods, and Wives of those whom they had murdered. These Mercenaries called themselves Mamertines. Good Souldiers they were: and like enough it is, that in their desperation of finding any that would approve their barbarous treachery, added rage unto their stoutness. Having therefore not any other colour of their proceedings, than the law of the stronger, they over-ran all the Country round about them.

In this course, at first, they sped so well, that they did not onely defend Messana against the Cities of Sicil Confederate; to wit, against the Syracusans, and others, but they rather wan upon them; yea, and upon the Carthaginians, exacting tribute from many Neighbour places. But it was not long, ere fortune turning her back to these Mamertines, the Syracusans wan fast upon them, and finally, confining them within the walls of Messana, they also with a powerfull Army besieged the City. It hapned ill, that about the same time a contention began between the Syracusan Souldiers, then lying at Megara, and the Citizens of Syracuse, and Governours of the Common-wealth; which proceeded so far, that the Army elected two Governours among themselves, to wit, Artemidorus and Hieron, that was afterward King. Hieron, being for his years excellently adorned with many virtues, although it was contrary to the policy of that State, to approve any election made by the Souldiers; yet for the great clemency he used at his first entrance, was by generall consent established and made Governour. This office he rather used as a Scale, thereby to climb to some higher degree, than rested content with his present preferment.

In brief, there was somewhat wanting, whereby to strengthen himself within the City; and somewhat without it, that gave impediment to his obtaining, and safe keeping of the place he sought; to wit, a powerfull party within the Town, and certain mutinous troops of Souldiers without, often and easily moved to sedition and tumult. For the first, whereby to strengthen himself, he took to Wife the daughter of Leptines, a man of the greatest estimation and authority among the Syracusans. For the second, leading out the Army to besiege Messana, he quartered all those companies, which he held suspected, on the one side of the City, and leading the rest of his Horse and Foot unto the other side, as if he would have assaulted it in two severall parts, he marched away under the covert of the Town walls, and left the Mutiners to be cut in pieces by the assieged: So returning home, and levying an Army of his own Citizens, well trained and obedient, he halted again towards Messana, and was by the Mamertines (grown proud by their former victory over the Mutiners) incourted in the plains of Mylaum, where he obtained a most signall victory, and leading with him their Commander captive into Syracuse, himself by common consent was elected and saluted King. Hereupon the Mamertines, finding themselves utterly enfeebled, some of them resolved to give themselves to the Carthaginians, others to crave assistance of the Romans: to each of whom the severall factions dispatched Embassadors for the very same purpose.

The Carthaginians were soon ready to lay hold upon the good offer: so that a Captain of theirs got into the Castle of Messana, whereof they that had sent for him gave him possession. But within a little while, they that were more inclinable to the Romans, who had brought their Companions to so good agreement, that this Captain, either by force, or by cunning, was turned out of doores, and the Town reserved for other Masters.

These news did much offend the people of Carthage; who crucified their Capitaine, as both a Traitor and Coward; and sent a Fleet and Army to besiege Messana, as a Town that rebelled, having once been theirs. Hieron the new-made King of Syracuse (to gratifie his people, incensed with the smart of injuries lately received) added his forces to the Carthaginians, with whom he entred into a league, for exterminating the Mamertines.

Mamertines out of Sicil. So the Mamertines on all sides were closed up within Messana: the Carthaginians lying with a Navie at Sea, and with an Army on the one side of the Town, whilst Hieron with his Syracusans, lay before it on the other side.

In this their great danger came Appius Claudius the Roman Consul, with an Army to the streights of Sicil: which passing by night with notable audacity, he put himselfe into the Town, and sending Messengers to the Carthaginians, and to Hieron, required them to depart; signifying unto them that the Mamertines were now become confederate with the people of Rome, and that therefore he was come to give them protection, even by force of War, if reason would not prevaile.

This message was utterly neglected; And so began the War between Rome and Carthage; wherein it will then be time to shew on which part was the justice of the quarrell, when some actions of the Romans lately foregoing this, have been first considered.

§. III.

The beginning of the first Punick war. That it was unjustly undertaken by the Romans.

When Pyrrhus began his wars in Italy, the City of Rhegium, being well affected to Rome, and not onely fearing to be taken by the Epirot, but much more disliking the Carthaginians, as likely to seize upon it in that busie time, sought aide from the Romans, and obtained from them a Legion, consisting of foure thousand souldiers, under the conduct of Decius Campanus, a Roman Prefect; by whom they were defended and assured for the present. But after a while, this Roman Garrison, considering at good leasure, the fact of the Mamertines, committed in Messana (a City in Sicil, situate almost opposite to Rhegium, and no otherwise divided than by a narrow Sea, which severeth it from Italy) and rather weighing the greatnesse of the booty, than the odiousnesse of the villany, by which it was gotten; resolved finally, to make the like purchase, by taking the like wicked course. Confederating therefore themselves with the Mamertines, they entertained their Hosts of Rhegium, after the same manner; dividing the spoil, and all which that State had among themselves.

When complaint was made to the Senate and people of Rome, of this outrage; they finding their honour thereby greatly stained (for no Nation in the world made a more severe profession of justice, than they did during all the time of their growing greatness) resolved, after a while, to take revenge upon the offenders. And this they performed shortly after, when they had quenched the fires, kindled in Italy by Pyrrhus. For, notwithstanding that those Romans in Rhegium (as men for the foulness of their fact, hopelesse of pardon) defended themselves with an obstinate resolution; yet in the end, the assailants forced them; and those which escaped the present fury, were brought bound to Rome, where, after the usuall torments by whipping inflicted, according to the custome of the country, they had their heads stricken from their shoulders, and the people of Rhegium were again restored to their former liberty and estates.

This execution of Justice being newly performed, and the same thereof sounding honourably through all quarters of Italy: messengers came to Rome from Messana, desiring help against the Carthaginians, and Syracusans, that were in a readinesse to inflict the like punishment upon the Mamertines, for the like offence. A very impudent request it was, which they made: who having both given example of that villany to the Roman Souldiers, and helped them with joynt forces to make it good, doe intreat the Judges to give them that assistance, which they were wont to receive from their fellow-thieves.

The Romans could not suddenly resolve, whether the way of honesty or of profit were to be followed; they evermore pretended the one, but they many times walked in the other. They considered, how contrary the course of succouring the Mamertines was to their former counsels and actions: seeing for the same offences they had lately put to torment, and to the sword, their own Souldiers, and restored the oppressed to their liberty. Yet when they beheld the description of the Carthaginian Dominion, and that they were already Lords of the best part of Africa, of the Mediterran Islands, of a great part of Spain, and some part of Sicil itself, whilst also they feared, that Syracuse therein therein seated (a City in beauty and riches, little at that time inferior to Carthage, and far superior to Rome it self) might become theirs; the safety of their own estate spake for these Mamertines: who, if they (driven to despair by the Romans) should deliver up Messana, with those other holds that they had, into the hands of the Carthaginians, then would nothing stand between Carthage and the Lordship of Sicily: for Syracuse it self could not, for want of succour, any long time subsist, if once the Carthaginians that were Masters of the Sea, did fasten upon that passage from the maine Land. It was further considered; that the opportunity of Messana was such, as would not only debarre all succours out of the continent, from arrivall in Sicily; but would serve as a bridge, whereby the Carthaginians might have entrance into Italy, at their own pleasure.

These considerations of profit at hand, and of preventing dangers, that threatened from a far, did so prevail above all regard of honesty, that the Mamertines were admitted into Confederacy with the Romans, and Ap. Claudius the Consul, presently dispatched away for Messana: into which he entred, and undertook the protection of it, as is shewed before. The besiegers were little troubled with his arrivall; and less moved, with his requiring them to desist from their attempt. For they did far exceed him in number of men; the whole Island was ready to relieve them in their wants; and they were strong enough at Sea, to hinder any supply from getting into the Town. All this Appian himself well understood: and against all this he thought the stiffe metal of his Roman Souldiers a sufficient remedy. Therefore he resolved to issue out into the field, and to let the enemies know, that his coming was to send them away from the Town; not to be besieged by them within it.

In executing this determination, it was very beneficiall to him, that the enemy lay encamped in such sort, as one quarter was not well able to relieve another in distress. Hieron was now exposed to the same danger, whereinto he had wilfully cast his own mutinous followers not long before: onely he was strong enough (or thought so) to make good his own quarter, without help of others. Against him Ap. Claudius issued forth, and (not attempting, by unexpected fall, to surprize his trenches) arranged his men in order of battell, wherewith he presented him. The Syracusan wanted not courage to fight; but surely he wanted good advice: else would he not have hazarded all his power against an enemy of whom he had made no trial; when it had been easie, and as much as was requisite, to defend his own Camp. It may be, that he thought to get honour, wherewith to adorne the beginning of his reign. But he was well beaten, and driven to save himself within his trenches: by which losse, he learned a point of wisdom, that saved him and his Kingdom in good stead all the dayes of his life. It was a foolish desire of revenge, that had made the Syracusians so busie, in helping those of Carthage, against the Mamertines.

Had Messana been taken by the Carthaginians, Syracuse it self must have sought help from Rome, against those friends which it now so diligently assisted. Hieron had (in respect of those two mighty Cities) but a small stock, which it behooved him to govern well: such another losse would have made him almost bankrupt. Therefore he quietly brake up his Camp, and retired home: intending to let them stand to their adventures, that had hope to be gainers by the bargain. The next day, Claudius perceiving the Sicilian Army gone, did with great courage, and with much alacrity of his Souldiers, give charge upon the Carthaginians: wherein he sped so well, that the enemy forsook both field and camp, leaving all the Country open to the Romans; who having spoiled all round, without resistance, intended to lay siege unto the great City of Syracuse.

These prosperous beginnings, howsoever they animated the Romans, and filled them with hopes of attaining to greater matters, than at the first they had expected: Yet did they not imprint any forme of terror in the City of Carthage, that had well enough repaired greater losses than this; in which no more was lost than what had been prepared against the Mamertines alone, without any suspicion of War from Rome.

Now in this place I hold it seasonable, to consider of those grounds, whereupon the Romans entred into this war; not how profitable they were, nor how agreeable to rules of honesty (for questionless the enterprize was much to their benefit, though as much to their shame) but how allowable in strict termes of lawfulness; whereupon they built all their allegations in maintenance thereof. That the Mamertines did yeeld themselves, and all that they had, into the Romans hands (as the Campanians, distressed by the Samnites, had done) I cannot finde; neither can I finde how the messengers of those folk, who of one part had already admitted the Carthaginians, could be enabled to make any such surrendry in the publick name of all.

If therefore the Mamertines, by no lawfull surrendry of themselves and their possessions, were become subject unto Rome, by what better title could the Romans assist the Mamertines, against their most ancient friends the Carthaginians, than they might have assisted the Campanians, against the Samnites, without the same condition? which was, that they themselves confessed) by none at all. But let it be supposed, that some person serving to cleare this doubt, is lost in all Histories. Doubtlesse it is, that no company of Pyrates, Theeves, Out-laws, Murderers, or such other Malefactors, can by any good successe of their villany, obtaine the privilege of civill societies, to make league or invoyes, or to require fair war: but are by all means, as most pernicious vermine, to be rooted out of the world. I will not take upon me to maintain that opinion of some Poets, that a Prince is not bound to hold his faith with one of these; it were a Position of ill consequence: This I hold; that no one Prince or State can give protection to such as these, as long as any other is using the sword of vengeance against them, without becoming necessary to their crimes. Wherefore we may esteem this action of the Romans so far from being justifiable, by any pretence of Confederacy made with them; that contrariwise, by admitting this nest of Murderers and Theeves into their protection, they justly deserved to be warred upon themselves, by the people of Sicily; yet, though Messana had been taken, and the Mamertines all slain, ere any newes of the Confederacy had been brought unto the besiegers. The great Alexander was so far persuaded herein; that he did put to sword all the Branchiads (a people in Sogdiana) and razed their City, notwithstanding that they joyfully entertained him as their Lord and King; because they were descended from a company of Mithesians; who to gratifie King Xerxes, had robbed a Temple, and were by him rewarded with the Town and Country, which these of their posterity enjoyed. Nevertheless, in course of humane justice, long and peaceable possession gives jus acquisitum, a kinde of right by prescription unto that which was first obtained by wicked meanes: and doth free the descenders from the crime of their Ancestors, whose villanies they do not exercise. But the same generation of Theeves, which by a detestable fact hath purchased a rich Town, should beacknowledged a lawfull company of Citizens, there is no shew of justice. For even the Conqueror that by open War obtaineth a Kingdom, doth not continue his title, by those victories which gave him first possession: but length of time is requisite to establish him, unlesse by some alliance with the ancient inheritors, he can remove the violence of his claime, as did our King Henry the first, by his marriage with Matilda, that was daughter of Malcolm, King of the Scots, by Margaret, the Niece of Edward the Confessor. Wherefore I conclude, that the Romans had no better ground (if they had regard of justice, in this quarrell, than had the Gothes, Huns, Vandalls, and other Nations, of the wars that they made upon the Roman Empire, wherein Rome her self, in the time of her visitation, was burnt to the ground.

Of the Island of Sicily.

The quality of the Island: and the first inhabitants thereof.

The defence of the Mamertines, or the possession of Messana, being now no longer the first victory of Appian Claudius, the objects of the Roman hopes, but the Dominion of all Sicily being the prize, for which Rome and Carthage are about to contend, it will be agreeable unto the order, which in the like cases we have observed, to make a brief collection of things concerning that noble Island, which hath been the scene of many great acts, performed as well before and after, as in this present War.

That Sicil was sometimes a Peninsula, or Demie-Isle, adjoining to Italy, as a part Bruttium in Calabria, neer unto Rhegium, and afterward by violence of tempest from the same: it is a generall opinion of all antiquity. But at what certain time this division happened; there is no memoriall remaining in any ancient writer. Strabo, Pliny, and Dionysius affirme, that it was caused by an earth-quake; Silius and Cassiodorus think it to have been done by the rage and violence of the tide, and surges of the sea. Either of these opinions may be true; for so was Eubœa severed from Beotia; Andalus and Mæris from Eubœa; Sillie here in England, from the Cape of Cornwall; and Armenia it self (as may seem by Verstigans arguments) from the opposite continent of Asia. But for Sicil, they which lend their eares to fables, doe attribute the cause of it to Minos (as Enochian witnesseth) who with his three-forked Mace, in favour of Pluto, the son of Jupiter, divided it from the maine land, and so made it an Island, which before was but a Demie-Isle; that by that means he might the more safely inhabite, and possesse the same. Diodorus Siculus, moved by the authority of Hesiodus, ascribeth the labour of sundring it from Italy, to Orion: who that he might be compared to Hercules (cutting through the rocks and mountaines) first opened the Sicilian streights, and entred thofe of Gibraltar.

They which value the Islands of the mid-land Sea, according to their quantity and content, doe make this the greatest, as Plutarchus and Strabo, who affirme this, not only to excell the rest for bignesse, but also for goodnesse of soile. As concerning the forme of this Island, Pomponius Mela saith, it is like that Capital letter of the Greek, which they call Delta, namely, that it hath the figure of a triangle; which is generally known to be true. That the whole Island was consecrated to Ceres and Proserpina; all old writers with one consent affirme. To Ceres it was dedicated, because it first taught the rules of setting and sowing of Corn: to Proserpina, not so much for that she was from hence violently taken by Pluto, as because (which Plutarch and Diodorus do report for true) that Pluto, as if soon as she, uncovering her self, first shewed her self to be seen of him, gave her the Dominion thereof.

Of the fertility and riches of this Country, there is a famous testimonie written by Cicero, in his second Oration against Verres, where he saith, that Marcus Cato did call the Granary and Store-house of the Common-wealth, and the Nurse of the vulgar sort. The same Cicero doth adde in that place; that it was not only the Store-house of the people of Rome; but also that it was a well-furnished treasure. For without any cost or charge of ours (saith he) it hath usually clothed, maintained and furnished our greatest armies with leather, apparell and corn. Strabo reporteth almost the same thing of it. Whatsoever Sicilie doth yeeld (saith Silius) whether by the sun, and temperature of the air, or by the industry and labour of man; it is accounted next unto those things that are of best estimation: were it not that such things as the earth first putteth forth, are extremely over-grown with saffron. Diodorus Siculus saith, that in the fields neer unto Leontium, and in divers other places of this Island, wheat doth grow of it self without any labour or looking to of the husbandman. Martianus sheweth, that there were here six Colonies, and sixty Cities: there are that reckon more, whereof the names are found scatteringly in many good Authors.

Now besides many famous acts, done by the people of this Island, as well in peace as War, there be many other things which have made it very renowned, as the birth of Ceres; the ravishing of Proserpina; the Giant, Encelladus; the mount Etna, Scylla and Charybdis, with other antiquities and rarities; besides those learned men, the noble Mathematicians, Archimedes, the famous Geometrician, Euclides, the painfull Historian Diodorus, and Empedocles, the deep Philosopher.

That Sicil was at first possessed and inhabited by Giants, Leſtrigones and Cyclopes, barbarous people, and uncivill, all histories and fables do jointly with one consent averre. Yet Thucydides saith, that these savage people dwelt onely in one part of the Island. Afterward the same, a people of Spain, possessed it. That these were not bred in the Ile (although some think) Thucydides and Diodorus doe very constantly avouch.

Of these it was named Sicania. These Sicani were invaded by the Siculi, who inhabiting that part of Lusitania, whereon Rome was afterward built, were driven by the Romans from their own seats; finding no place upon the Continent, which they were able to master and inhabite, passed over into this Island, three hundred years before the Greeks for any Colonies thither: and (saith Philistinus) eighty years before the fall of Troy. These Siculi gave the name of Sicilia, to the Island; and making war upon the Sicani, drave them from the East and Northern part thereof, into the West and South. At their landing, they first built the City Zancle, afterward called Messana; and after that, Catana, Leontine, and Syracuse it self, bearing from thence the Ætolians, who long before had set up a Town in that place. As for the name of Syracuse, it was not known, till such time as Archias of Corinth (long after) won that part of the Island from the Siculi. Neither did the Siculi at their first arrivall dispossesse the Ætolians thereof, but some hundred years after their descent, and after such time as they had founded the Cities before named with Naxos, Hybla, Trinacria, and divers others.

After these Siculi came another nation out of Italy, called Morgetes, who were thence driven by the Oenotrians. These sat down in that part of Sicil, where they afterward called the Cities of Morgantium, and Leontium. For at this time the Siculi were divided, and by a civill war greatly infeebled. Among these ancient stories, we find the last voyage, and the death of Minos, King of Crete. Thucydides, an Historian of unquestionable verity, reports of Minos, that he made conquest of many Islands: and some such business, perhaps, drew him into Sicil. But the common report is, that he came thither in pursuit of Dadalus. The tale goes thus: Dadalus fleeing the revenge of Minos, came unto Sicil, to Cocalus, King of the Sicani, and during his abode there, he built a place of great strength, neer unto Megara, for Cocalus to lay up his treasure in, together with many notable works, for which he was greatly admired and honoured.

Among the rest, he cast a Ram in gold, that was set up in the Temple of Venus Erycin, which he did with so great Art, as those that beheld it, thought it rather to be living than counterfeit.

Now Minos, hearing that Cocalus had entertained Dadalus, prepares to invade the Territory of Cocalus; but when he was arrived, Cocalus doubting his own strength, proposed to deliver Dadalus. This he performs not, but in the mean while, kills Minos by treason, and persuades the Cretans, Minos his followers, to inhabit a part of Sicilia, the better (as it seems) to strengthen himself against the Siculi. Hereunto the Cretans (their King being dead) gave their consent, and builded for themselves the City of Minos after the name of the King Minos. After, they likewise built the Town of Engium, now called Gange: and these were the first Cities, built by the Greeks in Sicil, about two ages before the war of Troy; for the grand-children of Minos served with the Greeks at the siege thereof.

But after such time as the Cretans understood, that their King had by treason been made away; they gathered together a great Army, to invade Cocalus: and landing neer unto Camicus, they besieged the same five years, but in vain. In the end (being forced to returne, without any revenge taken) they were ract on the coast of Italy, and having no means to repair their ships, nor the honour they had lost, they made good the place whereon they fell, and built Hyria, or Hyrium, between the two famous Ports of Brundisium and Tarentum. Of these Cretans came those Nations, afterward called Iapyges and Messapii.

After the taking of Troy, Egeſtas and Elymus, brought with them certain troupes into Sicil, and seated themselves among the Sicani; where they built the Cities of Egeſta and Elyma.

It is said, that Aeneas visited these places in his passage into Italy: and that some of the Trojans, his followers, were left behind him, in these Towns of Sicil: whereof there want not good Authors, that make Aeneas himself the founder.

About the same time, the Phœnicians seized upon the Promontories of Pachinus, and Libæum, and upon certain small Isles adjoining to the main Island: which they fortified, to secure the trades that they had with the Sicilians; like as the Portugals have done in the East-India, at Goa, Ormuz, Mosambique, &c. other places. But the Phœnicians stayed not there; for after they had once assured their descents, they built the goodly City of Canotimus, now called Palerma.

These we finde, were the Nations that inhabited the Isle of Sicil, before the warre of Troy, and ere the Greeks in any numbers began to straggle in those parts.

It may perchance seem strange to the Reader, that in all ancient stories, he findes one and the same beginning of Nations, after the flood, & that the first planters of all parts of the World were said to be mighty and Giant-like men; and that, as Phœnicia, Egypt, Lybia and Greece, had Hercules, Orestes, Antæus, Typhon, and the like; as Denmarke had Starchaterus, remembered by Saxo Grammaticus; as Scythia, Britanie, and other Regions had Giants for their first inhabitants; so this Isle of Sicil had her Lestrigones & Cyclopes. This discourse I could also reject for fained and fabulous, did not Moses make us know, that the Zamzummims, Emims, Anakims, and Og of Basan, with others, which sometime inhabited the Mountains and Defarts of Moab, Ammou, and Mount Seir, were men of exceeding strength and stature, and of the races of Giants: and were it not, that Tertulian, S. Angustine, Nicephorus, Procopius, Isidore, Plinie, Diodore, Herodotus, Solinus, to Platarch, and many other Authors, have confirmed the opinion. Yea, Vesputius, in his second Navigation into America, hath reported that himself hath seen the like men in those parts. Again, whereas the self-same is written of all Nations, that is written of any one; as touching their simplicity of life, their mean fare, their feeding on acorns and roots, their poor cottages, the covering of their bodies with the skins of beasts, their hunting, their armes, and weapons, and their warfare, their first passages over great Rivers and Arms of the Sea, upon rafts of trees tied together, and afterward, their making boats first of twigs and leather, then of wood; first with Oares, and then with Sail; that they esteemed as gods, the first finders out of Arts, as of Husbandry, of Lawes, and of Policy: it is a matter, that makes me neither to wonder at, nor to doubt of it. For they all lived in the same newness of time, which we call Ola time, and had all the same want of his instruction; which (after the Creator of all things) hath by degrees taught all Mankind. For other teaching had they none, that were removed far off from the Hibrenes, (who inherited the knowledge of the first Patriarchs) than that from variable effects they began, by time and degrees, to finde out the causes: from whence came Philosophy Natural, as the Morall did from disorder and confusion; and the Law from cruelty and oppression.

But it is certain, that the Age of Time hath brought forth stranger and more incredible things, than the Infancy. For we have now greater Giants for vice and injustice, than the World had in those dayes, for bodily strength; for cottages, and houses of clay and timber, we have raised Palaces of stones; we carve them, we paint them, and adorn them with gold, inasmuch as men are rather known by their houses, than their houses by them; we are fallen from two dishes, to two hundred; from water, to wine and drunkenness: from the covering of our bodies with the skins of beasts, not only to silk and gold, but to the very skins of men. But to conclude this digression, Time will also take revenge of the excess, which it hath brought forth, Quam longa dies peperit, longiorque auxit, longissima subruet: Long time brought forth, longer time increased it, and a time, longer than the rest, shall overthrow it.

† II.

The plantation of the Greeks in Sicill.

When the first inhabitants had contended long enough about the Dominion of all Sicill: it happened, that one Theocles, a Greek, being driven upon that coast by an Easterly wind, and finding true the commendations thereof, which had been thought fabulous, being delivered only by Poets, gave information to the Athenians of this his discovery, & proposed unto them the benefit of this easie conquest offering to become their guide. But Theocles was as little regarded by the Athenians, as Columbus, in our Grand-fathers times, was by the English. Wherefore he took the same course that Columbus afterwards did. He over-laboured not himself in perswading the Noble Athenians (who thought themselves to be well enough already) to their own profit, but went to the Chalcidians, that were needy and industrious, by whom his project was gladly entertained. By these was built the City of Naxos, and a Colony planted of Eubæans.

But the rest of the Greeks were wiser than our Western Princes of Europe: for they had no Pope, that should forbid them to occupy the void places of the World. Archias of Corinth followed the Eubæans, and landed in Sicill, neer unto that City, called afterward * Syracuse: of which, that part only was then compassed with a wall, which the Etolians called Homothermon; the Greeks, Nafos; the Latines, Isula. He with his Corinthians having overcome the Siculi, drave them up into the Country; and after a few years, their multitude increasing, they added unto the City of the Island, that of Acadina, Tycha, and Neapolis, So as well by the commodity of the double Port, capable of many ships, as any Haven of that part of Europe, as by the fertility of the soyle, Syracuse grew up in great haste, to be one of the goodliest Towns of the world. In short time the Greeks did possess the better part of all the Sea-coast; forcing the Sicilians to withdraw themselves into the fast and mountainous parts of the Island, making their 10 Royall residence in Trinacia.

Some seven years after the arrivall of Archias, the Chalcidians, encouraged by the success of the Corinthians, did assail, & obtain the city of Leontium, built and possessed by the Siculi. In brief, the Greeks win from the Siculi, and their Associates, the cities of Catana and Hybla, which in honour of the Megarians that forced it, they called Megara.

About 45. years after Archias had taken Syracuse, Antiphenus, and Enimius, the one from Rhodes, the other from Crete, brought an Army into Sicil, and built Gela; whose Citizens, one hundred and eight year after, did erect that magnificent and renowned city of Aggrigentum, governed according to the Lawes of the Dorians.

The Syracusians also, in the seventieth year after their plantation, did set up the city of Akra, in the Mountains; and in the ninetieth year Casmenæ, in the Plains adjoining, and again in the hundred and thirtieth year of their dwelling in Syracuse, they built Camehinæ, and soon after that, Enna, in the very Center of the Island. So did the Cumani about the same time, recover from the Siculi the city of Zancle, which they had founded in the Strait between Sicil and Italy. They of Zancle had been the founders of Himera.

Not long after this, Doriaus the Lacedæmonian built Heraclia, which the Phœnicians, and Carthaginians, fearing the neighbourhood of the Spartans, soon after invaded and rased, though the same were again ere long re-edified. Selinus also was built by a Colony of Megara, and Zancle was taken by the Messeni, who having lost their own Country, gave the name thereof unto this their new purchase. Such were the beginnings of the greatest cities in this Island.

of the Government and Affairs of Sicil, before Dionysius his Tyranny.

The most part of the cities in Sicil, were governed by the rule of the people, till such time as Phalaris began to usurp the State of Aggrigentum, and to exercise all manner of tyranny therein.

This was that Phalaris, to whom Perillus, the cunning, Artificer of a detestable Engine, gave an hollow Bull of brass, wherein to close men, and scorch them to death, praising the device with this commendation: That the noise of one tormented therein, should be like unto the bellowing of a Bull. The Tyrant gave due reward to the Inventer, by causing the first city to be made upon himself. He reigned one and thirty years, slain Busiris, others give him but sixty-two. Howsoever it were, one Teselmachus the end, fell upon him with the whole multitude of Aggrigentum, and stoned him to death; being thereto animated by Zeno, even whilst the Tyrant was tormenting the same Zeno, so make him confesse some matter of conspiracy, and so he was slain.

After the death of Phalaris, the Citizens recovered their liberty, and enjoyed it long, till Themis usurped the government of the Common weale: at which time also Panastus made himself Lord of Leontium, and Cleander of Hybla; but Cleander having ruled seven years, was slain by one of the Citizens. Cleander being dead, his brother Hippocrates succeeded in his room, and greatly afflicted the people of Naxos, of Zancle, or Messena, and of Leontium; whom with divers others of the ancient inhabitants, he forced to acknowledge him their Lord. He also made war with the Syracusians, and, in the end, got from them by composition, the City of Catana. But when he had reigned seven years, he was slain in a battell against the Siculi, before Hybla.

At this time did the Syracusians change their forme of government, from Popular to Aristocrasial; a preparation towards a principality, whereinto it was soon after changed.

After

* Syracuse, as Cicero relates, was the greatest, & most goodly City of all that the Greeks possessed. For the situation is both strong, & of an excellent prospect from every Land, or Sea.

The Port was (for the most part) environed with beautiful buildings: and that part which was without the City, was on both sides banked up, and furnished with beautiful wals of Marble. The city it selfe was one of the greatest of the world: for it had in compass (as Strabo reporteth) without the treble wall thereof, 180. furlongs, which make of our miles about 18.

It was compounded of four Cities, (Strabo saith, of five) to wit, Isula, Acadina, Tycha, & Neapolis: of which greatness the ruins & foundations of the wals do yet witness.

After such time as the Doves of Peloponnesus had driven out the Sicilians, this goodly city for a long time became the seat of Tyrants. The first, whereof was Gelo: The second, Hiero the elder: the third, Thrasybulus: the fourth and fifth, Dionysius the elder, & younger; the sixth, Dionysius the seventh.

Agathocles: the eighth, Pyrrhus the ninth, Hiero the younger: the tenth, & last, Hieronymus who being slain at Leontium, at length the Romans conquered it under the conduct of Marcellus.

After the death of Hippocrates, Gelon (descended from the Rhodians, which together with the Cretans had long before, among other of the Greeks, seated themselves in Sicily) that had commanded the forces of Hippocrates, in the former war, with notable success, became Lord of Gela. He, after his Masters death, breaking the trust committed unto him by Hippocrates over his children, and being in possession of Gela, took the occasion and advantage of a contention in Syracuse, between the Magistrates and the People. For comming with a strong Army to the succour of the governours, driven out by the multitude, they elected him their Prince, being the first, and (indeed) the most famous, that ever governed the Syracusians. This change happened in the second year of the three-score and twelfth Olympiad; wherein the better to establish himself, he took to wife the Daughter of Thero, who had also usurped the State of Agrigentum.

Paus. lib. 6.

Now this Gelon, the son of Dinomenes, had three brethren; Hiero, Polyzelus, and Thrasylbulus: to the first of which he gave up the City of Gela, when he had obtained the Principality of Syracuse. For, after that time, all his thoughts travelled in the strengthening, beautifying, and amplifying of Syracuse. He defaced Camerina, that a little before was fallen from the obedience of the Syracusians who built it, and brought the Citizens to Syracuse. The Meagarians that had moved a war against him, he overcame; the richer sort he brought unto Syracuse; and the people he sold for slaves. In like manner dealt he with other places upon the like occasion. Not long after this, Thero, a Prince of the Agrigentines, having dispossessed Terillus of his City Himera; the Carthaginians were drawn into the quarrell by Anaxilus, Lord of Messina, Father-in-law to Terillus; and Gelon was also solicited by his Father-in-law, Thero. Gelon was content, and in fine, after divers conflicts, the Carthaginians, and other Africans, led by Amilcar, were overthrown by Gelon: and an hundred and fifty thousand of them left their bodies in Sicily.

Herod. & Dio.

This Gelon it was, to whom the Athenians and Lacedaemonians sent for succour, when Xerxes with his huge army past the Hellepont. He, for their relief having armed thirty thousand Souldiers, and two hundred ships, refused nevertheless to send them into Greece, because they refused him the commandement of one of their Armies, either by Sea, or Land. So he used to their Embassadors only this saying, That their Spring was withered; accounting the Army, by him prepared, to be the very flower of the Greek Nation.

The Carthaginians, after this great loss received, fearing the invasion of their owne Country, sent to Gelon by their Embassadors, to desire peace, who grants it them on these conditions: That from thenceforth they should not sacrifice their children to Saturne; That they should pay him 2000. talents of silver, and present him with two armed ships, in sign of amity. These conditions the Carthaginians, not only willingly accepted, but with the two thousand talents, and the ships for war, they sent unto Demarata, Gelons wife, a crown, valued at an hundred talents of gold, with other presents. Whereby we see, that some Nations, and some Natures, are much the better for being well beaten. The wars ended, &c. Sicily in peace, Gelon beautified the Temples of the gods, and erected others in honour of them. So being exceedingly beloved and honoured of his Subjects, he left the World, and left for his Successour, his brother Hiero. Pliny and Pliny report, That, when his body was burnt, according to the custome of that Age, a Dog of his, which always waited on him, ran into the fire, and suffered himself to be burnt with him.

To Gelon, Hiero his brother succeeded; a man rude, cruell, covetous, and so suspicious of his brethren Polyzelus, and Thrasylbulus, as he sought by all means to destroy them. Notwithstanding all this, by the conversation which he had with Simonides, he became of better condition, and greatly delighted with the study of good Arts. Divers quarrels he had, as well with Thero of Agrigentum, as with other Cities: all which he shortly after compounded, and gave a notable overthrow to the Carthaginians, whom Xerxes had incited to invade Sicily, fearing the succours which Gelon had prepared, to aid the Greeks, against him. He also overthrew in battail Thrasylbulus, the son of Thero, and thereby restored the Agrigentines to their former liberty. But in the end, he lost the love of the Syracusians; and after he had reigned eleven years, he left the Kingdom to his brother Thrasylbulus, who became a most unjust and bloody Tyrant. Thrasylbulus enjoyed his Principality no longer than ten moneths. For, notwithstanding the force of mercenary Souldiers; which he entertained for his guards, he was beaten out of Syracuse by the Citizens; to whom, being besieged in Acradina, he restored the government, and was banished the Iland. From whence he sailed into Greece, where he died a private man, among the Locrians.

And now had the Syracusians recovered again their former liberty, as all the rest of the Cities did, after which they had never sought, had the Successors of Gelon inherited his vertue, as they did the Principality of Syracuse. For in all changes of Estates, the preservation ought to answer the acquisition. Where a liberall, valiant, and advised Prince, hath obtained any new Signiory, and added it to that of his owne, or exalted himselfe from being a private man, to the dignity of a Prince, it becometh the Successour to maintain it by the same way and art, by which it was gotten.

To conclude, Syracuse (though not without blowes, ere that she could cleanse her selfe of the creatures and lovers of Gelon) was now againe become Mistress of her selfe, and held her selfe free, well-near threescore years, to the time of Dionysius, though she were in the mean while greatly endangered by a Citizen of her owne, called Tindario.

Now, to prevent the greatnesse of any one among them, for the future, they devised a kind of banishment of such among them, as were suspected; taking patterne from the Athenian Ostracisme. They called this their new devised judgement of exile, Petalisme, wherein every one wrote upon an Olive leafe (as at Athens they wrote upon shels) the name of him, whom he would have expelled the City. He that had most suffrages against him, was banished for five years. Hereby in a short time, it came to passe that those of judgement, and best able to governe the Common-weale, were by the worst able, either suppressed, or thrust out of the City. Yea, such as feared this Law, though they had not yet felt it, withdrew themselves as secretly as they could, seeking some place of more security, wherein to maintain themselves. And good reason they had so to do; seeing that there is nothing so terrible in any State, as a powerfull and authorized ignorance. But this Law lasted not very long. For their necessity taught them to abolish it, and restore againe the wiser sort unto the Government; from which, the Nobility having practised to banish one another, the State became altogether Popular. But after a while, being invaded by Ducetius, King of the Sicilians, that inhabited the inner part of the Iland (who had already taken Enna, and some other of the Grecian Cities, and overthrowne the Army of the Agrigentines) the Syracusians sent forces against him, commanded by an unworthy Citizen of theirs, called Bolcon. This their captain made nothing so much hast to finde out Ducetius, against whom he was employed, as he did to flee from the Army, he led, as soone as Ducetius presented him battell. So for want of conduct, the greatest number of the Syracusians perished.

But making better choice among those whom they had banished, they levied other troops: by whom, in conclusion, Ducetius being beaten, submitted himselfe, and is constrained to leave the Iland for a time. Yet it was not long ere he returned again, and built the City Collatina on the Sea-side.

Ducetius being dead; all the Greek Cities did in a sort acknowledge Syracusa: Trinacria excepted; which also by force of armes, in the fourscore and fift Olympiad, they brought to reason.

But they do not long enjoy this their Superintendency. For the Citizens of Leontium, being oppressed by them, seek aid from the Athenians, about the sixt year of the Peloponnesian Warre. In this suit they prevailed by the eloquence of Gorgias their Orator; and got an hundred Athenian Gallies to succour them, under the leading of Lamachus and Charades. To this fleet, the Leontines, and their partners, added one hundred more; with which forces, and with some supplies brought by Sophocles, Pythodorus, Eurymedon and other Athenian Captains, they invaded the Territories of the Syracusians, and their partisans; wanne and lost divers places; took Messina; and, in the seventh year of the Peloponnesian Warre, lost it again. They also at the same time, attempted Himera, but in vain. The fire of this quarrell took hold upon many Cities, which did invade each others Territory with great violence. But when they had wearied themselves on all hands, and yet could see none issue of the war, the Leontines, without the advice of the Athenians, came to an accord with the Syracusians, and were
